SEC. 3. That whenever a majority of the resident patrons of any post-office of the class named in this act shall sign a request to the Postmaster-General asking the privilege of expressing under this act their choice for postmaster, or if any postmaster shall fail to forward the list or the quarterly corrections of said list as required by section 2, it shall be the duty of the Postmaster-General to forthwith issue to some person not a resident patron of said office, and when practicable to a commissioner of the circuit court of the district within which said office is located, his warrant authorizing him to warn a meeting of the resident patrons of such office by posting a notification of time, place, and purpose of meeting in a conspicuous place in said post-office, giving not less than five nor more than twenty days' notice thereof. The person named in said warrant shall have authority to preside and preserve order in such meeting, and shall determine all questions that may arise therein touching the right of any person to vote in accordance with the laws of the State or Territory in which said office is located. He shall open said meeting at the time named in the warning, and shall receive and count in open meeting the ballots that may be cast, and shall keep, or cause to be kept, a list of the persons casting them, and upon the first ballot shall keep the box open two hours; and when upon the first or any succeeding ballot any person shall receive a majority of all the votes cast, the presiding officer shall forthwith make return to the Postmaster-General of the result, transmitting to him the ballots and the list of persons casting them; and for such service shall be allowed as compensation the sum of $5 and 5 cents for each mile traveled. If the Postmaster-General should decline to appoint the person so nominated, he shall forthwith notify the person who presided at said meeting, who shall hold another meeting as hereinbefore prescribed; and repeated meetings shall be held till some person is nominated whom the Postmaster-General will appoint: Provided, That it shall not be lawful for the Postmaster-General to refuse to appoint the person so nominated by the patrons of such office for political or party reasons.

I desire to print in the RECORD as part of my remarks a copy of the bill, because it has not been very well understood; and also the action of the National Grange of Patrons of Husbandry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont asks unanimous consent to be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask to amend that so that the proposition shall be that any gentleman who desires to print his remarks in the RECORD be permitted to do so.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman means any gentleman who speaks in the debate.

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that any gentleman who takes part in the debate may be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. ADAMS. On page 2 of this bill we find the appropriation proposed by the committee for the free-delivery service. The bill appropriates for the free-delivery service $6,000,000. The question is whether that is an adequate appropriation. What does the committee say about it? We find that on page 3 of their report they say this:

The bill proposes for 1889 an increase of $777,500 over that of 1888. This is not due so much to a proposed increase in the service as to the operation of the following acts, embraced in sections 631, 632, and 633 of the Postal Laws and Regulations, as follows:

Then the committee quotes those laws, and concludes with the following sentence:

It will be seen that increase of salary by promotion has much to do with this increased amount.

Now, what do the officials of the Department say? On page 15 of the report, or rather of the document at large, which includes the appendix, there is a letter from J. F. Bates, superintendent free-delivery system, in which he says justly—

It will require at least $6,000,000 to provide for legal obligations already incurred with no provision—

And I ask the attention of the committee particularly to these words—with no provision made for increased incidental expenses, additional carriers, or extension of the service to additional cities.

There has been a large addition to the number of free-delivery cities in the last year—I admit that—and when I appealed for a further modification of the law that fact was named as an objection to my request. It is no objection at all.

I have not time to do more than refer to the particular case which has attracted my attention to this subject.

My Congressional district includes a part of the city of Chicago and is in the part of Cook County which lies around Chicago. It includes among other things a municipality which in 1880 was a village of 6,300 souls. That village has now grown to a city of 43,000 people; and yet under existing law it cannot have a free-delivery system. The reason is the law we passed last year required the Postmaster-General to establish that system in cities of over 50,000 inhabitants, but permitted him to do so in cities which had 10,000 inhabitants by the census of 1880, or paid $10,000 of gross revenue.

I will admit this city in my district forms an exceptional case; but this is the exceptional case, that a city of 43,000 persons can not have the free-delivery system simply because it has grown from a population of 6,300 to 43,000 since the census of 1880 was made.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOCKERY. Does not the fact that there is not at that point $10,000 of gross postal revenue show that the people there do their business at Chicago?

Mr. ADAMS. It shows that a certain number of them do business at Chicago. I will make an explanation as to that, although it will consume part of my ten minutes, and I hope some gentleman will give me some additional time. This city has grown up from a village which consisted in an aggregation of villages, each with its small post-office. There are five little post-offices there, which the business people who have their residences there disdain to use, simply because they can go into Chicago, rather than walk a quarter of a mile to the post-office. But if we had the free-delivery system there the annual revenue which now, as my friend from Missouri says, does not amount to $10,000, would, I have no doubt, immediately spring to $15,000 or $20,000, and the fact that under those circumstances the gross revenue does not amount to $10,000 does not show that that large community does not suffer from the state of the law.

Now, I do not pretend that in this bill I can get the modification of that law; but, Mr. Chairman, suppose I could devise a bill which this House were willing to pass by which that city of mine could be brought within the operation of the law, it would do very little good if the appropriations were insufficient, and they are admitted to be insufficient, if Colonel Bates's letter is accurate in which he says it will take $6,000,000.

My impression is that some gentlemen of this House regard the free-delivery system as a luxury, a mere convenience for the residents of the cities or the districts in which it is applied. To my mind it is more an industrial agent by which the wealth of the whole country as well as of the particular district to which it is applied can be increased. A very large part of the mails which my constituents might receive under the free-delivery system would consist of business correspondence.

There are stores and manufactories there. Some of the residents, of course, do business in the city of Chicago, but there is a large amount of local business done which can be greatly facilitated by the free-delivery system, and the wealth of the community be thereby increased. I mention this merely as an exceptional case; but I have no doubt that within the growing regions of the Northwest there are many cities and other municipalities in the same condition as the city of Lake View, and my only object in discussing the point now is to say that I think the committee ought not, for the sake of a mere appearance of economy, to appropriate only a sum sufficient to carry on the existing system in the existing places where it is now applied under the existing law, making no provision for its extension.

The fact that many cities have been added during the last year to the free-delivery list furnishes no argument whatever against this proposition, and I am particularly interested in the subject, inasmuch as I hope, either by some sort of bill (I have already introduced one) or by some new construction of the regulations of the Department, to bring that city in my Congressional district within the law. If it can be brought within the law, I think it unreasonable that there should not be an appropriation sufficient to meet the requirements of the case. The appropriation of a few hundred thousand dollars more will not affect the prosperity of the country in an unfavorable way, and if it does increase the apparent size or the real size of the postal appropriation bill, I am sure that the business people of this country will regard that rather in the light of economy than in the light of extravagance. I yield the floor back to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM].

Mr. BINGHAM. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has six minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the gentleman on the other side will allow me, I will reserve that time.

Mr. DOCKERY. Of course it is the desire on this side to close the debate. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MONTGOMERY] desires to occupy a few minutes——

Mr. BINGHAM. All that I ask is the privilege of reserving the six minutes.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is all right. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MONTGOMERY] desires to address the committee, and if I can be recognized I will yield him fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. DOCKERY. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, which had charge of this bill and which framed and reported it, I am glad to hear that there is no opposition to the bill itself. I wish to say on behalf of that committee that in framing this appropriation bill and in dealing with legislation referring to the postal service there has been no disposition anywhere to economize in such a way as to affect injuriously the mail service of the country.

So far as the increased appropriations in the bill are concerned, especially the increase which gives additional compensation in an indirect way to third-class postmasters by making them allowances, or permitting the Post-Office Department to do so, on account of rent, lights, and fuel, I believe that it meets the hearty indorsement of every member of that committee. My only objection to the bill is that it does not go far enough in the direction of that liberality with which I believe the postal system of the country ought to be treated. While the bill does, by a provision which by the unanimous consent of the House has been ingrafted upon it, undertake to relieve one set of officers, the third-class postmasters, unfortunately that unanimous consent did not go far enough to permit us to relieve another class, the fourth-class postmasters, whom I believe to be more deserving of relief and in a worse condition than those who are relieved by the bill. According to the report of the Postmaster-General, there are 1,864 third-class postmasters in this country.

Mr. McCREARY. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCREARY. Can the gentleman tell us how many fourth-class postmasters there are in the United States?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Over 52,000; yes, 53,053 on the 1st of last October.

Mr. McCREARY. How much is it proposed now to pay them extra in addition to what they at present receive?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. There is no proposition of that kind in this bill—no provision for them. That is my objection to it.

Mr. McCREARY. Not in this bill; but I understood that there was some amendment which was to be offered.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. The amendment to which the gentleman refers, which can be offered only by unanimous consent, proposed to increase their compensation by allowing them $5 a quarter, or $20 a year each, in addition to the compensation they now receive. That will make an aggregate of about $1,060,000.

Mr. McCREARY. If it will not interrupt the gentleman, I want to say that the mail service comes nearer to the people than any other branch of the public service, and that I think there ought to be some increase made in the compensation of the fourth-class postmasters.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. On that subject I simply desire to say that $20 to each of those postmasters will amount to a little over a million dollars, and will give some little relief to over fifty-three thousand fourth-class postmasters, who, I think, are the worst compensated officers connected with the Post-Office Department or its service.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi. The worst in the world.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Yes; I will say the worst in the world, where there is any pretense to pay at all. Now, Mr. Chairman, this committee has voted without any hesitation $650,000 of additional compensation to 1,864 third-class postmasters, and if the House stands now upon a question of unanimous consent, or upon any other ground, refusing to give these fifty-three thousand fourth-class postmasters (who are almost thirty times as numerous as the class that the bill proposes to relieve) the comparatively small sum of $1,000,000, considerably less than double what is allowed to these 1,864 third-class postmasters, then I say this House will be condemned in its management of this bill and in its management and control of the post-office affairs of the country.

It will seem strange to them, as it seems strange to me, that when no one was found to object to legislation on this bill giving third-class postmasters annually over $350 each of additional compensation in clerk-hire, light, and fuel, there should be found any one to object to a proposition to give to fourth-class postmasters the small sum of $20 a year in addition to the unfair and inadequate compensation they now receive.

I have no desire, of course, to antagonize this bill; but I feel that at this late stage of the session any relief to the fourth-class postmasters must be obtained in the same manner as relief is given to third-class postmasters, by ingrafting the proper legislation on this bill. An effort to obtain this relief by a new bill to be reported hereafter from the committee would probably result in failure for want of time to pass the bill this session. And whether this amendment be the appropriate measure of relief or not, it certainly is little enough, and does not interfere with the method of payment now prevailing in reference to fourth-class postmasters; it does not interfere with the compensation based upon percentage of cancellation; the proposition is simply to give the sum of $20 a year as compensation in addition to that which is now given. In other words, if a postmaster now gets $10 a year—a very common case in my district, and I presume in the districts of many gentlemen on this floor—this proposition would give him $30 a year. If a postmaster receives $50 annually his compensation will be increased to $70, giving to each only an aggregate increase of $20 per year.

While there has been some complaint here—and I will not say that in some cases it is not a just complaint—that there has been a disposition on the part of various officers, high and low, seeking an increase of compensation, to organize a united movement in that direction and flood this House with petitions, yet, however much some gentlemen may object to these petitions, we should carefully examine them with the view of ascertaining whether there be merit and justice in the demands which are made. We should examine these applications for increased compensation fairly and impartially, and should consider only the question whether or not relief, such as can be properly granted, is asked. And I wish to say now that whatever may have been the number of petitions poured into that petition-box, I do not believe a juster complaint has ever come from any people than that which has come from the fourth-class postmasters in their demand for some increase of compensation for the service which they render to those people who receive less benefits under the postal system than any other people in the country. At the cross-roads post-offices and the post-offices in the small hamlets and towns the postmasters in many cases do not receive for the attention which they give in receiving and delivering the mails more than $10, $15, $20, $30, or $40 a year.

Mr. Chairman, I listened to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] with reference to the extension of the free-delivery system to his town, and I heard him before our committee. I appreciate the condition of postal affairs existing at his home, and I desire to advance the mail facilities of his people; but the misfortune with reference to the postal system of this country is that we pay attention almost exclusively to those people who seek to have their mails delivered at their doors, it may be, before they are up in the mornings, so that they can, if they choose, read their mail matter in their beds; and we make too little effort in the way of extending the benefits of the postal system to the people scattered through the rural districts, who are glad to get their mail by riding 3, 4, and 5 miles through the mud or dust to a country post-office.

Mr. LIND. Yes, in some cases 15 miles.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Yes, in places 15 miles.

Mr. Chairman, this may be the last opportunity I will have this session to say a word for the improvement of the mail service in the rural districts or to argue the claims of their postmasters—always belonging to the fourth class—for fairer treatment and better compensation. But I will say that while objection may defeat this amendment, these fourth-class postmasters and the people in the rural districts where they serve and their Representatives in this House will not cease to clamor through the petition-box and on this floor till fairer treatment has been accorded them than they are receiving under existing law.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I advocate seeks only to relieve a hardship at post-offices where all that the people ask is that the postmaster may deliver their mails when they call for them. I am having trouble now, and I have no doubt many other members on this floor are having trouble, in finding men in the rural districts who will accept these small post-offices and render this service to the people at the pitiful compensation now allowed, based on the amount of cancellations during the year, amounting often to less than $10, $15, or $20.

I appeal to the House to recognize this as an opportunity to do justice to these humble postmasters. I believe that so far as this session of Congress is concerned we have now our only opportunity of doing justice in this respect to a class of persons who, I believe, have the most meritorious claim for increase of salary that has been presented to this Congress.

Mr. DOCKERY. I reserve that portion of my time—five minutes, I understand—which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MONTGOMERY] has not occupied. I now yield the floor in order that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] may go on.

Mr. PETERS. I yield twenty minutes to my colleague [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, as will be remembered by many members, I offered early in this session a resolution calling upon the Postmaster-General for information concerning what we in the West thought insufficient and unsatisfactory mail service. After some delay that resolution was reported back to the House and favorably acted upon. The Postmaster-General was thus called upon for information; and a report from him on the subject was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads; but it has never been brought to the attention of the House. This is my excuse for saying on this occasion some things which I had hoped to say in connection with that report.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman will permit me to say that the matter to which he refers has not been reported back by reason of the protracted tariff debate. It is the purpose of the committee to report it back at an early day.

Mr. PERKINS. Well, Mr. Chairman, if it will be reported back at an early day and an opportunity then given to make the suggestions I thought of making on the present occasion, I am quite willing to defer until that time what I contemplated saying. I would prefer to say it in connection with that resolution; but thinking that perhaps in consequence of the crowded condition of business that resolution and report might not be again brought to the attention of the House, I had contemplated making at this time some remarks on that subject.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have not interrupted the gentleman from Kansas to draw him away from his purpose at all, but merely to make that statement in justice to the committee.

Mr. PERKINS. If it is the purpose of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to report to the House the resolution and report, and I will have the opportunity to discuss them, I do not care to take up the time now.

Mr. BINGHAM. When reported can not the gentleman discuss the resolution as a privileged matter?

Mr. PERKINS. No, I do not think it is a privileged matter.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will say that if the business of the House will permit at that time there will be no disposition on the part of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to cut off debate.

Mr. PERKINS. I would have much preferred, of course, to have discussed the subject while the resolution was pending before the House, but under the circumstances I will do so now while I have the floor for that purpose.

The bill before the House is, in my judgment, commendable as far as it goes. The only criticism I have to make of the bill is that it does not make appropriations as liberally, for the great West particularly, as the people of that country think ought to be made.

There has been much complaint in the section of country from which I come of the present mail service. Whether that is in consequence of insufficient or inadequate appropriation or whether it is because of the political change in the offices and the employés designated to do the work, or whether from bad management or not, I am not prepared to say, except as I shall argue from the facts I shall present that the appropriation made for that service is not sufficient. That, however, may not be the only explanation of it.

I am inclined to think there is some large portion due and to be charged to inexperienced men and bad management resulting from changes incident to the change of administration and to the present management of the Post-Office Department. I do not make any complaint of the general superintendent of the railway mail service. I think he has tried to do his duty, to do the best he could, in order to give to the people of the West efficient and satisfactory service. Nor do I wish to complain of that excellent officer and accomplished gentleman, the First Assistant Postmaster-General. He is the man, in my judgment, who ought to have been appointed Postmaster-General instead of bringing here from the State of Michigan a man to look after the political necessities of the Administration by looking after its political extremities.

But, sir, I do think the management of the Post-Office Department has been partisan in its character, parsimonious in its allowances, palsied in its execution. It is because of this so much complaint is made by the country generally, and particularly by the people I represent in part; and yet at the same time I wish to do justice to the officers I have mentioned, who have done the very best they could to give the people satisfactory service.

On the 1st day of July, 1886, there were 123,745.45 miles of railway mail service; on the 1st day of January of the present year there were 136,207.72 miles. Thus showing in a period of eighteen months an increase of 12,462 miles of railway mail service, or a little over 10 per cent. increase in the entire railway mail service of the country. Notwithstanding this increase in the miles of service we find from the bill before us an increase of only 5 per cent. for railway postal-clerk service.

In other words, the last appropriation bill carried for postal clerks $4,990,240.62, while the present bill only carries $5,246,790.21, making, as I have suggested, an increase of only 5 per cent., while the increase in the railway mail service is over 10 per cent. Thus it necessarily follows that this increase is not in keeping with the growth and extension of the service and the requirements of the people served.

Mr. BINGHAM. I think the gentleman is confounding the increase in the postal service with the postal-car service.

Mr. PERKINS. No, I am speaking of the appropriation for the postal-clerk service. I have shown that while the increase in the railway mail service has been more than 10 per cent., the increase in the railway postal-clerk service has been only 5 per cent.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman is speaking of the postal railway service generally, while this refers to the postal-car service. It is for the postal-car service $2,000,000 is appropriated.

Mr. PERKINS. I am speaking of the appropriation for postal railway clerks and comparing it with the railway mail service.

Mr. DOCKERY. I think, as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], the gentleman is confusing one service with the other.

Mr. PERKINS. But the railway postal clerks are employed in distributing the mails in the railway mail service.

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes; but in that branch of it known as the postal-car service.

Mr. PERKINS. Very well; call it the postal-car service. As I understand there are 136,000 miles of postal-car service, and the increase has been 10 per cent., while by the provisions of this bill the increase for clerical assistance is but 5 per cent., a totally inadequate increase.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is it not true that a large part of the railway mail service is made up of pouch matter?

Mr. PERKINS. Some portions of it is; not the larger part of it by any means, because in the West, where much of this increased service has been given, on almost all of the new lines railway mail service has been extended, and postal-clerkship service given.

Mr. BLOUNT. It only shows that they have been liberal in making provision for your part of the country.

Mr. PERKINS. What we complain of is that the service was not given as soon as it should have been and in many instances not efficient service, but in almost all instances the railway postal service has been given in some form on these new lines, and I say this in justice to the Administration.

MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. Chairman, the railway mail service is divided into nine geographical divisions. The sixth division comprises Wisconsin, Illinois, Iowa, Nebraska, Minnesota, the upper peninsula of Michigan, Dakota and Wyoming Territories, with James E. White superintendent, headquarters Chicago, Ill.

The seventh division comprises Missouri, Kansas, Arkansas, Texas, Colorado, New Mexico, and the Indian Territory, with R. M. Thomas superintendent, headquarters, St. Louis, Mo.

Thus we see that Nebraska is in the sixth and Kansas in the seventh divisions.

I have in my hand a copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 14, containing the speech of Senator REAGAN, recently delivered, in defense of this Administration. It contains a number of tables and statements that must have been furnished him by the Post-Office Department, and hence I accept them as official.

From these tables I find that during the nineteen months ending January 31 of the present year the railway postal service was extended in the United States 12,462.52 miles. Of this extension the sixth division, embracing Nebraska, received 4,541.36 miles, and the seventh division, embracing the State of Kansas, received 5,283.36 miles, making for the two divisions 9,824.72, and leaving for the seven remaining divisions 2,637.85 miles of new or additional railway mail service.

From the report of the Postmaster-General now before us I find that on the 1st day of July, 1885, there were 4,387 railway postal clerks in the service, and from the same source I find that on January 1, 1888, there were 4,988, an increase in that period of 601 clerks.

Of this increase I find that the sixth and seventh divisions combined, embracing Nebraska and Kansas, received 334.

Thus we see that while in a period of nineteen months the two divisions embracing the States of Nebraska and Kansas got almost 80 per cent. of the increase in the miles of the railway postal service, in a period of thirty months they got but 55 per cent. of the increase in postal clerks to do the work.

Again from the tables furnished we learn that in the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, eighth, and ninth divisions, where in a period of nineteen months ending January 31, 1888, there were but 2,637.85 miles of new railway mail service added, they were given 187 additional clerks to do the work, while in the sixth and seventh divisions there were added 9,824.72 miles of railway mail service during the same period, while but 228 additional clerks were given to do the work. On this basis it will be seen that if 187 additional clerks were reasonable for the 2,637.85 miles of new service, the sixth and seventh divisions, where there was the increase of 9,824.72 miles of service, should have had a trifle over 700, and Kansas and Nebraska alone should have had 350; instead of a small share of the 228 that were allotted to the fifteen States and Territories comprising the sixth and seventh divisions.

It will not do to say in answer to or explanation of this discrimination that the work was heaviest in these divisions, and that for such reason the appointments were more in proportion to the miles of new service than in the Kansas and Nebraska divisions, for it is shown by the tables furnished that in those divisions each clerk handled on an average during the two years ending June 30, 1887, 180,640 more pieces of mail matter than were handled on the average by the clerks of the other seven divisions; and we find that in the Kansas and Nebraska divisions that on an average one clerk is furnished for each 3,309 miles of mail service, while in the other divisions combined the average is one clerk to every 2,627 miles of service.

Again, for the purpose of showing how my own State has been treated by this administration, I will quote further from the tables furnished Senator REAGAN:

There were on the 30th day of June, 1887, 9,217.25 miles of star-route service in Kansas, and 6,174.38 miles of railroad service, making in the aggregate 15,391.63 miles of mail service, and the distance annually traveled on these lines was 9,102,645.25 miles.

In the sister State of Nebraska there were at the same time 5,841.52 miles of star route service and 4,253.20 miles of railroad service, making in the aggregate 10,094.72 miles of mail service, and the distance traveled annually on these lines was 5,524,758.63 miles.

We find that for this service there was paid in Nebraska $1,014,551.07, while for almost 68 per cent. more service in Kansas there was only paid $88[illegible]074.42. In other words, that for carrying the mail in Nebraska there is paid 18.38 cents per mile, while in Kansas but 9.8 cents per mile is paid.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. DOCKERY. Does the gentleman attribute any purpose anywhere in the administration of the Department to discriminate in favor of Nebraska as against Kansas?

Mr. PERKINS. I do not; but I am calling attention to this remarkable discrimination we find between these two States in the way of compensation for carrying the mail.

But let us pursue our figures further.

PRESIDENTIAL OFFICES.

We find from the last annual report of the Postmaster-General that in Arkansas, a Democratic State, with five members of Congress, the Government of the United States received during the last fiscal year in postal receipts from the Presidential offices $115,478.19, and that there was allowed for its collection by this administration 43 per cent. of the amount received.

In Nebraska, a Republican State, with only three members of Congress, there was received in the same time and in the same way, and from the same source, $486,720.88, and for its collection only 33 per cent. of the amount received was allowed.

In Mississippi, a Democratic State, with seven members of Congress, the Government of the United States received during the last fiscal year in postal receipts from the Presidential offices $108,611.83, and for its collection there was allowed by this administration 43 per cent. of the amount received. In Minnesota, a Republican State, with only five members of Congress, there was received in the same time and in the same way and from the same source $765,039.08, and for its collection only 35 per cent. of the amount received was allowed.

In Kentucky, a Democratic State, with eleven members of Congress, the Government of the United States received during the last fiscal year in postal receipts from the Presidential offices $466,105.35, and for its collection there was allowed by this administration 42 per cent. of the amount received. In Michigan, a Republican State, with the same number of Congressmen, there was received in the same way and in the same time and from the same source $1,114,944.87, and for its collection only 37 per cent. of the amount received was allowed.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. PERKINS. Well, I have but a very few moments.

Mr. DOCKERY. I would like to get in another inquiry in this connection.

Mr. PERKINS. Very well, I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DOCKERY. As the gentleman is referring to percentages seemingly based on political considerations, he will be fair enough I know to state that the percentages to which he refers are fixed by law, and are applicable to all parts of the United States, the law making no discrimination.

Mr. PERKINS. Then why do not the figures carry out the same results in all the States? The gentleman well knows that in allowances for clerk-hire, rent of offices, fuel, lights, etc., there is much discretion in the Post-Office Department.

In Georgia, a Democratic State, with ten members of Congress, the Government of the United States received during the last fiscal year in postal receipts from the Presidential offices $358,021.43, and for its collection there was allowed by this Administration 39 per cent. of the amount received.

In Kansas, a Republican State, with only seven members of Congress, there was received in the same way and in the same time and from the same source $716,919.73, and for its collection only 36 per cent. of the amount received was allowed.

In New Mexico, a Democratic Territory, which my friend SPRINGER thinks should be admitted into the Union as a State, the Government of the United States received during the last fiscal year in postal receipts from the Presidential offices $38,142.16, and for its collection there was allowed by this Administration 46 per cent. of the amount received.

In Dakota, a Republican Territory, which my friend SPRINGER thinks should not be admitted into the Union as a State unless coupled with some other Territory, there was received in the same time and in the same way and from the same source $212,451.45, and for its collection only 42 per cent. of the amount received was allowed.

But let us look a little further. In the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress there was an appropriation of $296,000 for necessary and special mail facilities on the trunk railroad lines of the country. This, I find, was almost entirely exhausted in the South. I will furnish for the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, a table found in the last annual report of the Postmaster-General, showing the expenditure of this special appropriation. From this table it will appear that the East and North got $62,647.06, the South $233,340.47, and the West not a dollar:

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Can I have an extension of my time?

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the gentleman will permit me to make a single remark. I want to say that this was recommended by several Republican administrations, that it has obtained a long time in the service. The item of special facilities and the purpose of allowing this condition of postal affairs was to reach Cuba, commencing with Springfield, Mass., and going all along the line.

Mr. PERKINS. But the first appropriation was made after the incoming of the Democratic administration.

Mr. BLOUNT. Oh, no.

Mr. PERKINS. I think so.

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir; it has been made since 1878.

Mr. PERKINS. This special appropriation?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes; and I am certain, for I have tried to fight it off for years.

Mr. PERKINS. I do not say it should be stricken off. I am not arguing that more is given to one section than should be given, or that the people are willing that it should be stricken down, but I argue that in our section there is not that attention given to the necessary increase in facilities which should be given in accordance with the growing necessities and wants of the people.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have not given these figures and tables for the purpose of showing or arguing that some sections or divisions of our country are getting more of the current expenditures than they need or more than the people are willing should be appropriated for their accommodation and good service. But I have called attention to these figures for the purpose of showing all—Republican and sinner alike—that in that great and growing section of the country for which I speak the mail service is and must necessarily be bad and insufficient, that in that great and marvelous West where such wonderful growth and development have been witnessed, where communities are settled in a day, and empires are born in a night, this Administration has been lagging and indifferent, and has not kept pace with the wants and necessities of the people or the demands of the public service.

Competent and experienced men have been set aside and stricken down that political workers might be provided for, and the efficiency of the service and the necessities of the people have been held for naught in the intense desire of this Department to make a showing of economy that would help the political necessities of this Administration. In many sections of the great West almost the only tangible evidence the people have that the Government of the United States is an actual organized reality is the semi or tri weekly appearance of the buckboard with its mail-carrier bringing the newspapers and letters from loved ones in the older and more favored sections of the country.

And notwithstanding the growth of this section of our common country, its rapid increase in population, its new communities, its progressive activities, its multiplied and constantly increassing necessities, it is the boast of the Postmaster-General in his last annual report that while he has been compelled to give the people more miles of star route service than heretofore, he has done it with such niggardly allowances that it does not cost the people of the United States as much as when there were fewer people to be served and less miles of star routes to be traveled.

Mr. Chairman, in view of these incontrovertible facts, is it any wonder that the people complain and, particularly in the West, denounce the administration of the Post-Office Department as partisan, parsimonious, and palsied, and ask that there shall be some conception and appreciation of their necessities, and some fair effort made to meet the demands of the public service? They do not believe in the doctrine of "innocuous desuetude" when applied to the mail service of the country, and in no section, no hamlet has there been a demand that the appropriations for this important branch of the public service shall be less, or that the Post-Office Department shall be self-sustaining. I do not know what to say better than to quote briefly from a speech delivered on the 28th of February by Senator PADDOCK, of Nebraska, upon this same subject:

> Mr. President, the average American citizen is a man of broad views, strong in purpose, intensely patriotic, aggressive, and enterprising. He is proud of his country and its institutions; he demands of the governing power that it shall be the aggregate personification of what he himself is, and the party having the responsibility of administration which refuses great opportunities when properly presented, to increase the wealth, the prosperity, the power, and the glory of the Republic, and spends its time in trying to save a few dollars in the purchase of tape and tabs and wrapping paper, will surely come to grief when the people, who are the sovereign, can reach it through the ballot-box.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PERKINS. I have here a number of letters which I wanted to read. Some of them are from postal clerks showing the work imposed on them in that section of the country.

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope the gentleman will include the papers he refers to in his remarks as printed.

Mr. PERKINS. I shall, unless I can get another opportunity further on in the debate. This is not a matter of politics with us. Complaints come from wholesale merchants, clergymen, bankers, lawyers, newspapers, and Democratic editors.

I will insert a letter from a Democratic wholesale merchant of the city of Fort Scott:

> FORT SCOTT, KANS., February 17, 1888.
> DEAR SIR: I attach a couple of envelopes returned to me yesterday. I have removed the contents, which were important to my customer, W. K. Shaw, and have again forwarded them. If this was the first time such a thing had happened would not complain, but for a year past has been a weekly, if not daily, occurrence. You will notice letters were mailed at this office January 16, destined for Harris, Kans., a station on Kansas, Nebraska and Dakota Railroad, about 40 miles from this point, and after a month's delay thrown back into post-office box without any seeming attempt being made to get them to their proper destination. Instead of getting to Harris were sent to Horace; one received there on January 17 and other some time in February, and after a month's delay in one case and a fortnight in other, postmaster at Horace awakens to the fact that they were not intended for his office. Will you please place where proper inquiries can be made as to whom are the parties at fault? These miscarriages have been the cause of considerable misunderstanding between Mr. Shaw and myself, and intend to remain silent no longer. Trusting you may find time to start proper inquiries,

Mr. PETERS. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. LODGE. The criticisms which have been made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] on this bill can very largely be met by amendments to the appropriations, either increasing them or changing their distribution. I wish that the criticism which I have to make could be met in the same way. But I am afraid that the only chance for the improvement I desire is that it should be made somewhere else. Moreover, the first criticism that I have to make is that the committee does not seem to have paid attention to the recommendations of the Postmaster-General; and I shall take for the text of the little I have to say the statement that Mr. Vilas made in his report for last year, that the aggregate effect of the present relations with the railroads was to impose an excessive charge upon the Treasury of the United States.

We have in this bill $17,000,000 appropriated for the railway service. Every form of freight transportation and passenger transportation has fallen very greatly in the last ten years. I have some figures here which show a reduction in freight rates of from 60 to 20 per cent. on all the leading lines in all the principal sections of the country. It is the same case—not so large a reduction, but still a reduction of 20 or 30 per cent.—in the passenger service.

Let me read these statistics:

	Per cent. reduction.
Lake Shore, 1872–'83	47
New York Central, 1872–'83	43
Burlington, Cedar Rapids and Northern, 1877–'82	62
Chicago and Northwestern, 1872–'86	58
Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul, 1872–'86	56
Illinois Central, 1872–'82	34.4
Erie, 1873–'80	43
Chicago and Alton, 1874–'87	56
All railroads in Michigan, 1874–'83	27
All-rail rate on wheat, Chicago to New York, 1874–'83	44
Boston and Lowell, 1879–'84	30
Eastern, 1879–'84	17
New York and New England, 1879–'84	51
New York, New Haven and Hartford, 1879–'84	17

The following are some reductions in the charges per passenger per mile:

	Per cent. of reduction.
Chicago and Northwestern, 1877–'86	10
Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul, 1877–'86	24.5
Illinois Central, 1872–'82	23.7
Chicago and Alton, 1874–'87	37
All Massachusetts roads, 1876–'83	20

These figures are taken from various railroad reports and can, of course, be much extended. They have been brought together and classified also by Mr. Edward Atkinson in some recent articles which appeared, I think, in the Century magazine.

In that period there have been two reductions—one of 5 and one of 10 per cent.—by the Government; but these reductions have been more than made up by the additional expenses of the railway postal-car service, for which $2,000,000 is paid. We propose to pay $2,000,000 for the postal-car service, and Mr. Vilas says in his report that these cars can be built for $1,600,000 by the Government and run for $250,000. We are paying, in other words, a rental of 125 per cent. for the postal-cars in the service of the Government; and we are paying that in addition to weight rates to the railroads that no private shipper would think of paying for one moment or that the railroads would think of demanding.

I know it is said in reply that the railroads give us extra facilities, that they put our cars upon fast trains, and that they carry a certain number of postal clerks in those cars. But even if we make all those allowances, I believe we are still paying from five to six millions more than we ought to pay to the railroads, and that that amount might just as well be turned in to the Government, thus enabling us to reduce the rates of postage, or increase the pay of employés, or improve the service throughout the country.

The suggestions I have taken are drawn from Mr. Vilas's report of last year. I will now give a single instance which he mentions of the exorbitant prices exacted by the railroads for transportation of the mails. To one railroad they pay $504,000 for railway mail service and $59,000 for the use of cars which can be built for $17,500. Now, it does not seem to me it can be right or that it is for the interest of the postal service or of the country to pay such rates as that. There is one instance in particular which shows how the Government is treated and how the people suffer by the exactions of the railroads which comes immediately under my own notice in my own State.

I refer to the mail facilities between New York and Boston, where there is an immense business doing all the time. There we have no proper fast-mail facilities. The New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad, which controls the entry into New York of all the Eastern business, refuses to allow a fast-mail train except at a price which is perfectly exorbitant. I do not blame the Department in the least for refusing to pay them; but I, and every member from New England, have sent to the Post-Office Department this year a mass of petitions from all the business men, merchants and manufacturers, of New England, asking to have this thing remedied, and it is a burden and an evil which should be remedied without delay.

This is simply one of the glaring injustices which arise from the present relation between the Government and the railroads, and I am surprised, after the way in which the Postmaster-General has called the attention of the committee to this condition of affairs, that we are still left to pay nineteen millions for this railway service, seventeen millions for the service and two millions for the postal-cars, while in many parts of this country we are unable to get even the fast-mail service which they pretend to give us under these clauses in return for this great expenditure of money.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the gentleman complain that the committee does not violate the rules of this House by proposing an amendment of the law in reference to the compensation of railroads for mail service?

Mr. LODGE. I understand perfectly well that the committee can not do that on an appropriation bill; but I think, nevertheless, that new legislation might well have been introduced to remedy the evils which I have pointed out. If it has been introduced it has escaped my notice.

Mr. BLOUNT. Well, it has been.

Mr. LODGE. I beg the gentleman's pardon, then. I did not know of it, and have not seen it. There is some new legislation in the bill, but it does not affect the points that I have raised.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman claims to have a good deal of statistical information in regard to the reduction that has been made in the charges for transporting everything else carried by the railways during the past few years, and I beg to say to the gentleman, on behalf of the committee, that they will be very glad to have that information, and that they concur with him entirely in the views he has expressed in relation to the compensation paid to the railroads.

Mr. PETERS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR].

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention to one feature of this bill, namely, the increased compensation which it provides for postmasters of the third class. That compensation appears to be for "light, rent, and fuel," but I think it will be generally conceded that that is only another name for increasing the salaries of this class of public officers. I wish in connection with that to call attention to a new system that has grown up under this Administration.

I do not think it has ever before happened in the history of this Government that appointees holding office under the Administration and receiving salaries from the public Treasury have held a national convention and passed resolutions asking for an increase of their own salaries. This, I think, is the first instance of that kind we have ever had in this country, and I desire in this way to call public attention to it. This proposed increase amounts to about $650,000, and I do not think it is at all necessary. We have not heard it said, I believe, that there was any very great difficulty found in getting men to fill these offices of third-class postmasters. The fact is that there never has been such a clamorous demand for these offices as there has been under this Administration, and I was sorry to find the chairman of the committee [Mr. BLOUNT], after denouncing that clamor in regard to other matters, yield complacently to this demand, which has been made in a more offensive way than any other.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am sure the gentleman does not wish to do me injustice, and I wish to say to him that I have never in any place assented to the propositions in the bill reported by the convention of postmasters.

Mr. KERR. You have assented to one demand which they made—the demand for an increase of the compensation of third-class postmasters.

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes; and the gentleman was in his seat when I asked unanimous consent for that and obtained it, and he did not object.

Mr. KERR. I did not hear the request or I should have objected to it. It was spoken in a quiet tone of voice. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLOUNT. Not at all. I stood here in my place and made the request so plainly that no gentleman who was present could have failed to hear it.

Mr. KERR. Well, I did not hear it. But, aside from that, this increase is incorporated in the report of the committee; so it is hardly fair for the gentleman to say that he asked unanimous consent and no objection was made, when he has affirmatively recommended it in his report. This appropriation has been recommended in compliance with the demand of the Democratic postmasters in convention assembled.

Mr. BLOUNT. Let me say to the gentleman that that has not been done at the demand of the postmasters. It is a measure which has been recommended by two Postmasters-General, and by one of them, a Republican, before this Administration came in.

Mr. KERR. Yes; and I call attention to the fact that when this was recommended by a Republican Postmaster-General it was refused. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] rose and objected, and the appropriation was refused; but when a Democratic Postmaster-General makes the recommendation it is acquiesced in. Now, I believe in making appropriations for the facilitation of the carriage of the mails, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] have both been pleading for the recognition of the demands and necessities of the mail-transportation service. So far as that is concerned it is quite proper, but now when prices are going down, when gentlemen on the other side say that prices are continually being lowered, I say there is no excuse for this proposed increase of the salaries of the officials recently appointed by this Administration.

Mr. PETERS. The people do not understand that, according to the rules of this House for the consideration of appropriation bills, it is impossible to legislate—in other words, that it is impossible to ingraft upon an appropriation bill any new law unless it be done by unanimous consent. The fact that the people do not understand this question frequently brings to members of Congress, as well as to the petition-box in this House, a large number of complaints in the form of resolutions and requests. I have always seriously doubted the utility of such a rule. I, for one, have never been afraid of the decision of the majority of this House, provided we can get the majority in such a position as to hold them responsible. I do not believe in shirking responsibility, either political or otherwise; and one great trouble about this rule of the House is that it divides and scatters responsibility. One member may get up and make an objection, and you can not fasten the responsibility for the defeat of legislation upon any party or organization. That one individual has no responsibility as a politician, because party organizations are made up of aggregations of individuals. A party is an intangible and invisible thing—something that we can not see or feel. I know Republicans sometimes think that the Democratic party has been so rank that we could smell it, but there is some question about that.

Mr. STRUBLE. Oh, no; the gentleman is mistaken. [Laughter.]

Mr. PETERS. I am speaking of their virtuous attitude at present.

I say that I have often doubted the utility of the rule of the House which allows one objection to defeat legislation which might be ingrafted upon an appropriation bill. For instance, we have had gentlemen on both sides of the House arguing in favor of this legislation for the relief of fourth-class postmasters. I know, if I know anything in relation to the sentiment of this House, that a majority of the House is in favor of the very relief which has been spoken of by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MONTGOMERY], the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE], and by members on this side of the House. Yet by reason of our rule of legislation a majority of this House can not ingraft on this bill what they believe ought to be placed there.

I do not intend to go into an extended argument in relation to the merits of this claim by fourth-class postmasters. I differ from my friend from Iowa [Mr. KERR], who has just spoken. I believe there are three parties to this question of office-holding: the first is the office-holder, the second the Government, and the third the public; and the fact is that this third party, the public, has really a greater interest in the efficient management of the office than the other two parties combined.

Now, it has been urged here that the provision suggested by the gentleman from Arkansas will increase the annual expenses of the Post-Office Department $1,040,000. I say that the people have never found fault with liberal expenditures in the Post-Office Department if, as a result, they have enjoyed efficient postal service. I have never heard any fault found with any provision of legislation which tended to make the postal service more efficient, and for the reason that no other Department of the Government reaches so near to the hearthstone of every family in our country as does the Post-Office Department.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman think that increasing the appropriations and giving in this bill $60,000,000 for the service of the Department will make that service effective?

Mr. PETERS. I will answer that in this way: I am aware that the administration of the Post-Office Department is in a different position now from that which was occupied by Republican administrations. Whenever an estimate was made by a Republican administration the appropriation bills never appropriated the full amount of that estimate. The gentleman from Illinois, who has been a member of the Committee on Appropriations, knows it to have been a fact that these estimates made by a Republican administration were always cut down. But this is not the case now, nor was it the case in the Forty-ninth Congress. The Post-Office Committee, which now has charge of this appropriation bill, has been liberal, and in both the first and second sessions of the Forty-ninth Congress appropriated almost the entire amount of the estimate made by the Post-Office Department; and this bill appropriates almost the entire estimate.

A MEMBER. And the committee has added to the estimate.

Mr. PETERS. Yes, as the gentleman suggests, an addition has been made to the estimates. That of course is in relation to an item which was not perhaps called directly to the attention of the Postmaster-General.

Now, I believe in appropriating just what the Department estimates as necessary; and then I believe in holding the Department strictly accountable for furnishing efficient service. If, after a fair trial, it does not furnish efficient service, it ought to be condemned not only on this floor, but throughout the country.

Mr. BELDEN. That is just what has been done. The present service is condemned throughout the country.

Mr. STRUBLE. What does the gentleman from Kansas say in reply to that?

Mr. PETERS. I do not propose to stand up here and argue that we have had efficient service. There are too many complaints in the section of country from which I come to allow me to stand up here and in the face of my friend from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE] and my friend from New York [Mr. BELDEN] say that we have had an efficient service under the appropriations which have been made.

But I had not intended in the present argument to enter into that question at all. That has been dwelt upon by my colleague [Mr. PERKINS] perhaps with sufficient fullness. The thought I am trying to impress upon the House is this: Here is a bill which appropriates every dollar that has been asked by the Post-Office Department, and if we do not have efficient service, we shall know where the responsibility rests. Until recently the responsibility in this respect was divided. Republican administrations made certain estimates, and the Democratic Committee on Appropriations and a Democratic House refused to appropriate the full amount of those estimates. Hence the Department could come in and say, "The amount you appropriated was not sufficient." Now, the point I wish to clinch in this mattter is that in the future I do not wish to hear from the Post-Office Department or from any official of the Department any such complaint as, "We are unable to grant your reasonable request because of the lack of appropriation." In regard to this question of clerk-hire, time and again within the last few years, when we have gone to the Department with reasonable requests for clerk-hire, we have been met with the assertion that the appropriations were not sufficient.

They have said when the appropriation is exhausted they can not supply clerk-hire to postmasters in post-offices of the second class. Now, we are all acquainted with the plan which has been adopted of apportioning what was left of the appropriation. We know post-offices needing $600 have it cut down to $400. Then the Post-Office Department, and the people perhaps hold your postmasters responsible for efficient service, when the Government itself has failed to give them the necessary appropriation for the purpose. If the Government expects efficient service, of course it is necessary to give the postmasters the money which the Government itself admits is required to provide that efficient service, and I do not wish to hear anything more of that kind of complaint from the Post-Office Department hereafter on this point, because the Post-Office Committee has given to the Post-Office Department all it asked for clerk-hire and for these other purposes which are deemed necessary.

When we go to the Post-Office Department with a request from the second-class offices or from the third-class offices, a reasonable request in favor of additional clerk-hire, I wish to have that clerk-hire granted, and I do not want to be met with the statement that the appropriation is exhausted and that the clerk-hire can not be given. If there is not appropriation enough for that purpose, I wish to say the Post-Office Department itself is responsible for the deficiency. It is that Department itself which is responsible because of its failure to estimate a sufficient sum of money to carry on the postal service of the country.

I have only one word more to say in relation to these fourth-class postmasters. I presume, Mr. Chairman, that I have a larger number of fourth-class postmasters in my district than there are in any other Congressional district in the United States. I have thirty-six counties in my district, all of them agricultural counties, and occupied by a population chiefly engaged in agricultural pursuits. No one will doubt, therefore, that I have in that district, as I have stated, a larger number of fourth-class postmasters than there are in any other district in the United States.

Now, these fourth-class postmasters do not hold those offices because they want them. On the contrary, the great difficulty is, in a large number of instances in my district, at least, to get men who will take the offices. And why? Because the compensation amounts to nothing. The only way we can get men to take these offices is by assuring them that it is demanded for the convenience of their neighbors and for the good of the neighborhood in which they live.

Why, sir, I have had offices discontinued in my district and the people of the neighborhood deprived of the mail service because no one could be found who was willing to take charge of the post-office. For this reason no man will make a public thoroughfare of his house and submit to the inconvenience, even for the good of the neighborhood, by having the post-office established there.

And, sir, because there was no one to take the post-office, for that reason the post-office was discontinued, and the people were deprived of the mail facilities and conveniences which they are entitled to under the law.

I know the proposition of my friend from Arkansas does not increase the compensation of these fourth-class postmasters to any alarming extent. Twenty dollars per annum is not a sum calculated to scare any member upon this floor.

The only object of such an amendment is to give to the fourth-class postmaster a sufficient amount of money with which to keep his house cleared from the dirt necessarily incident to the administration of a post-office.

Oh, but you say, the revenue of these fourth-class post-offices will not justify anything of that kind. I say you might as well abolish these post-offices on that ground, because there are few of them that furnish any excess of revenue over receipts. That is not the ground upon which the Post-Office Department was founded. It was not intended as a money-making scheme by the Government; it was not intended by our fathers to be established as a scheme to bring money into the Treasury of the United States, but it was intended simply and solely to bring within reach of the people of the United States the great conveniences of the postal system.

As I said awhile ago, the appropriations which are made for the support of that Department are paid by the people themselves. They are not involuntary, but they are paid voluntarily and willingly by the people of the United States themselves. They furnish the money not only to carry on the Post-Office Department, but to carry on the Government itself.

I care not, therefore, whether the revenues be sufficient or not, whatever is necessary for the efficiency of the postal service should be provided. I do not care whether it will take a large sum of money or a small sum of money, I am in favor of appropriating whatever is required in excess of the revenues to make the postal service efficient.

Now, I have said about all I care to say upon this bill. I am glad that we have succeeded in getting in an appropriation to provide for rent, light, and fuel to third-class postmasters throughout the United States. I have had some ludicrous illustrations under the old system of the inequalities of that law. I had one post-office in my district where the postmaster paid out $150 in addition to the amount of his salary in order to carry on efficiently the business of his office, besides giving his own time. Why was it? It was because the rapidly increased business of the office was so unexpected, so marvelous, you may say, that the Post-Office Department was not able to keep pace with it.

I do not blame the Post-Office Department except in this: that there is too much inclination—and it is the only criticism I shall make upon the Department—there is too much inclination to measure this whole United States of ours by the business of one or two States. There does not seem to be a disposition on the part of the officials, at least some of them connected with the Post-Office Department, to take into account the wonderful, the almost marvelous growth of some portions of this country and some of the States, and add to their postal facilities in proportion to their growth as much as their increasing business and population demands. A little larger scope to the imagination, if you please, of these officials, a little broader view of business matters would give a much more efficient service in Texas, Kansas, Nebraska, and in many of the Territories.

How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes remaining.

Mr. WARNER. If the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] will permit me a remark——

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. WARNER. In the line of the observations made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] I wish to call attention to a great injustice done the city of Kansas, one of the leading cities and commercial centers of the nation. To illustrate, I find that the amount allowed the post-office in the city of Brooklyn for the last fiscal year for expenses was equal to 64 per cent. of the gross receipts of that office, while the amount allowed to the post-office in my city (the city of Kansas) was only 29 per cent. of its gross receipts.

Why this wide difference? I do not know that the amount allowed the post-office in Brooklyn is too large, but I do know that the allowance to the city of Kansas is totally inadequate to furnish the necessary clerks and letter-carriers to properly transact the business of that office. When application is made to the Post-Office Department for an additional allowance to meet the pressing demands on the office in my city, the answer received is that the appropriation has been allotted to the various offices, and we must patiently wait until the next appropriation is made. Would it not be well for the Post-Office Department in making allowances and estimates for the expenses of the various post-offices of the country to take into consideration the reasonable needs of such a growing city as the city of Kansas?

Mr. PETERS. That is a question for the executive and not the legislative department of the Government.

Mr. WARNER. That is true; but I hope through the legislative to reach the executive or administrative department, that a like injustice may not be done my city in the future.

To show the justness of my criticisms and to show that great injustice has been done my city, I submit the following table, giving the per cent. of expenses to the gross receipts:

	Per cent.		Per cent.
Kansas City	29	Detroit, Mich	52
Mobile, Ala	48	Minneapolis, Minn	37
San Francisco, Cal	41	St. Louis, Mo	43
Denver, Colo	37	St. Joseph, Mo	36
Wilmington, Del	46	Omaha, Nebr	29
Jacksonville, Fla	47	Newark, N. J	49
Atlanta, Ga	33	Albany, N. Y	58
Chicago, Ill	38	Brooklyn, N. Y	64
Indianapolis, Ind	41	Cincinnati, Ohio	39
Des Moines, Iowa	36	Philadelphia, Pa	43
Louisville, Ky	40	Providence, R. I	57
Topeka, Kans	32	Memphis, Tenn	32
Portland, Me	39	Galveston, Tex	43
Baltimore, Md	46	Richmond, Va	44
Boston, Mass	39	Milwaukee, Wis	59

Mr. PETERS. The gentleman would not claim, however, that they could be remedied by this bill.

Mr. WARNER. No. I am simply desirous of placing the matter before the committee.

Mr. PETERS. Because it is a question of administration and not of regulation.

Mr. STRUBLE. You should propound that to the Post-Office Department.

Mr. WARNER. I have done so.

Mr. DOCKERY. Perhaps it might be accounted for because of the difference in the Representatives from the two cities the gentleman compares.

Mr. WARNER. Yes; it may be that Brooklyn is represented by a Democrat, and therefore gets 64 per cent. That may be the reason, I will admit.

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not give that as a reason, but merely throw out the suggestion.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman builded better than he knew. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. DOCKERY. I believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania has six minutes remaining.

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not care to occupy further time.

Mr. BELDEN. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will yield to me, I wish to make a brief suggestion.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will yield a portion of the time.

Mr. BELDEN. The trouble, in my opinion, is in this connection, not where the gentleman is living or what city he may represent, but it is the civil-service reform of the present Administration [laughter] that makes all the trouble in the postal service; and I would like to inquire if the committee has anything to offer, or if it has any power to amend the bill so as to require that letter-carriers shall be able to read and write [laughter], or that postal clerks that distribute the mails from Chicago to New York, and who must keep track of the post-offices so as to distribute the mails without error, if they can make the appropriation so as to require the appointment of people who can read and write, and not have to discharge them and take back the old ones.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that is where the difficulty lies. I do not believe that any of them get too much salary. I do not find fault with that; but in my own city I know that for some time there has been a post-office maintained contrary to law in the same building and in the same room where liquor is sold, because if they added that post-office to the General Post-Office it would come under the provisions of the civil-service rules in regard to the employment of two clerks.

Now that is the difficulty in appropriating money for the officials who come under the civil service system. I approve of the civil-service myself, but do not like the kind they are giving us; and I should like to ingraft something on this bill if it can be done to meet the trouble by which they may change their mode of civil-service appointments in this respect.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I have simply this to state with reference to the proposed amendment increasing the compensation of postmasters of the fourth class. That body of subordinate officials of the Government numbers upwards of 52,000. It has a classification as to compensation that runs from $10 or $12, which I believe is the lowest, up to $1,000 a year.

The increase of $5 a quarter would, to my mind, be a gratuity to many and unjust to many. Twenty dollars to a man who does a work of $900 under the law would, to my mind, be a very different proposal from $20 to a man who, under the law, does work amounting to $12. A bill of that character is before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. The proposition of $20 means an increase of over a million dollars in the money cost of the service, I think in many cases unjustly applied, while in many other cases it might be justly applied.

Let that legislation come up after careful revision by the committee based on estimates by the Department. We then can have legislation upon it for the future. But to fix a sum of $20 in this bill would be simply a gift of $20 for this year.

I do not propose to suggest anything pertaining to politics on the one side or the other in the administration of this Department. I simply desire to state that the bill before the committee will receive full consideration. But the adding of a million dollars on this bill I do not think would be a measure of legislative justice.

Mr. DOCKERY. I believe that I have fifty minutes of my time remaining; but in view of the lateness of the hour and the fact that there is really no issue between us, I do not feel like trespassing upon the patience of the House to the full extent of the fifty minutes, and probably I will not do so.

So far as I have heard, no objection has been made to any item carried in this bill except the item suggested by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR]. That gentleman is the only one on either side who has objected to any item that the bill carries, but complaint has been made that the bill does not carry items that ought to find a place in it. He objects to the allowance of rent, light, and fuel to third-class postmasters on the ground that the Democratic party has pledged the country and the House to a policy of economy.

I want to say to that gentleman, if he is the real friend of economy, and I do not question that—if he desires that the policy of economy shall find expression in the legislation of our appropriation bills, he must stand with the Democratic party in demanding a reduction of taxation. I do not propose to discuss the tariff question at this time, but the gentleman's objection suggests the condition that confronts us. Nearly all of the questionable propositions before Congress, and which clamor for consideration, are the logical results of the appalling surplus in the Federal Treasury, that to-day aggregates the enormous sum of $136,000,000. Sir, you need not expect frugality in expenditure—though that criticism does not apply to this bill—neither party of this country can expect honest and economical government if this surplus is to continue to accumulate in the Federal Treasury.

Mr. KERR. Can the gentleman from Missouri claim that there is a surplus after paying our national debt of a billion and a quarter?

Mr. DOCKERY. I claim there is a surplus so long as there is no indebtedness of the United States subject to payment and so long as we have to tax the people of this country to buy Government bonds at 27 per cent. premium.

Mr. KERR. If you had bought them a year ago, you would not have had to pay any such premium.

Mr. DOCKERY. If the gentleman will consult the quotations in the New York stock market one year ago, he will see the error of that observation.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is no politics involved in this measure. This is a business bill, in which my friend from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] and my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] have a common interest with the Democratic party. What the people of both parties desire is the best possible mail service at the least possible cost; but if they have to go either to the extreme of parsimony or to the extreme of extravagance they would prefer, in my judgment, the extreme of extravagance. But there is, and can be, no necessity for trenching upon either extreme.

I want now to refer briefly to the proposition presented by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] and indorsed by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LIND] and other gentlemen on the floor. This proposition looks to an annual compensation of $20 to the 52,281 fourth-class postmasters, without any regard whatever to the business of the office or the service rendered by the postmasters, and, as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], increases the total annual salaries of that class in the sum of $1,045,620. Now, Mr. Chairman, from some investigation of this question I am forced to the conclusion that perhaps a large number of these postal employés are inadequately compensated. But a measure going to the extent of fixing the salaries of more than fifty thousand postmasters and involving a large expenditure of the people's money should, in my opinion, first receive the careful consideration of the Post-Office Committee, and that committee now have a proposition before them looking to the redress of the grievances of which this class of public servants complain.

Mr. LIND. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. LIND. I wish to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that other officers serving the United States who are paid by commissions also receive salaries? I will instance the receivers of public moneys, who get a fixed salary of $500 per annum in addition to the fees and commissions allowed by law.

Mr. DOCKERY. I believe that is so.

Mr. LIND. Now, if that is true, where is the injustice, where is the unreasonableness, as the gentleman puts it, of allowing a fourth-class postmaster a fixed salary of $20 per annum, or $5 per quarter, in addition to the commissions which he is allowed, when those commissions in the majority of instances are necessarily and absolutely inadequate, particularly when they do not exceed $12 a year?

Mr. DOCKERY. I am not familiar with the principles upon which is based the compensation allowed to receivers of public moneys, but I suppose that the $500 is intended to compensate them for a certain service which they are required to render, and that the additional compensation is contingent upon the business of the office.

Mr. LIND. Not at all. The gentleman is in error.

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman that I would not under any circumstances consent to a basis of compensation that was arbitrary, that did not carry with it the idea of paying for the service actually rendered. The gentleman of course does not intend to be unfair, but he submits a proposition which is manifestly unjust as between this class of officials. He proposes to give a postmaster whose office does a business of only $12 a year a salary of $20, while at the same time he would give a postmaster who does a business of $600 or $700 a year no greater compensation. Now, sir, I insist that whatever remuneration is allowed this class of public officers ought to be based upon the service actually rendered to the Government.

Mr. LIND. So it is.

Mr. DOCKERY. If the postmaster does not render annually more than $20 worth of service to the Government, do not pay him more; but if he renders services worth $1,000, pay him $1,000.

Mr. PETERS. I wish to say to the gentleman that the object of this $5 a quarter is to pay the officer, not for any service he may render to the Government, but for the inconvenience to which he is subjected in furnishing office-room for the business of the Government.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then it is a matter of convenience, and not a matter of salary.

Mr. PETERS. A matter of convenience to the Government.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then, sir, it is proposed to contribute more than $1,000,000 annually for the "convenience" of 52,281 office-holders. If that is the basis on which the proposition rests I shall oppose it, both as a member of the committee and in the House.

Mr. PETERS. I beg to correct the gentleman. It is not for the "convenience" of the 52,000 office-holders, but for the convenience of 60,000,000 of people who are parties in interest.

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, the whole question of "convenience" must twine and cluster around the service actually rendered by the postmaster to the Government and the people.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. If no "convenience" and no compensation is to be allowed to fourth-class postmasters for "rent, light, and fuel," why is it that we so readily give $650,000 for the relief of only 1,864 third-class postmasters who rank just a little above the others?

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not intend that my colleague on the committee or any gentleman on this floor shall put me in an attitude of opposition to any just compensation which may be due to these fourth-class postmasters. My criticism is not based upon the ground that they have no grievances; it is directed against the proposition to raise their compensation without any regard to the service they render to the Government.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Any criticism which the gentleman makes on the proposition for the relief of the fourth-class postmasters will apply with much more force and effect to the third-class postmasters to whom you make an extra allowance of $350 a year each in this bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I have had a little experience and the Democratic members have had a little experience relating in some measure to this question which our Republican friends have not had for somewhat over three years [laughter], and that is that a good many of the 50,000 fourth-class postmasters are quite anxious to get and to keep these positions, not for the sake of the $20 "convenience" suggested by the gentleman from Kansas, nor yet for the compensation received under the present law, but because of the fact that the location of the post-office is ofttimes an inducement to draw trade, and thus serve as an adjunct to the business of the postmaster.

Mr. LIND. Yes; and to draw dirt to a farmer's house.

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, I do not know how it may be in Minnesota, but within the limits of the ten counties of my Congressional district I do not now recall a single post-office located in a farmer's house. I do not say that there are none, but I do not recall one.

Mr. PETERS. In answer to the last observation of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], I will say that two-thirds of the post-offices in our country are located in farmers' houses.

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, Mr. Chairman, Missouri is an older State and better settled, perhaps, than Kansas, and I have no doubt that my friend's observation is correct. But, Mr. Chairman, I insist that whether the office be located in a farmer's house or elsewhere, the compensation of postmasters, as well as all other Federal officials, should only go to the value of the service that is actually rendered to the Government. At the suggestion of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], I desire to call attention to the present law fixing the compensation of fourth-class postmasters, which will be found on page 199 of the Postal Laws and Regulations. It is as follows:

SEC. 459. Compensation of Fourth-Class Postmasters.—That the compensation of postmasters of the fourth class shall be fixed upon the basis of the whole of the box rents collected at their offices and commissions upon the amount of canceled postage-due stamps (provided for in section 270 of the revised laws and regulations, edition of 1879 [section 557], and on postage stamps, official stamps, stamped envelopes, postal-cards, and newspaper and periodical stamps canceled on matter actually mailed at their offices, and on amounts received from waste paper, dead newspapers, printed matter, and twine sold, at the following rates, namely: On the first $50 or less per quarter, 100 per cent.; on the next $100 or less per quarter, 60 per cent.; on the next $200 or less per quarter, 50 per cent.; and on all the balance, 40 per cent., the same to be ascertained and allowed by the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department in the settlement of the accounts of such postmasters upon their sworn quarterly returns: Provided, That when the compensation of any postmaster of this class shall reach $250 for four consecutive quarters each, exclusive of commissions on money-order business, and when the returns to the Auditor for four consecutive quarters shall show him to be entitled to a compensation in excess of $250 per quarter, the Auditor shall report such fact to the Postmaster-General, who shall assign the office to its proper class, and fix the salary of the postmaster as provided by section 1 of this act: Provided further, That in no case shall there be allowed to any postmaster of this class a compensation greater than $250 in any one of the first three quarters of any fiscal year, exclusive of money-order commissions, and in the last quarter of each fiscal year there shall be allowed such further sum as he may be entitled to under the provisions of this act, not exceeding for the whole fiscal year the sum of $1,000, exclusive of money-order commissions. (Act of March 3, 1883, sec. 2, 22 Stats., 602.)

Mr. BINGHAM. With the permission of the gentleman from Missouri, I desire to state that at every fourth-class post-office where the business done in the way of cancellation of stamps amounts to $50 a year the postmaster gets every cent of that amount, the Government up to that point getting no return whatever for all its work in the transmission of the mails.

Mr. McRAE. I would like the gentleman to state whether the postmaster's pay, under that law, has any relation to the labor performed by him; whether it is not based upon the sales of stamps, which may be very small, and upon nothing else.

Mr. BINGHAM. The compensation is based upon the cancellation of stamps, not the sale.

Mr. McRAE. Well, cancellation of stamps; I correct my statement in that respect.

Mr. BINGHAM. The compensation is based upon everything which is specified in detail in the statute.

Mr. McRAE. But it is not based upon the amount of labor performed, as the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] would lead the House to suppose. The postmaster may open and distribute the mails twice a day for six days in the week, and if he only cancels 10 cents' worth of stamps his compensation is only 10 cents.

Mr. BINGHAM. That might be the fact where there are two daily mails, but in many places that is not the case.

Mr. McRAE. And in many places it is.

Mr. BINGHAM. Up to $50 a postmaster of the fourth class receives compensation equal to the face value of all stamps canceled by him.

Mr. McRAE. But the compensation is not in proportion to the work performed by the officer.

Mr. BINGHAM. He gets everything up to that amount.

Mr. DOCKERY. The cancellation of the stamps is the gauge by which the labor of the postmaster is determined.

Mr. McRAE. Is that a fair gauge?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly it is, just as in the third-class offices the sale of stamps is the gauge by which the labor and compensation are there determined.

Mr. TAULBEE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Missouri whether or not it is a fact that the principal part of the labor of fourth-class postmasters, especially when the office is a distributing office, consists in the separation of mail matter which is in the first instance deposited at other offices and the stamps canceled there?

Mr. DOCKERY. I am obliged to the gentleman for that suggestion, because it directs my attention to one provision of this bill which I wish to notice. A complaint, which in my opinion has every element of justice, comes from a great many fourth-class offices that have during the last fiscal year done "separating business," that is, business not originating at their own offices, but in transit. This bill relieves that complaint by making an appropriation of $550,000 in excess of the appropriation of last year, which will enable the Postmaster-General to furnish relief to all these fourth-class postmasters who do "separating business."

Mr. TAULBEE. I have not carefully examined that provision of the bill, but I wish to know whether the matter of compensation for clerk-hire in distributing or separating mail is left discretionary with the Post-Office Department, or is it made the duty of the Postmaster-General to see that proper compensation is paid at these separating-offices?

Mr. DOCKERY. It is left discretionary, as it always has been. To change the method which has obtained in the Department for years past in that respect would of course require some new provision of law. And right there, in my opinion, there is necessary a reform contemplated by another bill which has been reported by the Post-Office Committee, and will be reached in due time.

Mr. TAULBEE. Now, if the gentleman will allow me one observation in reference to these fourth-class postmasters, I shall not interrupt him further. The difficulty in the rural offices of the district which I represent is in inducing persons to hold those offices. Men who are asked to accept them say that the office involves a responsibility which they do not wish to assume for the meager compensation allowed; and in my district there have been as many as thirty offices at one time which no one could be found to accept, and for which the Post-Office Department was unable to find persons who would take the positions, the complaint being the insufficiency of the compensation. In consequence of the inability to induce men to accept the appointments many of the offices have been discontinued; and at many places in my district to my personal knowledge the citizens of the neighborhood pay the postmaster a regular compensation for the services he performs.

Mr. DOCKERY. That may be true——

Mr. TAULBEE. Of course it is true.

Mr. DOCKERY. No question as to that. But wherever offices have been discontinued on that account you will probably find that in every instance the community is so sparsely settled that the business of the office is necessarily limited.

Mr. LIND. I wish to ask one question, and I will make it very brief. Has it ever come to the knowledge of the gentleman from Missouri that one of the principal reasons why the incumbents of these fourth-class country offices have so little remuneration is that the farmers as a rule mail their letters in the towns and villages to which their business frequently calls them, and thus the local postmaster is prevented from making anything out of the cancellation of the stamps? In view of this practice, which can not be prohibited by law, I say that these postmasters ought to receive some compensation independent of the cancellation of stamps. At present in many cases they distribute the mails for a community, but get no benefit from the cancellation of the stamps on the letters which those people mail.

Mr. DOCKERY. I have no doubt that there is force and significance in the observation of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LIND]; but, as a result of the limited investigation I have been able to make on this question, I will state that one of the principal reasons for complaint is the fact that the fourth-class postmasters are compensated on the basis of the face value of the stamps they cancel——

Mr. LIND. And in many cases they do not get a chance to cancel the stamps.

Mr. DOCKERY. They get a certain per cent. of the value of the canceled stamps, and the reduction of postage from 3 to 2 cents has of course operated to decrease their compensation. But I must hasten on, and in concluding my observations on this point will simply add that the Post-Office Committee, in connection with the Post-Office Department, are now endeavoring to mature some legislation that will afford relief to this very worthy class of Government employés.

Mr. Chairman, I regretted to hear the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS], in the discussion of this bill, make observations political in their bias and tendency, and, I may add, sectional in their nature. I sincerely regret these observations, because, in my opinion, they do injustice both to the gentleman's head and to his heart. The postal laws of the United States are uniform in their operation, and but very little discretion is allowed to any officer of the Post-Office Department. In the discriminations and distinctions which the gentleman sought to find he must have included clerk-hire, for which about $6,000,000 is appropriated in this bill; and this is the only item of any moment in this bill, carrying $60,000,000, which permits discretion to any officer of the Department. When the gentleman from Kansas made his statements he must have known that the officer who now disburses the appropriation for clerk-hire is one of the hold-over Republican clerks of the last administration.

A MEMBER. Turn him out! [Laughter.]

Mr. DOCKERY. There are no objections on my part. This fact also suggests an error in the views of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELDEN]. He seemed to think that the only trouble connected with the administration of the Post-Office Department arises from the peculiar sort of civil-service reform now in vogue. I admire the newborn zeal of the Republican party in behalf of civil-service reform, and have only to regret that affection so touchingly tender should have not been manifested prior to the 4th of March, 1885.

But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELDEN] further insisted that the great need of the postal service in New York was the appointment of letter-carriers, and other employés, who could "read and write." I do not desire to embarrass the postal service of New York with any such regulation as that. [Laughter.] Of course there would be no trouble from such a provision as applicable to Missouri, Illinois, Kansas, or the Western States generally; but I do not ask any iron-clad restriction that would necessarily embarrass the New York postal service, and especially the district from which the gentleman hails. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to be driven into a discussion of "civil service reform" in this connection, and will leave that question with the single observation that I did not favor the civil service law when it was enacted under Republican rule, for the reason that I think any administration of the Government ought to be in the hands of its friends. If that position is obnoxious, as suggested by the remarks of the gentleman from Vermont, in his proposition to elect postmasters, then, gentlemen, make the most of it. I believe the party in power should be responsible to the people, and have the privilege of selecting its own agents to conduct the affairs of the Government.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DOCKERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BINGHAM. In view of the gentleman's utterances, and to show that he is in perfect accord with his party, I desire to state that every first, second, and third class postmaster appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, has been changed with the exception of less than two hundred; and of the fifty-two odd thousand fourth-class postmasters in the United States, forty-five thousand have been changed during the present Administration.

Mr. DOCKERY. I am delighted to hear the statement of the gentleman, but can not yield now for a speech.

Mr. BINGHAM. I simply desired to state that the present Administration (since the gentleman has seen proper to discuss politics) is thoroughly in accord with the sentiments he has just expressed.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman will bear me witness that I did not begin the discussion of politics. I only responded to remarks made by other gentlemen. I want to say that the gentleman from Pennsylvania can not force me into any position of seeming antagonism to the Administration. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman is perfectly consistent with his utterances, I have no doubt.

Mr. DOCKERY. Our friends are quite right, as suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] in a recent debate. Get your laugh in now; but wait until November comes and you will find all the wings of the Democratic party "flapping together," and we will re-elect Grover Cleveland President of the United States by an overwhelming majority. [Applause.]

Mr. KERR. And on his civil-service platform, too?

Mr. DOCKERY. Oh, I suppose so. [Laughter on the Republican side.] There will be no trouble about that, gentlemen, and you can make yourselves perfectly content.

But the gentleman from Pennsylvania well knows that in the conduct of the mail service, especially the railway postal service—and if I am not stating the proposition correctly I invite him to challenge the statement here and now—it has been essentially a non-partisan service.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is true; but——

Mr. DOCKERY. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for confirming my statement.

Mr. BINGHAM. But not with reference to the subordinate officials of the Department. I was talking to the gentleman in response to his suggestion about that particular branch of the service, indicated by postmasters of the class I have named. I have invited his attention to the number of postmasters that have been removed of the various classes. If, however, the gentleman wants to go into the other question of the subordinate officials of the Department, I am perfectly willing and ready to meet him now or at any other time.

Mr. DOCKERY. I only wanted the gentleman to indorse my statement, and I hardly think it necessary to pursue the subject further. I will not do so except to state that the intent, spirit, and purpose which bristles in the observations of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] are not, in my judgment, warranted by anything which has occurred in the management of the Post-Office Department. I assert that there has been no discrimination whatever against the State of Kansas in favor of Nebraska.

Mr. BINGHAM rose.

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, the gentleman has made his statement, and I beg to be allowed to proceed.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. DOCKERY. One at a time. I can not yield now. I repeat, there has been no discrimination whatever against Kansas. There have been complaints, some of them possibly well founded, because that young State is striding forward in the march of progress, and is destined to become one of the greatest States of the Union; and it is only to be expected, and in fact inevitable, that there should be some complaints because of the rapid and unprecedented growth of that section of country.

But when the gentleman intimates that this Administration has been sectional in its conduct of the Post-Office Department and has discriminated in the least against that State or against any State, he does not, in my opinion, do justice either to his great ability or to the generous, manly impulses which usually control his action.

The administration of the Post-Office Department has been subjected to one criticism by the other side, and that I will not speak of further than simply to give it a passing notice. It has been claimed that the late Postmaster-General, Mr. Vilas, has gone to the extreme of parsimony in the conduct of the Department. But, so far as I am advised, I do not believe that the statement has any foundation whatever in fact.

Mr. PERKINS. I gave the figures to substantiate what I said.

Mr. DOCKERY. But the gentleman can not afford to be unfair in the presentation of figures, or in any wise misstate the position of his opponents, or seek to put them in an attitude they do not properly occupy.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman now allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. I simply confined my first inquiry to postmasters appointed by the President. The gentleman from Missouri has called attention to the wise administation by that Department of the postal-car clerk system. I wish to impress upon the gentleman that he knows that is a classified service running from $800 to $1,400 per annum; and I make this response to him with reference to that, that every man without a single exception on the probationary roll of that service and every man receiving the $800 compensation which comes to him after six months' service has been changed by the Post-Office Department; every man in the lowest grade, without an exception, has been changed; only those men have been retained who have had such experience that any administration without regard to partisanship could not and would not change that portion of the force; but where they dared to do so they have changed the force.

Mr. DOCKERY. I am sorry to interrupt the gentleman from Pennsylvania when he is paying so eloquent a tribute to the civil-service reform policy of the Administration, but I only yielded for a question, not a speech.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman, I presume, did not hear my last words, that they had only refrained from changing where they did not dare to change.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, let me make this declaration in reply to the gentleman, not only as applying to the postal Department, but as applying to all others, that there is no duty discharged by any citizen of this Republic that some other citizen can not discharge equally as well. [Applause.]

Mr. BINGHAM. After experience he would become qualified.

Mr. DOCKERY. We will get the experience; you give us the opportunity. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I regret that this debate has drifted away from the real question presented to the House for consideration, and that is the business proposition of carrying the mails in the speediest and most satisfactory manner to our people. In this connection I ask to indorse the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] as it relates to the compensation now paid to the railroads of the country, and the necessity for its revision. I agree with him fully, and I believe every member of the Post-Office Committee agrees with him, that some readjustment of the mail pay to railroads should be made and made speedily in the interest of both the people and of the Government.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I believe I have discussed all the propositions that have been presented by the various gentlemen who have preceded me. The Post-Office Committee have increased the appropriation for the ensuing fiscal year $4,341,190.59. They recommend this additional sum because the service requires it. The country is growing and developing with marvelous rapidity. New lines of railway are being projected, and especially in the West and South, despite some adverse influences, are there almost everywhere evidences of thrift and enterprise.

To keep pace with this spirit of enterprise we are compelled to increase the appropriations so as to send the mails to our people. I agree with what the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] has said. The committee have given the Post-Office Department every dollar they have asked, and I concur in the proposition of the gentleman, that the House and the country have now a right to hold that Department to a proper and efficient administration of the service. And if they do not give it, then the Republican party will have the right to complain; but, sir, they are of such a complaining nature I would not have it understood that all the complaints they make are well founded. I am inclined to think that after November their complaining will intensify, and that they will, perhaps, not be prepared to render us full justice.

Mr. PETERS. We have been long suffering thus far under your administration.

Mr. DOCKERY. I know you have been "suffering" ever since the 4th of March, 1885 [laughter], and there has been a suffering and complaining spirit all along the line of the Republican party, and according to present indications there is no prospect that that suffering is to cease at an early date.

Mr. PETERS. If the gentleman from Missouri had to make his living by prophecy, it occurs to me he would make a mighty poor living.

Mr. DOCKERY. I will put my gifts in that direction against those of the gentleman from Kansas at any time.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twelve minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. DOCKERY. I yield the twelve minutes remaining to the chairman of the committee [Mr. BLOUNT].

Mr. BLOUNT. There have been some criticisms made with reference to the mail service in the Northwest and West, especially in Kansas and Nebraska. There have always been, and always will be, complaints about the mail service in all the States of this Union under any administration. Such complaints are always made by the people without regard to parties. The truth is the records of the Department show that while there are complaints at this time of the service in the State of Kansas—I select that State simply because gentlemen representing it on this floor have alluded to it—the fact, I say, is that while there are complaints of the service in that State, the complaints are not so great as they have been at other times; not so great as they have been during a Republican administration of the Post Office.

Those complaints were made by Republicans and by Republican newspapers, just as at this time there are complaints made in some sections of the country by Democrats and by Democratic newspapers. The fact is, the public are sensitive in reference to the mail service, and their complaints we shall always have with us.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] claims that there has been undue advantage given to the South over the section of the country in which he lives. Upon that point I shall ask to have inserted in the RECORD the answer of the Postmaster-General to those complaints. I do not care to take the time to have it read now; but, as the question has been raised in this discussion, I shall add it as a supplement to my remarks.

Furthermore, the gentleman says, referring to the special facility fund, which commences at Springfield and goes down along the Atlantic coast to Tampa with a view of connecting into Cuba, and which was suggested by the Northeastern section of the country—the gentleman says that most of that fund is expended in the South.

I wish to call his attention to page 395 of the last report of the Postmaster-General in reference to the fast mail from Pittsburgh to Kansas City. While the expenditure there was not designated as a "special facility fund," there was a massing of the mails and a reweighing of them, which resulted in an increased outlay on the part of the Government to the amount of $250,000—a sum a good deal larger than this fund which the gentleman claims has gone principally to the South and which was designed to facilitate the transmission of the mails through that section of the country, and has done so.

Mr. PERKINS. I wish to ask the gentleman whether any extra compensation was given for the carrying of that mail to Kansas City?

Mr. BLOUNT. Why, certainly. Under the law the reweighing does not necessarily take place more than once every four years; but the Postmaster-General, in view of a contract to give an increased speed and greater facilities, agreed that those mails should be massed and reweighed, and the result was to take out of the Treasury $250,000 extra for that service, making a deficiency this year.

Mr. PERKINS. Does not the Postmaster-General show in his last annual report that no extra compensation is paid for the carrying of the fast mails to Kansas City?

Mr. BLOUNT. No, sir. On the contrary he shows that extra compensation was paid in the way I have stated.

Mr. PERKINS. The mail was carried; but, if I recollect right, he says explicitly that no extra compensation was paid for the service.

Mr. BLOUNT. Well, I have referred the gentleman to page 395 of the report, showing the contract that was made, and the gentleman can examine it at his leisure.

Mr. Chairman, that is all I desire to say, and if there is no objection I now ask that the general debate be considered as concluded.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The following is the letter of the Postmaster-General referred to in Mr. BLOUNT's remarks:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., March —, 1888.

SIR: I have received the following resolution adopted by the House of Representatives on the 10th of February, ultimo:

"Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be directed to inquire into and inform the House of Representatives of the cause and foundation of the grievances complained of in the subjoined editorial, taken from the Capital, a daily paper published at Topeka, Kans., under date of January 11, 1888, and also to inform the House whether the alleged complaint prevailing in the West against the present unsatisfactory mail service results from the appointment of inexperienced and incapable employés, or from inadequate and insufficient appropriations to meet the wants of the Post-Office Department and the needs of the people, or whether it results from other causes, and if so, what; and also, that the Postmaster-General be directed to further inquire and inform the House of Representatives what, if any, improvements or extensions have been made in the mail service of the West during the last three years.

"THE MAIL SERVICE OF KANSAS.

"Never at any time in the history of Kansas has there been in the United States mail service such an utter disregard of the rights of the people as at this time. Notwithstanding the great increase in population, the stupid attempt on the part of the Administration to make a record for economy has cut down the clerical force necessary to properly distribute the mails at large offices and in the mail trains, and it is consequently too small to do the work. Tons of mail matter pass through Kansas on the trains westward that can not be disposed of by the force allowed by the Post-Office Department. The result is that it is carried past the towns where it belongs and brought back after two or three days' absence in Colorado and New Mexico. It is not the fault of the railway clerks, because the Department asks of them a task that it is not possible for them to perform.

"The people of Kansas have been patient and the press has been lenient over this Democratic folly. Mails going west are so heavy that men working to the extent of their strength, doing more than double duty, can not handle them. Appeals to the Department at Washington for adequate help to take care of this important public service are unheeded. The railway mail service through Kansas has become criminally neglectful, and it is time this attempt of the Democratic party to make capital by a show of false economy should be brought to the attention of Congress. In reply to continued appeals for the Department to send a man to examine the railway mail service in Kansas an agent came, and overlooking the tons of mail that could not be distributed in time to be thrown off at the towns where it belonged he succeeded in having two or three clerks fined for not having the regulation gold-lace band on their cans, and thus civil-service reform was indorsed and the record of the party for economy maintained."

In compliance with said resolution, I respectfully report to the House of Representatives that the subject upon which inquiry and information are directed has received my careful consideration.

The alleged "grievance" referred to in the resolution is that—

"Notwithstanding the great increase in population, the stupid attempt on the part of the Administration to make a record for economy has cut down the clerical force necessary to properly distribute the mails at large offices and in the mail trains, and it is consequently too small to do the work; [that] tons of mail matter pass through Kansas on the trains westward that can not be disposed of by the force allowed by the Post-Office Department. The result is that it is carried past the towns where it belongs, and brought back after two or three days' absence in Colorado or New Mexico."

KANSAS.

It is alleged that "the railway mail service through Kansas has become criminally neglectful," and that appeals to the Department are unheeded.

Careful inquiry and close examination of the complaints made from time to time to the Department, or through the several divisions of the railway mail service, as to the service in Kansas, and generally in the region west of the Mississippi, fail to disclose any tenable ground for the complaint quoted in the resolution. In no section of the country embraced in the system of the railway mail service has there been, during the past three years, more prompt and liberal response on the part of the Department to the needs of the people in respect of mail service.

On the 30th of June, 1885, there were 121,032 miles of railroad covered by the railway mail service. June 30, 1886, this mileage had increased to 123,355; June 30, 1887, to 130,949, and on the 31st of January, 1888, to over 136,207 miles; an increase since June 30, 1885, of 15,175 miles. Of this increase during the year ended June 30, 1886, 206 miles were added in Kansas. During the year ended June 30, 1887, Kansas received 1,353.06 miles of new railway mail service; and since that date up to January 31, 1888, 1,350.66.

The total increase in Kansas alone since June 30, 1885, has been 2,949.72 miles, or 19.44 per cent. of the increase of the entire country, and of this, 2,753.72 miles have been added in the last nineteen months.

The establishment of so large an amount of new service over new railroads has, of course, rendered necessary the appointment and assignment to duty thereon of a large number of railway postal clerks or their transfer from other lines, or, in many instances, the extension of runs of those previously employed over the new road added to the service.

The number of railway postal clerks employed in the entire service June 30, 1885, was 4,387. The number so employed June 30, 1886, was 4,573; June 30, 1887, 4,851, which had risen on the 31st January, 1888, to 4,988, making a total increase since June 30, 1885, of 601.

Of the whole increase of 601 in the entire country, 200 clerks have been added to the force employed in the seventh division, in which Kansas is situated, since June 30, 1885.

Practically one-third of the additional clerks whose employment has been required by the railway development of the country in the past thirty-one months have been assigned to duty in the division of the railway mail service which embraces Missouri, Kansas, Arkansas, Texas, Colorado, New Mexico, and the Indian Territory.

In the establishment of so much new service, involving as it does new connections, changes of schedule, rearrangement of mail routes, and to a considerable extent new schemes for distribution, the establishment of requisite mail service, and the necessary employment of numerous clerks without previous service, it would be unexampled in human experience if some errors did not occur resulting in occasional delays of specific articles of mail matter, or their miscarriage. It is due to the men engaged in this laborious service to state that there is no warrant for the charge that there is derangement, demoralization, or deterioration of the service, or any part of it, resulting from incompetence or inexperience on their part. The complaints made to the Department and to the division headquarters of the railway mail service are, moreover, less frequent than formerly, and are steadily diminishing in number and frequency. Greater accuracy and higher efficiency is the continuous record from March 4, 1885.

The resolution requires information as to whether the alleged complaints, referred to therein, "result from the appointment of inexperienced and incapable employés."

INEXPERIENCED EMPLOYÉS.

In response to this branch of the inquiry, I respectfully submit that in no instance where the specific complaint has been brought to the attention of the Department from the western divisions of the railway mail service, has incompetency or inexperience of railway postal clerks or clerks in post-offices caused any embarrassment to the service or impairment of its general efficiency.

The results of the tests, by which the efficiency of clerks in the railway mail service have been for some years tried and their competency proved, present a very favorable exhibit for the efficiency of the present service.

The following table gives the average percentage in correctness in case examinations of railway postal clerks for the past six fiscal years:

Year ended June 30—	Permanent clerks.	Probationers.
	Per cent.	Per cent.
1882	77.05	80.49
1883	87.46	89.37
1884	78.19	81.44
1885	82.23	83.11
1886	81.61	82.68
1887	87.50	89.34

These examinations are thorough tests of fitness of a clerk for the discharge of his duty, as they fully measure his knowledge, the quickness and accuracy of his memory and accuracy of rapid distribution of mail matter so as to forward or dispatch it by the most direct or expeditious route to its destination. They are conducted by the same excellent method adopted prior to 1885, and the results computed and arrived at in the same manner and on the same basis, so that the examinations are accurate and infallible comparative tests of efficiency.

By these it is demonstrated that there is not only a steady improvement in the accuracy and competency of the permanent appointees, but that the probationers or new appointees for the past three years have been of a high order of efficiency and passed a better examination at the expiration of their probationary period by a very considerable percentage than is recorded for the like results in the three years previous to June 30, 1884.

Inquiry as to the statistics for the sixth and seventh divisions (embracing the Western and Northwestern section of the country) discloses that the railway postal clerks in these divisions have not fallen behind, but kept fully abreast of the general average, and that their percentage of correct work, both as to permanent and probationary clerks, is over 10 per cent. above the general average of the three years ended June 30, 1884. This is shown by the following tables compiled from official reports:

When it is considered that the service in the region embraced in these divisions has undergone almost constant change; that new routes have been constantly opening or extending; that new, rival, and competing roads have in many cases confused and embarrassed the service by their refusal to make proper connections—and to this cause alone is attributable most of the complaint against the railway mail service, although entirely beyond the departmental control—and that the clerks have been constantly required to adapt their work to new and shifting conditions, their record for correctness and efficiency becomes quite remarkable. Their service, as well in bulk and volume of mail matter as in the intricacy and multiplication of routes, has become much more difficult, demanding a far higher degree of knowledge, skill, and activity.

THE ALLEGED CUTTING DOWN OF CLERICAL FORCE IN KANSAS POST-OFFICES.

This inquiry involves the sufficiency of allowances for the clerical force in post-offices.

Full general information upon this subject, and an exhaustive discussion of the faults of the present system of making allowances, may be found in the report of the Postmaster-General for 1887, the consideration of which I earnestly commend to Congress.

From the following compilation it will be seen that the principal or largest post-offices of Kansas have been generously dealt with in the matter of allowances for clerk-hire, as compared with others, in the apportionment of the appropriation for that branch of the service.

From this table it appears that the allowances for clerk-hire in Kansas have not been "cut down," but for the most part largely increased; and the cause for complaint on this score, like those upon the others named in the article quoted in the resolution, falls with them.

In passing, I may say on the general subject of allowances for the expenses of post-offices that the unexampled increase and the continuing increase of business prosperity of the country during the past three years, which has shown itself in almost phenomenal demonstration in parts of the country, has exceeded the limit of any estimate by the Congress or by the Department, based as such estimates of increase have been on the previous history of the country in respect of this subject. There is undoubted need of largely-increased allowances at such places, but the want of power and of means to meet it ought not to be the subject of criticism.

The failure to promptly move for a remedy in cases that are without precedent and which could not have been foreseen in the light of experience would be blameworthy; but the charge of such neglect can not justly rest upon this Department. Action upon the earnest and repeated recommendations of my predecessors, and notably those of my immediate predecessor, would have lessened if it had not entirely prevented even such evils. But finding them existing the Department has promptly given such relief as was within its resources, and urgently called for the further means which the emergency demanded and demands.

I shall have the honor to submit some further recommendations to the House on this suject in another form and in another connection.

TONS OF MAIL MATTER NOT HANDLED.

The statement is made that—

"Tons of mail pass through Kansas on the trains westward that can not be disposed of by the force allowed by the Post-Office Department, the result being that it is carried by where it belongs and brought back after two or three days' absence in Colorado and Mexico. Mails going west are so heavy that men working to the extent of their strength, doing more than double duty, can not handle them."

A careful examination of the trip reports of the clerks in the seventh division for the months of October, November, and December, 1887, and January and February, 1888, shows that this statement is without foundation. No unworked Kansas mails were taken into Colorado or New Mexico during the months stated, and these being the heaviest months in the year, the assertion can safely be made that the charge is unwarranted. Owing to the severity of the winter, which was quite beyond the control of the Department, connections both at St. Louis and Kansas City have frequently been missed, the result being that clerks on the next outgoing trains had double mail connections, and occasionally in those cases some mail for the towns within 75 or 100 miles of the head of a run have been carried by and returned by next train.

The records of the Kansas City and Pueblo railway post-office day line for the months of December and January show that on six days during the former month, i. e., on the 1st, 16th, 18th, 22d, 23d, and 24th, some paper mail was carried into Dodge City, Kans., and returned by next train, and on December 23 the night line on the same route carried by 29 sacks of newspapers. On January 22 the day line took in 10 sacks of unworked newspapers, and these are the only Kansas papers on this, the heaviest route in the State, which have been carried as far west as Dodge City, between October 1 and February 27, 1888. It may also be stated that during the early part of January, and before the introduction of this resolution, the fact that this unworked mail was carried so far west had been brought to the attention of the Department and steps taken to remedy it by having the clerks put to work in the car at Kansas City three hours before departure of the train; and since this change has gone into effect no mails have been carried by, even where double connections had to be met.

The records of the Department show that this question of double connections had always caused more or less disturbance to the mails, but owing to steps which have been within the last year taken to provide double crews for double connections, the disturbance has greatly decreased.

UNHEEDED APPEALS.

"Appeals to the Department at Washington for adequate help to take care of this important service are unheeded."

This statement is without foundation. Every call for additional help in any part of the service has been promptly investigated, and additional clerks supplied wherever necessary. At no time since the inception of the service, as shown by the records of this Department, have calls for clerical force been as promptly and fully met as during the past year.

FORMER COMPLAINTS FROM THE SAME SOURCES.

By the terms of the resolution I am directed to inquire as to the cause and foundation of the grievances, etc., contained in the article appended thereto.

In the absence of specific complaint to the Department, or to its officials charged with the investigation of amendment of defects in the railway mail service, except in a few instances, and in the course of inquiry, I have consulted the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, upon which a few complaint have lately been spread.

In the RECORD of January 31 last the following appears:

"KANSAS CITY, MO., January 25, 1888.

"DEAR SIR: Is it possible to bring to bear such pressure, by means of a Senate committee on investigation of Western mail service in Missouri and Kansas, as will rectify the present demoralized condition of said service?

"Our relations to this service are such that we suffer more, perhaps, than any other line of business and know more of its delinquencies than those engaged in other vocations.

"I can say, after eighteen years' continuous labor in this one office, with full facilities for learning as to general efficiency of the mail service, that it was never so bad nor so badly administered as during the past year, and that the tendency at this time is toward a down grade. Can you give this attention and bring it before the people in such manner as to lead to a reform?

"Very respectfully,

"J. A. MANN,

"Secretary and Business Manager Kansas City Journal.

"Hon. P. B. PLUMB,
"Washington, D. C."

Complaints from this source, as appear from the files of the Department, were quite frequent in times past.

On the 28th of August, 1882, the same person wrote as follows:

"KANSAS CITY, MO., August 28, 1882.

"Mr. R. W. CAMP,
"Chief Head Clerk, R. M. S., Kansas City:

"'And can these things be, and not overcome us like a summer cloud?'

"Butler, Austin, Warrensburgh, Pleasant Hill packages for news-dealers all lost on the 24th and 25th August.

"They left this office in time for the mails; were delivered at the Kansas City post-office promptly.

"You will extend to the United States mail service our unbounded thanks that they did not lose the whole d——d mail on that day.

"Respectfully,

"JOURNAL COMPANY,
"J. A. MANN, Secretary."

It appears that these and numerous similar complaints from the same writer did not produce satisfactory results, and that he had ceased to be grateful for a service that did not lose his entire mail, and in the issue of the Kansas City Journal of September 13, 1882, the following appeared:

"Had the 'star-route' trials included investigation of postal matters in this region, no one connected with that department of the Government service in Missouri or Kansas would have been convicted of 'expediting' the mails, whatever other delinquency might have been unearthed. From all quarters come complaints of such gross mistakes, such incompetency, that public protest can no longer be avoided.

"Sample instances can be given like the following: Twelve days elapsed between the day of postmark on a letter mailed within 85 miles of Kansas City, and plainly addressed, before it is delivered to its destination here. Whole packages go wandering about from day to day off their proper routes, yet no penalty or disability attaches to the delinquents. Indeed, the delinquents are carefully never found. A package of Journals is placed in the Kansas City post-office each morning addressed to a news-dealer, Lathrop, Mo., in ample time for the early mail. Here is the record for three consecutive days: That of September 7, received at Lathrop on morning of the 8th, and were marked, 'Missent.' "Package of the 8th in some way arrived at Lathrop on the 9th in the evening. This had been meandering about the country and was returned, marked 'Carried by.' Package to same address of the 9th was carried past its destination and returned same night, but no marks of delinquency on this, for the reason, presumably, that getting to its destination only twelve hours late, it was thought prompt enough to meet the wants of the most exacting. On a late occasion the whole of our mails for the line of the Missouri Pacific Railroad and tributaries were missent, as confessed by the post-office officials, but to heal the wound thus given we were assured that the Times mail was scattered in like manner.

"Upon certain lines like the Hannibal and St. Joseph, complaints of single papers and packages, especially of the weekly journal, are so frequent that we can not refer to half the cases. These weekly journals are invariably in the Kansas City post-office on Wednesday, yet often reach points but 50 or 100 miles from Kansas City on Friday or even on Saturday.

"So far as known, though dozens of these complaints have been referred to those having charge of mail matters in the past few months, not one case of discipline has eventuated.

"There should be some remedy and some indemnity. The Journal within a week lost a paying daily subscriber of four years' standing because he could no longer get his paper with either promptness or regularity. Another within a few days reported that he got but four papers out of seven the week previous. The complaints, we take it, are true representatives of the facts as they are, but in the face of it all invariably it results in 'nobody to blame.'

"Publishers usually fear to make any exposure lest in the slam-bang methods of handling their mails revenge be taken, parcels burst, and every trivial advantage be taken of a moment's lateness, slight indistinctness of an address, to say nothing of intentional abusos of their matter. There are many ways in which a complaining publisher can be placed at a disadvantage and the offender not be technically amenable.

"Here is the occasion for reform, and that reform will be best attained by a more careful supervision on the part of superintending officials, the placing a more strictly personal responsibility on employés, and a penalty of suspension or dismissal for well-authenticated cases of carelessness or inefficiency."

On the 19th of October, 1882, the same writer still further criticises the service:

"KANSAS CITY, MO., October 19, 1882.

"Col. E. W. WARFIELD,
"Superintendent Seventh Division Railway Mail Service:

"The inclosed postal of F. P. Morlan, postmaster, Dayton, Cass County, Missouri, refers to a fact from which we are made to suffer continually.

"The papers to which he refers is the Weekly Journal. Now, that edition of our paper is in the Kansas City post-office every week with rare exception by 2 p. m. Wednesdays. Seldom do they get it into the mails until Thursday evening and oftener Friday morning. There is an inefficiency about getting this weekly mail out of this city. They assume that it don't make any difference about when a weekly goes out; it frequently lays in the Kansas City post-office eighteen to thirty-six hours.

"One pretext is that they have not force enough to work the Journal and Times weeklies received on Wednesdays and in time to go out on Thursday morning's mails, so take their time to it, and the consequence is that the weeklies of both offices go out Friday mornings, or about thirty hours after being received at the Kansas City post-office.

"Do you think such a state of affairs creditable to a first-class office?

"Respectfully,

"JOURNAL COMPANY.
"J. A. MANN, Secretary."

Later, on the 5th of November, 1882, the business manager of this same Journal sarcastically comments upon the management of the service in these words:

"KANSAS CITY, MO., November 5, 1882.

"Col. E. W. WARFIELD,
"Superintendent Seventh Division, R. M. S., St. Louis, Mo.:

"Your report and that of all subordinates for 30th November is remarkably clever, stupendously so. You can reach a most definite conclusion in reference to a matter of which we were, from an accident, painfully aware at the time. If you could be half as expert in finding out why all that part of our mails on the next day—when we were on time—including the entire lists for subscribers and dealers west of Harrisonville on the Missouri Pacific, including such points as Paola, Ottawa, Burlington, Emporia. All were missed, and from that day to this have missed about every other day.

"There is a nut for you to crack, and we may say your report is anxiously looked for. Here's a chance to do some work that will be of value.

"Respectfully,

"JOURNAL COMPANY,
"J. A. MANN, Secretary."

Again, on the 7th December, 1882, he again found it necessary to make public complaint, as follows:

"The St. Joseph Gazette complains that the Kansas City papers quite often do not reach there until they are twenty-four hours old. We can return the compliment. Only yesterday the St. Joseph papers were delivered to us thirty hours after their publication. Of course, there is not excuse for this save the carelessness or inefficiency of the men who handle the mail on the cars. They often carry papers and letters past their destination and deliver them on their return trip. If there is too much mail matter for one agent to handle, the Department should furnish an assistant. If there is only work for one, and the agent fails to perform his duty, he should be dismissed. That is all there is to it. It is the people who pay for mail service, and they are entitled to prompt service."

Still failing to secure as efficient service as he deemed desirable, the same journal of the 27th February, 1883, contained the following editorial, from which it appears, according to this authority, that the railway-mail service had then degenerated into a nuisance:

"'The mail service in the matter of the delivery of the Kansas City dailies in this city is a double-distilled nuisance. More disappointment, and consequent profanity, is directly chargeable to the slip-shod manner in which these dailies are not delivered here than to all other irritating influences combined. In the first place with the laudable purpose of giving us the advantage of the earlier time schedule of train arrivals on the Missouri Pacific, the chief postal clerk arranged to send the Kansas City dailies over that route, but after some months of vexation and bother we have failed to perceive any improvement. In the first place a good portion of the time the Missouri Pacific train is late, sometimes not arriving until after the Santa Fé express, and quite as frequently the packages of papers are non est when it does get in. And not infrequently neither road brings the packages, as witness yesterday, when the Kansas City papers failed to come at all. Nobody seems to know who or what is to blame, and we would gently suggest to the newspaper managers at Kawsmouth the propriety of a thorough investigation.'

"'The Kansas City dailies failed to arrive on the Missouri Pacific yesterday. Newsmen are seriously considering the policy of discontinuing the purchase of these papers, as under present circumstances they generally remain on their hands. A little bit of business enterprise manifested on the part of the management at Kansas City, it seems to us, might easily regulate this matter. Our people are not desperately anxious to pay for old back numbers of Kawsmouth journals.'

"We reluctantly republish the above article taken from the editorial columns of the Ottawa (Kans.) Republican. Every effort that the managers of the newspapers at Kansas City could possibly exert has been put forth to secure to our patrons a prompt, faithful, and regular service of the Kansas City papers at all the points lying along the Missouri Pacific Railroad, trains over which leave this city at 4.15 a. m. We have appealed to the chief clerk of the mail service, and he has devoted much time and pains to remedy this evil, but without much success. We are told that when the train by accident gets off late from Kansas City the train from Holden, which crosses this early train at Harrisonville, pulls out even when the Kansas City train is in sight, leaving all the mails for Osawatomie, Ottawa, and the towns along the line behind for a day.

"We have aided in having an application filed with the chief officer of the Missouri Pacific Railroad Company in St. Louis, setting forth our trials and delays and asking aid. The results are not yet apparent.

"At the beginning of the dispatch of the new 'Texas express' from this city we made great efforts to place our paper in the new field. In thirty days the complaints of delays of an entire day were so frequent that 60 per cent. of the mail at first sent out was turned back upon the old routes, which do not leave the city until four or five hours later in the morning, while new subscribers rapidly disappeared because they could not get their papers regularly.

"From every source in Kansas where the Missouri Pacific extends there comes bitter complaints of the mails. Late, late, always late, from one to twenty-four hours. We have hitherto borne this annoyance and positive loss—for it is a serious loss to the Kansas City morning papers—without public complaint; but when our patrons take up the cry and charge the fault at our doors we must state the facts in self-defense, if nothing more. The one thing which would make our hearts glad and our patrons happy would be a regular mail service along the line on this road which could be run on time for thirty consecutive days."

The above complaints are certainly quite as bitter in tone and more specific in detail than any now appearing. They warrant at least the conclusion that censure of the mail service is not a new topic for editorial writing in that region of the country.

COMPLAINTS INVESTIGATED.

On the 31st of January last the following was spread upon the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date at page 828, being a quotation from the Abilene (Kansas) Gazette:

"The time has come, in fact it came long ago, for the United Saates Posta lauthorities to do something for the Western mail service. We do not know whether the rank service which we have been receiving is due to incompetency or lack of sufficient help; but one thing we do know, and that is it is about as weak as the people are going to stand by and accept without kicking vigorously. Day after day, week in and week out, this office has received numerous and repeated complaints of failure to receive papers. We have traced the matter down and find it is due to the rotten mail service. We are possessed of ordinary patience; but the time has gone by for us longer to remain silent. Yesterday morning at 3.30 the greatest outrage that has ever been perpetrated upon a daily newspaper in Kansas since the State was admitted into the Union was served the Gazette by the route agent who worked the mail going west on train No. 203, either through ignorance, drunkenness, imbecility, or maliciousness, we know not which."

The grounds for this complaint were at the time promptly investigated, and it was ascertained that the refusal to receive the matter referred to was that the clerk had acted in conformity with the laws and regulations, as the matter was not accompanied by a proper certificate of the postmaster that the postage had been prepaid.

Complaint was made by the Omaha Republican of the inefficiency of the mail service in Nebraska. A full investigation demonstrated the fact that the errors complained of were not chargeable to the postal service, but rested solely in the office of the paper whose publisher made complaint.

As an illustration of the inconsiderate nature of the attacks made upon the mail service, the following, recently published editorially in the Western School Journal, at Topeka, Kans., may be cited:

"When the mail was carried in a lumbering stage-coach and distributed once or twice a month, people were confident that it would some time reach its destination. To-day all is uncertainty; mail may and it may not reach the parties for whom it was intended. Subscribers have written us concerning their subscriptions, their letters were promptly answered, and in a few days they came back to us marked "Returned to writer." The only way we can reach people in such cases is to write to the county superintendent and request him to deliver our letters. If there is a business or newspaper man in the State who has not had cause to deplore the wretched condition of our mail service we would like to know it."

Upon the publication of this complaint the superintendent of the seventh division, under the general instructions of this Department to all division superintendents to promptly investigate the subject of any complaints in their respective divisions and report, requested the publisher to furnish specific grounds of complaint, that the defects in the mail service with respect to his publication might be traced out and amended. The publisher furnished sixty cases of alleged failure of subscribers to receive the paper. All these were carefully investigated, and the report thereon proves that with two or three exceptions of failure or delay in receiving copies the complaints were groundless. The failures in the residue of the cases, where any were found, resulted from removal of subscribers from one office to another, or from misdirection in address, or other mistake of the publisher.

The same publisher also submitted, to substantiate his complaints, thirteen cases in which letters or postal-cards had been sent out by him and returned marked "Returned to writer." In every case it was found upon examination that the letters or cards had been returned because unclaimed, and that in not one was the postal service in fault.

THE STAR-ROUTE SERVICE IN KANSAS.

Turning now to the star-route service in Kansas, there has been a decrease in the routes of this class of service of 1,548 miles since 1884. For this number of miles taken off, nearly 3,000 miles of railroad service have been added, and there are 9,217.25 miles of mail routes in this State. In 1884 there were 10,566 miles of star routes and an annual travel of 3,590,428 miles. On June 30, 1887, there was an annual travel, on 1,548 miles less of routes, of 3,220,538.50. The mileage by star routes is nearly the same as in 1884, but the miles of railroad service traveled annually in that State have swelled from 4,919,265 in 1884 to 5,882,086.75 in 1887.

*This decrease is owing to a reduction on the Union Pacific Railway—Kansas City to Denver, 639.82 miles—from fourteen to six trips a week, making a reduction of 532,330 miles on that route. An increase of 188,146 miles on the residue of the service in Kansas leaves a net decrease of 344,184 miles.

Since January 31, 1888, there has been ordered 554.17 miles of railroad service in Kansas and 503.59 miles in Nebraska.

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION AGAINST THE SIXTH AND SEVENTH DIVISIONS.

Within the direction of the resolution to report as to complaints, it becomes my duty to notice certain statements recently made upon the floor of the Senate, and hence appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I find it there stated in substance that there has been unfair discrimination against the sixth and seventh divisions, and that the increase there made in facilities, in post-offices, clerks, and railway postal clerks, "has been inadequate to the needs of that rapidly-growing and prosperous section," and the fault for this state of things is laid at the door of the Post-Office Department.

The effort has been made to prove by the statistics of mail matter handled that the railway postal clerks in these two divisions named are overworked and required to handle more matter than in the other divisions; and from these statistics the deduction is drawn that a much larger number of clerks should be employed on the lines in these divisions.

The incorrectness of this deduction to show deterioration of service at the present time, or an inferior service to that heretofore furnished, or that clerks are overworked in these two divisions, is made manifest by a comparison of the same kind of work for the last four years.

Pieces of mail handled by railway postal clerks.

According to the above table it appears that the average per clerk of pieces of all kinds of mail matter handled for the sixth and seventh divisions, during the years 1884 and 1885, was 1,396,497, while the general average number of pieces handled by clerks in the service for the same period was 1,258,043. This was an average per clerk, for each of the sixth and seventh divisions of 138,454 pieces over the general average; while for the years 1886 and 1887 the average per clerk in the entire service was 1,812,302 pieces, and for the sixth and seventh divisions 1,355,128, thus demonstrating that the difference of 138,454 pieces per clerk between the sixth and seventh divisions and the general average of the entire service has been decreased to 43,826, drawing them closer to the general average by 94,628 pieces.

It is thereby conclusively shown, so far as these statistics are of value, that each clerk in these two divisions was required to do more work, as compared with other divisions, and more work, in fact, in 1884 and 1885 than in 1886 and 1887; and that the burden put upon him in the last two years is less than he was required to bear in 1884 and 1885.

In the showing of the total pieces of ordinary mail handled during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1886, by clerks in the sixth and seventh divisions, lately printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the 29th of February, 1888 (page 1605), a mistake is made in stating that 1,923,501,190 pieces were handled by clerks in those divisions, and the clerks in all other divisions combined 3,406,000,285. The statement should be: Pieces of ordinary mail handled by clerks in the sixth and seventh divisions, 1,913,521,190, and total pieces of ordinary mail handled by clerks in other divisions, 3,416,000,285. Taking 10,000,000 pieces from clerks in the several divisions and adding them to clerks in the sixth and seventh divisions affects the averages very materially; therefore the percentages there given are worthless.

The statement here following shows the total pieces of ordinary mail handled in each of the divisions for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1884, 1885, 1886, and 1887, and also in another table the number of clerks and the average number of pieces handled by each clerk in the several divisions. This shows that in the sixth division the average of pieces handled by each clerk is below the average handled per clerk in all the divisions.

Certainly these tables show that the clerks in the sixth division are not (on the basis of pieces of mail handled) taxed beyond that of clerks in other divisions. The seventh division has for each of the four years named been considerably above the average. In 1884, the general average being 1,266,173, the seventh division averaged 1,708,690. In 1885 the general average was 1,249,918, while the seventh division averaged 1,545,147. In 1886 the general average was 1,295,649, while the seventh division averaged 1,532,261; and for the year 1887 the general average was 1,328,956 while the seventh division averaged 1,482,656.

It will thus be seen that instead of the clerks in the seventh division being overtaxed in 1887, as compared with other divisions, the discrimination was much less than it had been for any of the years under review. But this basis of measuring the work of clerks is unfair. Some divisions have short lines, where clerks travel but 60 or 90 miles and work nothing but local mail, and their record would tend to bring down the general average of that division. And it should also be borne in mind that on the heavier lines, where most of the mail is handled, there are employed helpers, who do not distribute, but merely act as assistants to the regular distributing clerks, bringing in the mail and setting it upon the table ready for distribution.

It must be admitted by any one informed, or at all familiar with the service, that few lines in the West are so heavy that these helpers are needed; therefore, the percentage of distributers to clerks employed is much larger than it is in some of the other divisions where these men are engaged. As, for instance, in the ninth division, which embraces the heavy mail line between New York and Chicago, more helpers are needed than on any other line in the country, the result being that the average pieces handled by this line, as shown in the above tables, is considerably less than in the seventh division, while the men connected with the service all admit that more pieces per distributer are handled on that line than, perhaps, any other in the country.

These statistics, however, are of little value as a basis to determine the question of discrimination between the several divisions, as several other conditions must be considered.

In the New England and other Eastern and Central States are many short routes where clerks run but 50, 60, to 80 miles per day, and naturally the average number of pieces handled by these clerks is lower than is that on any of the through lines or those more important. This would largely account for the difference; but another reason is found, namely, that most of the mail for these States in the Western divisions if separated before it reaches those divisions, and most of it handled by them merely local, where but few separations are needed, and a clerk can handle more than where there is separating for an entire State.

The ninth division, which embraces the State of Michigan (except the Upper Peninsula) and the fast mail between New York and Chicago, made the highest average of any division in the service.

CLOSED-POUCH SERVICE.

It has also been argued in the Senate "that in the matter of closed pouches handled daily" for the same period (1887) the clerks in the sixth and seventh divisions handled 2,895, as against 2,789 in all other divisions except the first and second.

I respectfully intimate that this argument is fallacious, when I state the fact that railway postal clerks do not handle closed pouches. The closed-pouch service is performed on railroads where railway postal clerks are not employed and the pouches are handled by railroad employés.

Complaint has been made in the Senate, as appears from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, that the increase of railway postal clerks in the sixth and seventh divisions has not kept pace with the relative increase of mileage of new roads on which service has been placed, and that had these divisions received a quota of clerks proportionate to their increase in mileage they would have been assigned 700 clerks instead of 228.

The reasoning is specious which reaches such a conclusion from such premises, illustrating the danger of drawing conclusions from statistics without regard to qualifying conditions.

Clerical force in the railway mail service can not be assigned upon the basis of mileage.

The proportion of clerks must be greatest where the mails are heaviest and among the dense populations where post-offices are most frequent upon the routes. For instance, on the New York and Chicago railway post-office, 986 miles long, there are employed 316 clerks, or 1 clerk for every 3 miles of road; while on the Omaha and Ogden, the heaviest line running through Nebraska, 1,035 miles long, are required but 39 clerks, or 1 to every 30 miles. Were the two lines furnished the same working force, or a force on the mileage basis, at least 250 clerks on the latter road would be constantly idle.

The older and more thickly-settled portions of the country send more mail to the newer districts than they receive in return; therefore more clerks are required to handle this concentrated volume of outgoing mail than are required on Western lines.

This one reason will show that the theory of distribution of clerks upon the basis of road mileage is not tenable, and it is especially so in the far Western States on account of the well-known fact that they traverse vast plains and mountain regions where there are few settlements, and therefore it is very seldom that more than one clerk is required, or can be employed, to a car, where in the older and thickly-settled States from two to twelve clerks are needed to perform the service.

A few cases may be cited to prove the correctness of this statement. For instance, on the Manitoba road, in Dakota, the distance between Towner and Minot is 46 miles, there being no intervening post-offices; between Minot and Williston, 120 miles; Williston to Fort Buford, 25 miles; Fort Buford to Poplar Creek Agency, 60 miles; Poplar Creek Agency to Wolf Point, 22 miles; Wolf Point to Fort Assinaboine, 210 miles; Fort Assinaboine to Fort Benton, 72 miles. A case in point may be cited in Nebraska, where the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad has built an extension from Anselmo to Whitman, a distance of 99 miles, without an intervening post-office.

Another case which may be cited is that of the Union Pacific, building across Southern Kansas to Pueblo, Colo., where there are but very few offices. Also the Kansas Division of the Union Pacific Railroad between Weskan, in Wallace County, Kansas, and Denver, Colo. The distance between Weskan, Kans., and Cheyenne, Wyo., is 31 miles; Cheyenne to Kit Carson, 25 miles; Kit Carson to Hugo, 47½ miles, etc.; but perhaps more to the point than any other line, as it affects the statistics under review, is that of the lines built last summer through Indian Territory: that of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé, between Arkansas City, Kans., and Purcell, Ind. T., a distance of 141 miles, without an intervening post-office; yet the service on this line was needed for the purpose of expediting through mails between Kansas and Texas. Or, to reach the same conclusion in a different form, the Postmaster-General's report for 1887 shows that on June 30, 1887, there were 14,350.5 miles of railroad in the United States on which closed-pouch service was being performed without the aid of accompanying clerks, and of this amount the sixth and seventh divisions had 5,667, or over 39 per cent. of the whole. This is about the same percentage as in 1885 and 1886.

A few years ago, when there were but few leading railroad centers west of Chicago, it was not necessary to separate the mails for the Western States until they reached the Mississippi River, but owing to the recent progress it was found that the mails for certain localities might be advanced by sending them over one of several roads, and to take advantage of this it was necessary to have the mails separated as far east as possible, and to meet this growing want the lines east of St. Louis and Chicago were strengthened up so as to have the mails for Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, and Texas separated before reaching the Mississippi River, and so well was this policy found to work that it has been continued with advantage to the service.

This, with the explanation above given of the mileage basis, and the average handling of mail matter per clerk, shows the fallaciousness of the argument urged to prove unjust discrimination against the sixth and seventh divisions.

NEBRASKA.

The mail service in Nebraska has been the subject of animadversion in some of the journals of that State and on the floor of the Senate.

The following recently appeared in a Nebraska newspaper and was sent to the Department:

"Senator MANDERSON, of Nebraska, in speaking on Senator PALMER's resolution calling upon the Post-Office Committee of the Senate to investigate the deficiencies of the railway mail service in the West and South, called attention to the defective character of the service throughout Nebraska. He said there had been 1,100 miles of railroad built during the last year in the State, and that along these lines new communities have sprung into life, and that thriving towns are dependent upon postal facilities for their well-being. He was in daily receipt of letters complaining of the imperfect service both on railroads and at local places, especially at distributing points. Not only the press of the country, but citizens in all branches of occupation were clamoring for a remedy of the evils.

"Let our citizens now suffering from mail inconvenience write to our Representatives and Senators in Congress and request them to use their influence in securing a railway mail service for ourselves in common with thousands of others along the line of the B. and M. (Burlington and Missouri River) from Curtis, Nebr., to Cheyenne, Wyo. If the people interested do not at once move in this matter and let the powers that be at Washington know there is some one in this country we will be a year hence, Micawber-like, waiting for something to turn up with our weekly mail from Sterling. A number of good-sized towns in Nebraska are in that condition to-day. With railroad facilities for more than a year past they get a weekly mail by the grace of the great and benevolent Government of the United States."

The following statement of facts, accompanied by the correspondence, will show the injustice of the specific complaint here made:

Effort had long previously been made by the Department to establish service on the railroad therein designated, and when this complaint appeared the matter was referred to the division superintendent at Chicago to ascertain the cause of delay. On February 14, instant, the superintendent replied:

"The B. & M. Co. is entirely responsible for the delay in recommendation for service on the road between Grant, Nebr., and Cheyenne, Wyo., as we have written them several times for diagrams and information concerning the road, and have been informed that the same would be furnished as soon as possible. We have written the general manager again to-day."

On the 13th of February, instant, the general manager writes:

"Referring to your telegram to-day in regard to information requested some time ago, relative to proposed route from Grant to Cheyenne:

"This matter has been at a standstill, owing to the fact that our stations up there are few and far apart, and we deemed it advisable to wait till a better showing could be made before completing the distance circular for officials at Washington and furnishing similar data asked for by you.

"We will endeavor to get things in shape before long, and you may rest assured there will be no unnecessary delay in the matter."

From the above it will be seen that the Department had done its utmost to establish the service on this road, but that the railroad company, for reasons of its own, not desiring to take up the service at that time, had neglected to inform the Department as to the necessary data, or to signify its readiness to perform the service.

This instance aptly illustrates the criticisms which are often made in regard to the establishment of new service. As soon as application is made, or a line of road approaches completion, it is the due course of business for the Department to send to the proper officer of the railroad company a request for necessary information as to distance, statistics, trips, time-tables, etc., to the end that an order may be intelligently made for placing the service thereon.

During the interval between the application and the action of the company signifying its readiness to take up the service, the community along the new line of road suffer some inconvenience from delays for which the Department is not in fault. Complaints thus arising are used as the basis of indiscriminate censure of the postal service and always have been. There is nothing new in connection with such complaints except in the use to which they have been put.

CONCLUSION.

From a careful examination of the reports touching the Railway Mail Service; upon the testimony of those connected with it for many years and familiar with its growth and workings; in view of the general satisfaction expressed with it by the people of all sections; from the diminishing number of complaints made in respect to it, no less than upon the statistical demonstration made as a part of the system and as a gauge of its efficiency, I unhesitatingly assert that the entire mail service, not only in Kansas but throughout the entire West and the whole field of its operations, is in better and more efficient condition at the present time than it has ever been before.

Very respectfully,

DON M. DICKINSON,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE,
Speaker House of Representatives.

Mr. BLOUNT. I now ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill by sections.

The Clerk read as follows:

For light, rent, and fuel to post-offices of the third class, $650,607.

Mr. KERR. I move to strike out lines 24 and 25, the paragraph just read.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word about that. As I understand it, this provision proposes a large increase of expenditure for the benefit of a small number of postmasters; small, I mean, compared with the total number. I know it has been claimed at several conventions that this is a proper increase, and I believe we have all been deluged with letters on the subject.

Of course gentlemen understand that during all these years these third-class postmasters have held these offices without any increased compensation; and I suspect most of the gentlemen on the other side understand that, notwithstanding this great demand for an increase, in every instance where one third-class postmaster has been appointed there have been a dozen people anxious to be appointed; and I suspect, further, that our friends are not quite so happy and peaceful about the appointment of the successful ones and the failure of the unsuccessful ones as they pretend to be. But, however that may be, I was somewhat amused to hear the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] say that the trouble all came from the large surplus in the Treasury, and that you could not have an economical and honest conduct of the Government with a surplus in the Treasury.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] the other day said here in the presence of the Baptist brethren, and called on them to witness, that it would be "as easy to run a powder-house in hell" as to have an honest and economical administration of the Government with a large surplus in the Treasury. And now to-day comes the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] with this same excuse of the surplus, and proposes to increase these salaries to an amount of over half a million dollars.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX], too, rises here to-day and proposes other legislation in connection with this bill which will necessitate another large expenditure, and he criticises the gentleman from Georgia, the chairman of the committee [Mr. BLOUNT], because that proposed legislation of his is not in a more forward state. So that when the ordinary Democrat gets up here and begins to talk about the surplus and about it being impossible to run the Government economically with a large surplus in the Treasury, we are to understand that he is getting ready to roll up his sleeves and run his hand into the Treasury and pull some of the surplus out for the benefit of his party friends. [Laughter.] Now, gentlemen, I do not think that you are bound to do all these things just on account of the surplus. [Laughter.]

We might continue to buy bonds, and we had better buy bonds even at the present premium than expend money on salaries which perhaps may be of doubtful propriety.

Mr. DOCKERY. Does the gentleman object to that item?

Mr. CANNON. I doubt its propriety. It may be that in some few instances there ought to be additional compensation in cases of this kind; but during all the years of the past the tendency has been to cut down rather than increase appropriations in this respect. Now you make an increase. If you are determined to make these increases (you are responsible for them, and I suppose you are willing to bear the responsibility), at least be consistent and quit prating about "economy," and when you take money from the Treasury quit giving the excuse that the surplus makes you feel wicked and extravagant.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not care to enter into any political discussion on this matter. I have already stated reasons which I regard as sufficient to justify the insertion of this item by the committee. But my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] remarks that for the first time there is a proposition here to make allowance for rent, light, and fuel at third-class post-offices.

Mr. CANNON. This is the first appropriation of this kind, as I understand.

Mr. BLOUNT. In the Forty-eighth Congress, when we had a Republican administration, and when the gentleman from Illinois was on the committee, a provision was put in the Post-Office appropriation bill authorizing the allowance for light, rent, and fuel to third-class postmasters; but the language was unfortunate, and it applied to one year only. But the Department was authorized to use funds for that purpose, and some contracts were made and some rent allowed. This is all I desire to say in reply to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. The action of which the gentleman speaks, as I recollect, was action taken not by the committee which prepared the bill, but in the House, by way of amendment; and that proposition bore no appropriation.

Mr. BLOUNT. If the action was taken in the House, could not the gentleman have prevented it by a point of order?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I do not recollect the particular circumstances; but if the proposition was adopted in the House and was subject to a point of order, I certainly would have made the point if present. But I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that that proposition bore no appropriation; and even if the gentleman's statement is correct, it furnishes no excuse for this extravagant proposition.

Mr. BLOUNT. Nor did I give it in that way, but simply in reply to the gentleman's statement that this had never been done before.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has expired.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to amend by striking out the last word. The gentleman says that the provision to which I referred carried no appropriation. I reply, it was provided that part of the appropriation made in the bill might be used for that purpose.

Mr. CANNON. Was it so used?

Mr. BLOUNT. Some of it was. There are some contracts in existence now.

Mr. CANNON. When did it go into effect?

Mr. BLOUNT. It went into effect during a Republican administration, during the Forty-eighth Congress.

Mr. CANNON. Who offered the amendment?

Mr. BLOUNT. Oh, I do not remember that. The way in which it happened to be brought to my mind was that the matter was investigated to see whether the language of that provision would apply generally, or was confined to that particular year.

Mr. CANNON. I am told by a gentleman whose recollection is clear upon the matter that the provision to which the gentleman refers was made at the second session of the Forty-eighth Congress, and went into effect substantially, so far as it had any effect, with the commencement of this Administration.

Mr. BLOUNT. It was passed the year before, when you did not know who would have control of the administration.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; it was at the second session of the Forty-eighth Congress. The provision, imperfect as it was, was adopted after the election of President Cleveland. But let that matter be as it may, I say to the gentlemen on the other side, do right about this matter. This item carries an appropriation of more than $600,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] will be considered as withdrawn. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR] to strike out the line last read.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 25 of the bill, add the following:

"That there shall be allowed and paid to each postmaster of the fourth class $5 for each quarter, in addition to the compensation allowed under existing law."

Mr. BLOUNT. I raise the point that this is new legislation and out of order on an appropriation bill.

Mr. KERR. I hope the gentleman will not press that point of order.

Mr. BLOUNT. There are several propositions which have been referred by the House to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads for our consideration, with the view of having our conclusions reported to the House. Under the circumstances, I deem it my duty to raise the question of order that this amendment is legislation on an appropriation bill, and is contrary to the rules of the House. I think the rule on this subject was wisely adopted. It has a history here in connection with our legislation on appropriation bills. So far as I am concerned, I propose to enforce what I believe to be a wise rule not only in reference to this matter, but all along the line.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. McRAE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, if the clause now pending in this bill, and to which this is offered as an amendment, be appropriate legislation in an appropriation bill, then any amendment which is germane to that clause is in order. There is no law in existence which authorizes the allowance of rent, light, and fuel to postmasters of the third class. By some kind of parliamentary tactics a provision providing for such has been reported by the committee to the House and is a part of this bill. While that is a just and wise provision, it is nevertheless new legislation. I presume the clause is properly in the bill or it would be stricken out. It benefits one class of postmasters, while my amendment seeks to benefit another equally as meritorious. I am not responsible for the infraction of the wise rule that my friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] now invokes. Finding new legislation on the bill, I want to simply enlarge it so as to make it just to all classes of postmasters. I want all treated alike.

If, then, new legislation to the extent proposed by the committee is in order on the bill, certainly anything which may be germane to such new legislation if considered independent of the appropriation bill is also in order. Certainly no one will deny that if the proposition to allow rent, fuel, and lights to the postmasters of the third class was pending alone my amendment would be in order. We may make any changes we desire as to the amount appropriated and extend the allowance to another class with or without limitation, and as the honorable gentleman is responsible for the new legislation being here, he ought not to be heard on a point of order against legislation of the same character and more meritorious. The right to enact legislation on this bill carries with it the right to enact just and proper legislation.

I insist further, Mr. Chairman, that the point comes too late, because the amendment has already been discussed on its merits by several members of the committee, some for and some against it, as well as other gentlemen.

It has been the subject of discussion for more than an hour, and I believe under the rules of the House after we have proceeded to the discussion of an amendment a point of order can not be made against it. Does not the point, then, come too late?

Mr. ROGERS. Will my colleague permit me to make a suggestion? and it is that the provision which comes from the committee was reported by the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. McRAE. I understand that.

Mr. ROGERS. It is properly therefore before the House.

Mr. McRAE. Yes, I am aware of that. It is before the House by unanimous consent and can not be taken away except in the same way or by a vote, and being here is the subject of amendment. When I say it is here by some sort of parliamentary tactics, I do not mean to say that it has not been brought fairly and properly before the House. It has a standing, but is not exempt from the fair and legitimate amendments that it would otherwise be subject to. There is no waiver of the right of amendment in the order allowing it to come here. Neither the phraseology nor the amount to be appropriated was agreed upon when the consent was given. The consent must have the effect to abrogate the rule prohibiting legislation on an appropriation bill so far as allowances to postmasters are concerned. If the point of order is overruled, I will then notice some of the criticisms of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] that have been made upon the amendment. It would hardly be fair to do so in discussing the point of order.

Mr. BINGHAM. I was out of the House at the moment, and I would like to know what remark the gentleman made in reference to me.

Mr. McRAE. When the point of order has been decided I will come to the discussion of the point to which I have just referred. I do not wish, however, further to digress from the point of order to enter upon the discussion of the merits of the amendment, as you did. I will say, however, that the increase I propose is not what it should be, but all I hope for now.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask for the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the order to the House allowing by unanimous consent this amendment to be made by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads may be allowed to place in the Post-Office appropriation bill for consideration by the House a proposition authorizing allowances for rent, light, and fuel in third-class offices.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not covered by the consent granted by the House, and it is therefore obnoxious to the point of order. The Chair does not feel at liberty to go beyond the order the House made, and does not feel at liberty to hold it can be enlarged by the committee, and therefore is bound to sustain the point of order.

Mr. McRAE. I ask then for unanimous consent to offer my amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I object.

Mr. McRAE. Then I move to insert "fourth" after "third," so as to extend this section to postmasters of the fourth class without reference to the twenty-dollar allowance only covering rent, fuel, and lights.

Mr. ADAMS. In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, the introduction of this amendment by unanimous consent does not withdraw it from the operation of the usual rules of the House, but they are applicable as it the proposition came before the House regularly in order. When a proposition which could not have been offered to the bill by reason of a rule of the House is admitted by unanimous consent, it seems to me rather strange to say that proposition can not be amended in any particular. Suppose there is a provision in lines 24 and 25 for light and fuel of the post-offices of third-class, ought not that to be subject to the point of order? Is that what goes into the bill by unanimous consent? I think the gentleman himself would shrink from the conclusion you can amend the amount, and I do not see why, if you can amend the amount, you can not amend any part of the proposition. If the proposition is before the House, it is subject to the same amendment as if it were properly in the bill, and if in the bill it would be subject to amendment in every particular in which gentlemen might desire to amend it. The rule of the House only applies to the propriety of offering amendments, but when once admitted it is relieved from the operation of the point of order, and is subject to amendment as in other cases.

The CHAIRMAN. It was incumbent upon the House to have included, on motion of the gentleman from Georgia, postmasters of the fourth class as well as postmasters of the third class, if it was intended to cover them. The Chair therefore thinks the proposition to include fourth-class postmasters is a new proposition not covered by the unanimous consent of the House, and is therefore subject to the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Postmaster-General may hereafter allow rent, light, and fuel at offices of the third class, in the same manner he does now at offices of the first and second classes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making an inquiry. I wish to know whether this clause is discretionary or mandatory.

Mr. BLOUNT. It is just the language used in reference to the first and second class offices. It is presumed that the Postmaster-General will exercise his discretion and perform his duty in making the proper allowances.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I understand the practice under that language has been, in the case of the first and second class offices, to make this allowance uniformly.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is true; but the language selected here was designed to accomplish in the third class offices what was granted to the others.

Mr. BUCHANAN. My reason for making the inquiry is this: That to my personal knowledge such an allowance would be unjust to the Government in some cases, and in other instances the allowance of such an item would be unjust to the postmaster; and it seems to me the language should be amended to make it discretionary with the Postmaster-General.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think that is just what it does now.

Mr. BUCHANAN. In order to save time I withdraw the pro forma amendment, and move to insert what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 26, after the words "Postmaster-General," insert "in his discretion;" so that it will read:

"The Postmaster-General, in his discretion, may hereafter allow rent, light, and fuel at offices of the third class," etc.

Mr. BLOUNT. I see no objection, Mr. Chairman, to that amendment.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For miscellaneous and incidental items for the first and second class post-offices, including furniture, $100,000.

For free-delivery service, $6,000,000.

Mr. ADAMS. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 32, page 2, strike out the words "six million dollars," and insert "six million two hundred thousand dollars."

Mr. ADAMS. The letter of Colonel Bates, superintendent of the free-delivery system, to which I alluded in the general debate, found on page 15 of the committee's report, states that the sum necessary, in his judgment, is $6,189,166.65, which is very nearly the sum I propose to insert; and he says that this amount will be needed to provide for legal obligations already incurred, if no provision is made for increased incidental expenses, additional carriers, or the extension of the service to additional cities.

I call attention to the need of extending the service to additional cities, and I desire also to call attention to the words used by the superintendent, "additional carriers." I live in a section of the country, and my district is in a part of the country, where we have suffered from an insufficient number of carriers ever since the service has been organized. The district I represent is partly in the city of Chicago and partly outside of it. In that city the administration has made a certain allowance for Chicago at the beginning of the fiscal year, and the needs of the city have always outrun the apportionment, and consequently we have always suffered. Here, then, is a request for an appropriation by the gentleman in charge of that Department. I do not understand why the committee decides to appropriate only enough money to meet the obligations already incurred, without providing for additional service. I do not understand why they did not appropriate money for additional carriers, and I know that in my own section of the country additional carriers are required in every large town; nor do I understand why they did not provide for additional cities. But leaving that altogether out of the question, it seems to me they should come up to the estimates of Colonel Bates, and grant the amount necessary to meet the requirements of the service.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, the estimate referred to by my friend from Illinois who has just taken his seat was made by a subordinate officer of the Government, and not by the responsible head of the Department; but the Postmaster-General, the present incumbent of that office, as well as his predecessor, having made an examination of the estimates of that officer, state that they regard them as excessive. On page 264 of the report of the Postmaster-General, in commenting upon this estimate, Mr. Vilas, then Postmaster-General, uses this language:

I have given greater pains to estimate this item with satisfaction than all the others together. The accompanying estimate submitted appears to me inadmissibly excessive and to ask for a larger expenditure than ought now to be awarded to this branch of the service, and much beyond its necessities. I have reviewed it with all the information obtainable from the books of the free-delivery division, and think a safer estimate can be reached by another process, partly following that of the estimate submitted.

And the present Postmaster-General has seen fit to increase the estimate made by his predecessor to the amount of $100,000.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is right.

Mr. BLOUNT. He says:

I have the honor to transmit the report of the superintendent of the free-delivery system on this subject. I am satisfied, however, that for the reasons clearly stated by my predecessor (Annual Report for 1887, page 265), from the data now at hand, and which were not at his command, the increase of free-delivery offices can be fairly well provided for with the following amendment to the item, which I submit, so as to read as follows:

For free-delivery service..... $6,000,000

The estimate of his predecessor was $5,900,000, and this is increased, as I have said, to the extent of $100,000.

Now, the gentleman would not hold any administration responsible for estimates made by its subordinate officials, especially when they have been revised and corrected by the head of the Department. It never has been regarded as conclusive in making such appropriations; but, on the contrary, it has always been the custom to take the revised estimates of the heads of the Departments in preference.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir.

Mr. ADAMS. It is not a question of responsibility, but of accuracy of information. The present Postmaster-General has not been in office for a long time; and here you have a subordinate officer who has been long in charge of that department, and who goes into a detailed estimate of the sums he regards as necessary, which estimate appears on page 15 of the report.

Mr. BLOUNT. I can show my friend that reports of subordinate officers of a Department generally urge more than the head of a Department is willing to assent to, for reasons satisfactory to them.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman indicate what the reason is?

Mr. BLOUNT. I will say it is of such a nature that it can not be readily stated. The Postmaster-General has come as near it as I think might well be. The gentleman from Illinois, to arrive at a correct conclusion, would have to go through the same processes as the Postmaster-General has done. He says:

I have reviewed it with all the information obtainable from the books of the free-delivery division, and think a safer estimate can be reached by another process, partly following that of the estimate submitted.

And then he goes on to give it.

Mr. ADAMS. Does the Postmaster-General give a detailed estimate?

Mr. BLOUNT. He does.

Mr. ADAMS. How much does he allow for additional carriers?

Mr. MACDONALD. Does the gentleman from Illinois claim to know that the amount is insufficient?

Mr. ADAMS. I know the appropriation has been insufficient in my part of the country for the past ten years.

Mr. BLOUNT. I can not just now give the detailed figures which the gentleman from Illinois asks for; but as I have said, the Postmaster-General has seen fit to add $100,000 to the conclusion reached by his predecessor and considers that sufficient.

Mr. DOCKERY. I want to say this to the gentleman from Illinois: If the bill which has just passed both Houses and is now pending before the President, reducing the hours for letter-carriers, should receive the President's approval, this entire item would probably have to be reduced in the Senate or somewhere. And if the gentleman from Illinois can show to the Postmaster-General that the estimate is incorrect, he will be ready and prompt, I have no doubt, to correct it.

Mr. ADAMS. I move to strike out the last word, merely for the purpose of occupying the floor for one minute more. One thing I know is, that for ten years past the business men of Chicago have not had carriers enough. The gentleman refers me to the body at the other end of the Capitol——

Mr. BLOUNT. I did not.

Mr. ADAMS. I refer to a remark of his colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY].

Mr. DOCKERY. I think the gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. ADAMS. I think that was the legitimate inference from the remark of the gentleman from Missouri. But that does not consist with my idea of responsibility as a member of this House.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman misunderstood the scope of my observation, which was rather in the nature of an aside remark. I said the bill which passed the House and is now pending before the President, reducing the number of hours of letter-carriers, if it should become a law, would require some revision of this item at some point.

Mr. ADAMS. It appears the bill referred to is before the President for his signature—that this House passed a law, that the Senate assented to it, and that it only awaits the signature of the Executive. The presumption is it will receive that signature; and the gentlemen ought to have taken that into account in fixing the amount of the appropriation. But it appears clearly from the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri that they have not taken it into account. They say if that bill becomes law this item will have to be revised.

Mr. BINGHAM. We could not, in preparing the appropriation bill, take cognizance of that bill until it was a law.

Mr. ADAMS. You could appropriate $6,200,000. Would any of that money be lost if the bill referred to should fail to become a law?

Mr. BLOUNT. I have not referred the gentleman from Illinois to the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. ADAMS. I did not mean to say that the gentleman from Georgia did, but his colleague on the committee seemed to do so.

Mr. BLOUNT. The Department has made the estimate and regards it as a reasonable one. I do not know, Mr. Chairman, of any better guide than the estimate of the Department. I think it quite a mistake to attempt to give any Department any more money than they ask for.

I have in mind a remarkable instance of bad results of such action on the part of the House of Representatives.

I remember quite well when the Post-Office Department asked for a given sum for star-route service and the House voted half a million of dollars more than the estimates. The Second Assistant Postmaster-General refused to use it. He thought it should not be used. The next House voted a million of dollars; and then the expeditions were changed under the loose administration of the Post-Office Department by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Mr. Brady; but the House of Representatives, I will say in fairness to him, was largely responsible for his loose administration.

Mr. ADAMS. I ask the gentleman from Georgia whether he infers from that fact that the present administration would abuse an additional appropriation of $200,000?

Mr. BLOUNT. Not at all. I simply meant, by way of illustrating my opinion, that it is proper to assume that the head of a Department has the best judgment about what is needed for the efficiency of the service.

My friend from Illinois says the people of Chicago have not had service enough, and that they have not been content with the service they have had. Now, sir, I presume we shall never reach a period when the people will not want better facilities.

Mr. ADAMS. I presume not.

Mr. BLOUNT. So in reference to the star service and the steamboat service there is a constant request for better facilities, and we are getting them all the while; and I am glad we are getting them. As our revenues increase, and as the business of the country increases, we get more money and make more appropriations.

A MEMBER. But you do not keep up with the procession.

Mr. BLOUNT. We are going very rapidly in that way until we have now the best service in the world; and I think we can afford to be conservative and not give more than the Department asks.

The CHAIRMAN. The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. ADAMS, and the Chairman declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. ADAMS. I ask for a division.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The amendment was again read, and it was then rejected—ayes 27, noes 69.

For inland mail transportation, namely: Inland transportation by star routes, $5,400,000.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out "five million four hundred thousand" and insert "six million." I offer this amendment, being fully aware of the fact that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads has allowed in this bill all that has been recommended by the Department. I do it, Mr. Chairman, because I have some knowledge of the kind of service that the people get in the remote parts of the country. I know personally that in many portions of the country where the mail ought to go twice or three times a week it goes only once a week, and often irregularly.

I know also that there are a great many applications for new offices that are not granted; I suppose it is because the Department has no money for carrying the mails to them. They are established as specials and soon discontinued, because no one will serve as postmaster if he must, in addition to giving his services, carry the mails for nothing. Now, sir, in order to make the Post-Office Department self-sustaining, if that must be done, it is important to establish a post-office in every community where the people will agree to maintain it, and the Government ought to carry the mail to every part of the country. There is nothing else that Congress can do that so aids the advancement and prosperity of a new and undeveloped country. Newspapers follow the mails and they are the best educators of the common people Congress can provide. The school-house and church follow soon after the establishment of the post-office. Communities grow, and cities and civilization in turn follow, and the revenues are thus increased.

It will not be satisfactory to the people to say that they have as good service as they had last year and the year before. They demand better and ought to have it. The amendment will put the money at the disposal of the Department, and if it is not used for legitimate purposes it will be covered into the Treasury again without loss. There can be no abuse of this appropriation. All contracts must be let to the lowest bidder. Nobody can be hurt by the appropriation, but if it is used as I hope it will be, a large part of the country will most certainly be benefited by it.

Something is expected by the section of country from which I come and by the people all over the Southern and Western States, where they have to submit to the inconvenience of having only a weekly mail and sometimes none at all. We want better service in the outlying parts of the country, and we think the Government which can give six or seven mails a day to the people who live along the railroads and can pay extravagant prices for a free-delivery system for the people in the cities ought at least to give the people on the frontiers an opportunity to have reasonable mail facilities.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE]. The amount appropriated in this bill is precisely the same that was appropriated last year for this object. The star-route service in the Territory which I represent is utterly inadequate to supply the needs of the people. There are a number of routes which ought to be established there, and at least half of those in operation ought to be increased. The same condition of affairs exist in other Territories. These Territories are rapidly filling up, and are entitled to proper mail facilities. It often happens that a settlement will spring up on account of mining or agriculture which is at least sixty or seventy miles from any postal route, and invariably when we undertake to get service we are confronted with the statement that there is a lack of funds for the purpose.

The appropriation last year was so small for star-routes that the increase of service was made dependent upon the amount of revenue derived from the offices, which is altogether unfair to a sparsely settled country which is rapidly growing and settling up. We in the Territories do not object to the fact that you in the East have your mail brought to your doors, nor do I think that the people of the East would object at all if we had mail facilities which were in some way equal to or commensurate with the wants and needs of our people.

Mr. SYMES. Mr. Chairman, there is great need of the additional appropriation provided for in the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE]. It is a well-known fact, sir, all over the Western and Southwestern, and Northwestern country that the members of Congress are continually beset and importuned to secure the establishment of post-offices and mail routes for the accommodation of the new settlements that are continually springing up.

In my State, for instance—and the same remark would apply all over the Western country—the discovery of a valuable mineral deposit leads to the establishment of a new mining camp. In a very short time thousands of people go there. They have no post-office facilities, and they make up purses among themselves for the purpose of paying stage lines and mail-carriers during the time that they are importuning the Post-Office Department for the establishment of a service to which they are entitled. It would seem that when men go off as pioneers into a thinly-settled country where the roads are bad, and where they have so many of the hard-ships of life to contend with, they ought not to be compelled to contribute practically, as they do, to the postal fund of the United States for the purpose of securing mail facilities for themselves and their families.

When we importune the Department, as we are continually doing, until the answer we receive is that there are not sufficient funds for the extension of the mail service, and, therefore, the Department must be excused from establishing the post-offices and the mail routes which are desired. Why, sir, a strip of country about 100 miles wide and 300 miles long, extending from the western line of Kansas and Nebraska 100 miles into the State of Colorado has been settled up almost entirely during the past three years by farmers or grangers, so called. Towns have sprung up as if by magic, and to my knowledge purses are continually made up for the purpose of paying for mail service, and the Department is being constantly importuned for additional mail routes and additional post-offices. We hear the answer that there are not sufficient funds. And, sir, the late Postmaster-General who recently occupied that position—a gentleman for whom I have the greatest respect—really took the position in his decisions and investigations that if a new post-office was established and a new mail route provided the revenue derived from that office should bear some relation to the expense of carrying the mail from one town to another, across the country, away from the railroads. I submit that such is not the proper rule; that it is the duty of the Government to provide postal facilities for its people, and that the surplus revenues derived from the cities should be used to furnish this additional service. I certainly hope the House will adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS]. The amendment, if there be no objection, will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. PERKINS. I move to amend by striking out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I do not pretend to say just what amount should be appropriated for this service, but as suggested by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] the amount carried in this bill for this service is the same appropriated in the last annual appropriation bill.

The Postmaster-General, in his report, states that the miles over which this service extends increase rapidly each year in consequence of the wonderful growth of our Western country, yet it is the boast of his report and the boast of his administration that he compels this work to be done so economically, so parsimoniously, that the service does not cost the people as much as it did when our population was smaller and there were fewer miles of star routes. In my judgment, this is not what the people of the United States are asking. While they do not desire extravagant service, while they are not asking wasteful expenditure of the public money, they are willing that these pioneers who have gone out upon the Western prairies, and are building up settlements there, should get decent postal service from their Government. It is not the demand or wish of the people that such communities should be discriminated against and their postal service impaired by parsimony.

Let me illustrate. My attention was directed to a little star route in the State of Nebraska, going out from the town of Fremont, situated on a railroad line. That star route, established to accommodate a little rural community, was transferred; the route to Fremont was discontinued and was carried to another point less convenient to the people, the roads being bad and crossing streams without bridges, so that at high water the service could not be carried on at all. This change was made in order to save $1 a year to the Government of the United States. And the service was not restored to the original route to Fremont until the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. DORSEY] assured the Department that he would pay the $1 difference himself. [Laughter.]

Now, are the people of the United States asking for such service as that? It is because of such service that they complain; it is in consequence of such service that the people in all the West, without regard to party, are making complaints and condemning the present administration of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I am quite sure that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] is not serious in the statement he has just made; and I do not need to reply to it. The idea that the Postmaster-General, for the sake of saving $1 a year, would change a star route so as to inflict upon the people inconveniences in the manner described is so incredible that it occurs to me inquiry at the Department would disclose some different state of facts from what the gentleman has assumed.

Now, sir, it has been said that the appropriations have not been sufficient. I wish to ask your attention to page 387, where this language is to be found:

The appropriation for the last fiscal year was $5,850,000. The sum actually expended was $5,119,649.30, leaving an unexpended balance of $730,350.70.

Yet, sir, you are invited to increase the appropriation because heretofore they have been too penurious to provide for the service.

I do not know, sir, but some subordinate officers may tell my friend they do not have money enough, but the answer is ready to his hand in this report from which I have just quoted. It is there further stated:

A comparison with the last annual report shows for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1887, an increase of 615 routes, of 1,041,563.27 miles traveled per annum, and a decrease of $252,647.57 in annual rate of expenditure.

This shows us what we are all aware of, that while the expenses of living are decreasing, while the rates of transmitting by steam-boats and railway are less than they were and are getting cheaper all the time, with the same amount of money we can add to the postal service instead of decreasing it. In the light of this statement there were over $730,000 of unexpended balance of appropriation; in the light of the fact we have made contracts cheaper, and that we can do more with the same amount of money, and when we give the same appropriation for the star routes we gave last year, I ask whether the estimate of the Postmaster-General is not only liberal, but generous?

I say to my friends on this side of the House I am as eager as they can possibly be for this service, and I trust they will not join their voices with the gentlemen on the other side when this condition which I have stated exists and when all the money has been appropriated necessary for the efficiency of the service.

Furthermore, there has been more liberality in the star-route service in my opinion than during any period other than that period of extravagance under General Brady, for which, in my judgment, the two Houses which increased the appropriation bill beyond what the head of the Post-Office Department had asked are in part responsible. They are responsible, even as this House would be responsible if it adopted this proposition to-day.

My friend from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] well said, give to the Department what it asks, and then if the service is insufficient we should hold the Department responsible.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Is the appropriation here proposed the same as that of last year?

Mr. BLOUNT. It is.

Mr. STOCKDALE. What was the appropriation for last year?

Mr. BLOUNT. The appropriation for the last fiscal year covered by the report of the Postmaster-General was $5,850,000, and of that sum there was an unexpended balance of $730,600 and over. It is also shown, as I have said, there was an increase of 615 routes of 1,031,563 miles traveled per annum and a decrease of $252,647.57 in annual rate of expenditure.

Mr. MCKINNEY took the floor, and yielded his time to Mr. BLOUNT.

Mr. BLOUNT. The statement from the Department is that there is abundance of money at the Department, and to spare, for this purpose during the fiscal year, and if any subordinate official of the Government states otherwise he does not do it by authority of the head of the Department. The annual rate of expenditure for all the star-route service in operation on July 1, 1887, was $5,040,790.97, being $58,742 46 less than on June 30, 1887.

I trust, then, that if gentlemen on this side of the House find they can not get the service in their respective districts they will understand hereafter that it is not because the money is not there.

Mr. MCRAE. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, in proposing the amendment to increase the amount for the star-route service, I did not at that time, and do not now, intend to make any complaint against the head of the Post-Office Department or any of the officials of the Department. I have a very high regard for both the present Postmaster-General and his predecessor. They are good officers and shall have my hearty support, but I know the wants and necessities of my constituents better than they do.

I have no complaint to make against the general management of that Department whatever; but, as I said in the beginning, I know that we have not the service in the South and West that we are entitled to. I know that applications have been piling up here from my State and from other States around us for better service and for new post-offices which have been disregarded because the people will not be satisfied with special offices and special service. In short, my people are not satisfied to take only such service as the revenues will give them. I want Congress by an increase of this item in this bill to say to the Post-Office Department that we are not entirely satisfied with the service as far as the star routes are concerned. I want to emphasize my protest against some of the refusals to increase the service in rural districts and the establishment of new offices where the public necessities require them, as well as my protest against the practice of granting special offices or none at all.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] says that four or five hundred thousand dollars have been covered into the Treasury from the appropriations of 1886. That only shows that the committee has given enough for the kind of service we have now, but I say that is not sufficient. He may be satisfied, but I am not.

While it fixes the responsibility, as the gentleman would have it, upon the Department, it does not remedy what I seek to remedy, that is, to get new post-offices wherever they are needed and wherever the people can and will maintain them; and so I hope the increase will be allowed.

It will cost, I repeat, nothing to the Government if it is not used, and it is simply an intimation that we want a better service, and will give them the money for it, and thus put on the Department the responsibility for a failure to establish it. A refusal to give an increase is to say that we are satisfied with the present inefficient service.

I understand that the appropriation for the last two years is the same as that proposed by this bill. Certainly we do not expect this to so remain. We know that our country is improving and the population increasing all the time; we all know that the demands of the people are greater now than they were two years ago, and we ought to expect the service to cost more. I personally know that my people have not had the service they need and which I want them to have, and I propose to protest against insufficient appropriations, and, intend to kick (to use a homely phrase) until it is given to them. I do not care who it hurts or against whom the criticism may apply; I propose that my constituents shall have good mail facilities or know the reason why they do not. If the Department will abandon the idea of making the service self-sustaining we will have no more trouble. Why should it be? No other Department is. The increase I propose only amounts to 1 cent per capita of our population, besides other large increases have been allowed for other purposes.

Mr. PETERS. I have no objection, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from Arkansas "kicking" against the Administration or against the administration of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General all he pleases, but I do object to his "kicking" against the allowance made by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Now, as has been stated by the chairman of the committee, we have allowed the amount of the estimates made by the Postmaster-General, and as has also been shown by the chairman of the committee, the appropriations are in excess of the amounts used. If that be so, why then certainly there is no cause for the additional amount proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas. As I stated before, the Post-Office Committee are liberal in preparing the bill. It has given to the Post-Office Department all it asked in the estimates. It has given to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General all the Postmaster-General asked for the administration of that Department, and if that amount has not been used that is not the fault of the Post-Office Committee, neither is it the fault of the members, perhaps. His appeal, then, must not be made to the House, but to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and that is where his speech should be made.

In other words, the money is there to create the service and to carry it on for the gentleman from Arkansas and his people This House has given it to them. It has given it to the Department. It has given all the Department asked. The Department had not asked all that was given in the fiscal year, and, I repeat, the gentleman can make his speech to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. I am aware of the fact, and it has been the case in my own experience, that I have gone there and asked an increase of service in my district and it has not been given by what seemed to me a desire to be too economical and to look to the economic features of administration rather than to giving to the people efficient service.

But that is not the question to talk about here. It is a question to talk about to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. And I propose hereafter, whenever I go to him to get a service increased as I think it ought to be, to get a service increased in any line in my district, or to ask him for a new line, I will not take the answer from him that there is no appropriation, and that he must look out to see that he does not exceed the appropriation. But he must answer me squarely that the service is not needed. If I can show the service is needed I will hold him responsible for his lack of judgment in relation to what the service needs. Therefore the criticism which the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] makes is not proper on this floor, but should be addressed to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General himself.

Mr. MCRAE. I move to strike out the first word, in order to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Kansas. I have no grievance against the Department. It has done a great deal for my district as compared with what the last administration did; but there is still much to be done. My district has neither been neglected nor discriminated against. I am asking a better service for the whole country. I shall not consult the gentleman as to where I shall make my criticism.

I want the best possible service for my people, and shall demand of this House the money to enable the Department to give it and then insist that it be granted. I have asked for every increase of service that my constituents have indicated they wanted and for the establishment of every office they have indicated they would maintain. A great many of them have been established; many of them as specials. That kind of service is not what I want, and not what the people have a right to expect. It is almost nothing, and can not be justified if the appropriation is sufficient to give service. The mail service is about all the benefit that some of our people derive from the Government, and it ought to be as complete as possible. I do not care whether the Department is self-sustaining or not if to make it so we must submit to inefficient service. The United States are amply able to carry the mails into every neighborhood within their limits and should do so; and I want the House to say by the adoption of this amendment that it expects it to be done. I am willing to trust the present Postmaster-General to get the service if we give him the money. The present appropriation will give us what we have had, but we are not satisfied with that.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the gentleman from Arkansas, in view of the statistics he has been furnished with, will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. MCRAE. I do not withdraw it. I am satisfied that the amount you propose is not sufficient to give the country the service it needs.

During the last two years there have been established over one hundred new offices in my district, and as many more ought to be established. Permanent service ought to be given at once to every special office. In exulting over our magnificent railway and carrier service we must not forget the people in the country.

Mr. CAREY. Although the Post-Office Department may not have expended during the last fiscal year all the money appropriated for carrying the mails on the star routes, I think it safe to say that if it had expended all that was appropriated and a million dollars more the country would not have been supplied with better mail facilities than were really demanded. There is no one here who represents a Western constituency or who represents a section of the country which is growing rapidly, but is daily importuned to use every influence to have the Post-Office Department increase existing service and to put service on new routes. The increased appropriation proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas would not more than cover the star-route service if a liberal policy should be followed that will be required in the United States during the next fiscal year.

The theory that the Post-Office Department should be self-sustaining, I believe is an erroneous one. If the appropriations are expended honestly there should not be any apology required for the large amount expended, but explanations should be required when all the people of this broad land are not adequately provided with mail facilities. The head of that Department can not be expected to make contracts for the transportation of the mails on the star routes in excess of the appropriations. While the making of these contracts is within his discretion, he must be governed in its exercise by the amount of money at his command.

In the last annual report of the Postmaster-General he says:

The star-route transportation merited and has received a rigid and judicious scrutiny, resulting in many changes productive of more efficiency and marked reduction of cost. The sound principle that the mail accommodations should fairly meet all justifiable demands and reasonable wants has been fairly observed; but excessive and unnecessary charges have been curtailed, routes remodeled to provide as good and often better service at less cost, and in some instances, where no adequate results followed, given up altogether, and new contracts have been obtained at the annual lettings for better prices.

These changes may have resulted in the saving of money, but they have not always been to the advantage of the people supplied with mail. An abandonment or a reduction of an established service in most cases works a great hardship. A weekly service may be better than none, but in a country rapidly growing it is very unsatisfactory. On long routes it often takes from three to four weeks to get an answer to a communication. Especially is this the case where the day following the arrival of the mail the return mail is sent out.

To illustrate, I will give an instance. The people in the northern part of Fremont County, Wyoming Territory, were notified through the mail, as is required by the law, of the increase of their assessments on the tax-roll. These notices went over a route supplied with a weekly service. It so happened that the notices were mailed just too late to catch the outgoing mail; nearly three weeks elapsed before the answers of those affected by the notices could reach the county commissioners. It was too late, under the provisions of the law, for the parties to protect their rights.

In some instances the mails are transported by private contributions. I do not believe the service should be dependent in any sense upon the amount of stamps canceled. The very low postage requires five thousand letters of ordinary weight to produce $100. This is a large number of letters, but $100 is but a small percentage of the cost of a star route 100 miles long, even for a weekly service.

There are many post-offices in this country to-day that are called special offices that have no service beyond that which is contracted for by the postmaster, which is only dependent upon the revenue at the office. We all know that in many instances that amounts to little or nothing in comparison with the actual cost of the service.

I believe the policy should be to give every settlement, though it may not contain but fifteen or twenty souls, mail facilities, not for their convenience alone, but for the convenience of all the people of the United States.

An injustice, not an intentional one, is done to the West and South by the manner in which the books are kept in the Post-Office Department. For instance, the trans-continental mails are carried through the Territory of Wyoming for nearly 500 miles over the Union Pacific Railroad and all the cost of that service on the mileage in that Territory is charged to Wyoming. This makes a large deficit.

Each year for the last twenty years there has been a large deficit. The receipts are not equal to the expenditures, and they will not be as long as this country continues to grow. This deficit is a deficit made by the whole country, and not by any particular States and Territories. Post-offices and post-routes are for the advantage of the people of the entire country. From the report of the Postmaster-General, it appears that in ten States only out of forty-eight States and Territories the receipts were in excess of the expenditures. These States for the most part are those of which the population of the cities therein is a very important part of the entire population; the distances are very short and the mails very large. While these States and cities may not be so much interested in the star-route service as the localities the service supplies, they do reap great benefits from it as they reach out for new trade and business in a sparsely-settled and growing country.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I see no reason why this amendment should not be adopted. From what we have heard from members on this floor, the people in the Western Territories evidently have not got the mail facilities they are entitled to. The Postmaster-General possibly may not have been at fault in the past, because he may not have known what the wants of the people were, but after the debate here to-day he will be in fault if he does not supply those wants in the future. Possibly he may have felt it would be to his credit if he denied those people the facilities they were entitled to, in order to make a good showing for his Department, but I do not place conduct of that kind to the credit of any official. He has no right to pinch and scrimp the people in their necessities in order to make a showing for his Department. That is not what he was appointed for. He was appointed to serve the interests of the whole country, and that can not be done by adopting a penny-wise pound-foolish policy. The Post-Office Department should be liberal in furnishing to the people the mail facilities which they require, and it has not been so. It is worse, I know, in the West than in the Eastern or Middle States, but even in my own State I have had complaints on this very subject from people who have either failed to get the postal accommodations they required or have got them very grudgingly. And, Mr. Chairman, even if it is true that the Department does not need this money, there will be no risk in this House appropriating it. Even if the Postmaster-General should adhere to the plan he has pursued in the past, and should fail to grant the people these facilities, still we run no risk in voting this appropriation. I think, sir, from what we have heard from gentlemen representing the Western States and Territories, that the money is needed and that it should be applied to this purpose as fast as the people make application for increased mail facilities. The argument of the chairman of the committee himself is sufficient to show that the appropriation should be made.

He says himself there are $400,000 here carried over from last year. That being true, is there any reason against making the appropriation again, to have it again carried over if it is not used? The money is lying in the Treasury doing nothing, and it will do no less by being put to the credit of the Post-Office Department. Therefore, sir, I am in favor of the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. CAREY. I withdraw the formal amendment.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. McRAE; and it was rejected—ayes 27, noes 57.

For inland transportation by steam-boat routes, $450,000.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I have been requested by gentlemen who desire to do some business in the House to move that the committee do now rise; so I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. McMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. TURNER, of Georgia, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9345) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ARREARS OF PENSION.

Mr. WALKER, by unanimous consent, filed the views of the minority of the Committee on Invalid Pensions on the bill (H. R. 9961) in relation to arrears of pension, and they were ordered to be printed with the report of the committee.

WASHINGTON'S HEADQUARTERS, NEWBURGH, N. Y.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the House from the further consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk, and put it upon its passage.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secret ry of War be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to this House copies of all reports made to him by the engineers of the War Department, or others, relating to the present condition of the work on the monument at Washington's headquarters in the city of Newburgh, State of New York, and any other information relating to the same in possession of his Department, together with any recommendation he may deem proper to make in relation to the completion thereof according to the plans adopted therefor by the joint committee of the Senate of the United States and this House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. BACON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN POWERS.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revoke the order sending the bill (H. R. 6800) for the relief of John Powers to the Committee on Military Affairs, and I move that the amendment of the Senate be concurred in.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove from the record of John Powers, late a member of Elgin

Battery, Illinois Light Artillery, any charge of desertion that may exist against him as a member of said Elgin Battery and issue to him an honorable discharge, subject to the laws and regulations of the War Department.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Page 1, strike out all after "discharge," in line 5, down to the end of the bill, and insert "as of date of November 19, 1862."

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SALES OF CONVICT-MADE GOODS.

Mr. BLAND entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House yesterday ordered the previous question upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill (H. R. 8716) to protect free labor and the industries in which it is employed from the injurious effects of convict labor by confining the sale of the goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured by convict labor to the State in which they are produced.

HENRY S. FRENCH.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 591) for the relief of the estate of Henry S. French, and that it be now put on its passage. The bill proposes merely to refer a claim to the Court of Claims for adjudication. It does not appropriate any money.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the legal representatives of Henry S. French, deceased, late of Nashville, Tenn., be, and are hereby, authorized to bring suit in the Court of Claims for the recovery of the net proceeds of 230 bales of cotton taken at Jonesborough, Ga., in September, 1864, by General William G. Le Duc, by order of General Sherman, and turned over to the Treasury agent, and by him sold, and the proceeds paid into the Treasury of the United States; and for this purpose jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon said court to hear and determine and render judgment in conformity with the rights of the respective parties; also to review the decision of the Southern Claims Commission for the value of one hundred bales of cotton used for hospital purposes at the battle of Jonesborough, Ga., and render judgment thereon; and the said court shall further consider any evidence that may have been taken under the direction of the Southern Claims Commission in regard to such claims, with authority on the part of the United States or the claimants to take additional testimony under the rules of said court: Provided, That an appeal shall lie in said cause from said court to the Supreme Court, as in other cases.

The amendment reported by the Committee on War Claims was read, as follows:

Strike out, in lines 13 to 17, the words "also to review the decision of the Southern Claims Commission for the value of 100 bales of cotton used for hospital purposes at the battle of Jonesborough, Ga., and render judgment thereon," and insert "said judgment to be paid out of the captured and abandoned property fund."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request for the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. KERR. I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. TAULBEE. That will defeat the bill, as the report can not be read before the hour for adjournment.

Mr. BUCHANAN. We are not willing to pass a bill of this kind without knowing what it is. I ask that the report be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the report ought to be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The reading of the report is demanded. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the House, pursuant to its order, stands adjourned until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 24, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of May 14, 1888, decisions rendered by the Treasury Department regarding duty on lead ores containing gold or silver; which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 2351) for the relief of Harrison Swango was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

UNVEILING OF GARIBALDI'S STATUE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the executive committee on inauguration ceremonies of Garibaldi monument, extending to the Senate and House of Representatives an invitation to attend the unveiling of the statue of Garibaldi on the 4th of June next, in New York City; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BROWN presented a petition of sundry druggists and physicians of Georgia, praying for the repeal of those portions of the internal-revenue law classing druggists as liquor dealers and imposing a tax on alcohol used in the arts and in medicine; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DAVIS presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Little Falls, Minn., praying that an appropriation of $50,000 be made for the improvement of the Mississippi River between Little Falls and Brainerd, Minn.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VANCE presented the petition of 50 citizens of Iredell County, North Carolina, praying for certain amendments of the interstate-commerce law; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WALTHALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4320) to authorize the construction of a gravel or macadamized road from the city of New Berne, N. C., to the national cemetery near said city, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the petition of citizens of Junction City, Oregon, praying for the correction of the military record of M. J. Gilstrap, of Oregon, have instructed me to report it adversely, recommending that the prayer of the petition be not granted. There is no evidence to sustain it.

The report was agreed to, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2914) for the relief of August Thieman, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 7688) granting a pension to John Glenning;

A bill (H. R. 7115) granting a pension to William Scott; and

A bill (H. R. 6574) for the relief of William Compton.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2598) for the relief of Rev. Smith P. Gannage, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. ALLISON. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report favorably, with sundry amendments, the bill (H. R. 9788) making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for expenses of collecting the revenue from customs for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes. I give notice that I shall ask the Senate to-morrow, Friday, to consider the bill, and I hope for that purpose, if no other, the Senate will be in session to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Meanwhile the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. ALLISON. At the request of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES], who is necessarily absent from the Senate to-day, I report from the Committee on Appropriations, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 8565) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes; and I give notice in his behalf that at the earliest possible moment the Senate will be asked to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 353) for the relief of William T. Crump, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2527) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Red River of the North by the Duluth, Rainy Lake River and Southwestern Railway Company, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7564) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River at or near Chattanooga, Tenn., reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8623) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Tennessee River at or near Guntersville, Ala., and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. CHANDLER (on behalf of Mr. CAMERON) submitted a report to accompany the bill (S. 2925) in relation to cadets at the Naval Academy, heretofore reported.

REPORT ON THE MISSISSIPPI AND ITS TRIBUTARIES.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by myself on the 22d instant, to report it favorably without amendment; and I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed in pamphlet form for use of the Senate 3,000 copies of the report on the Mississippi and its tributaries, being Part V of the internal-commerce report for 1887, of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE HEARINGS.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am also instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] April 2, 1888, in relation to hearings before the Woman Suffrage Committee, to report it favorably with an amendment filling the blank with the insertion of the figures "10,000." I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the arguments before the Committee on Woman Suffrage April 2, 1888, be printed for the use of the Senate, and that —— extra copies be printed.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Printing was to fill the blank before the word "extra" by inserting "10,000;" so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the arguments before the Committee on Woman Suffrage April 2, 1888, be printed for the use of the Senate, and that 10,000 extra copies be printed.

Mr. MANDERSON. The cost of printing the 10,000 extra copies o the arguments will be $154. The Committee on Printing, succumbing to the wish of the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage, report in favor of filling the blank with the number indicated.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to ask the Senator from Nebraska if there is not a minority report in that case?

Mr. MANDERSON. It is not a report.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will state to the Senator from Georgia that this is not a report, but simply arguments before the committee.

Mr. BROWN. I misunderstood the matter. I thought it would include a report of the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. No, just the arguments that were presented.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Printing.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HISCOCK introduced a bill (S. 3018) granting an increase of pension to John N. Bovee; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ALLISON introduced a bill (S. 3019) for the relief of Frederick Pehon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. MANDERSON. On behalf of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], who is absent from the Chamber on business of the Senate, I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor bill, which I move be referred to the Committee on Commerce and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS submitted four amendments intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 786) to provide a building for the use of the United States courts, post-office, custom-office, and internal-revenue office at Vicksburg, Miss.;

A bill (S. 2481) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Kentucky River and its tributaries by the Louisville, Cincinnati and Virginia Railway Company; and

A bill (S. 2883) for the relief of S. H. Pearce.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1978) for the erection of a public building in Paterson, N. J., with amendments in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2216) for the relief of Thomas A. Osborn.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6800) for the relief of John Powers.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8560) to establish a department of labor, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri, Mr. FRENCH, and Mr. BUCHANAN managers at the conference on its part.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 8843) to amend section 993 of the Revised Statutes of the United States for the District of Columbia, so as to make inauguration day a holiday within said District; and

A bill (H. R. 8989) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 325) granting to the Billings, Clark's Fork and Cooke City Railroad Company the right of way through the Crow Indian reservation;

A bill (S. 339) granting a pension to Eliza Douglass;

A bill (S. 626) granting an increase of pension to Andrew Franklin, alias McKee;

A bill (S. 737) granting a pension to Berry Day;

A bill (S. 739) granting a pension to Johanna Loewinger;

A bill (S. 1298) granting a pension to Mary Gammell;

A bill (S. 1300) granting a pension to Cordelia R. Jones;

A bill (S. 1477) granting a pension to Harlow B. Hyde;

A bill (S. 1478) granting a pension to George W. Peavey;

A bill (S. 2651) to remove the political disabilities of John Rutledge, of South Carolina;

A bill (S. 2901) granting to the Milwaukee, Lake Shore and Western Railway Company the right of way through the Lac de Flambeau Indian reservation, in the State of Wisconsin;

A bill (H. R. 92) for the relief of Morgan Rawls;

A bill (H. R. 1394) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase additional grounds for the accommodation of Government offices in Council Bluffs, Iowa;

A bill (H. R. 4467) for the erection of a public building at Bar Harbor, in Maine; and

A bill (H. R. 7938) to enlarge, improve, and make repairs upon the United States court-house and post-office building in Atlanta, Ga., and to appropriate money therefor.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS FOR POST-OFFICE PURPOSES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, that order is closed, and the Calendar under Rule VIII being in order, the Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar.

The CHIEF CLERK. Order of Business 1101, a bill (S. 2762) to provide for the erection of public buildings for post-offices in towns and cities where the post-office receipts for three years preceding have exceeded $3,000 annually.

THE VETO POWER.

Mr. STEWART. I ask unanimous consent to call up the joint resolution (S. R. 80) proposing an amendment to subdivisions 2 and 3 of section 7 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Calendar under Rule VIII being in order, the Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution indicated by him.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand that is for the purpose of submitting some remarks.

Mr. SHERMAN. With the leave of the Senator from Nevada, so that no one may be taken by surprise, I give notice that as soon as he is through with his remarks I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. That will be, I suppose, about half past 1.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution indicated by the Senator from Nevada? The Chair hears no objection, and the joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, the proposition embodied in the resolution is to so amend the Constitution that only a majority vote in the two Houses, instead of a two-thirds vote, shall be required to pass a bill over the veto of the President.

It was well said by John Locke that "wherever law ends tyranny begins;" and I will add that tyranny and discretion begin and end at the same point. They are synonymous. Tyranny is government by discretion; freedom is government by law.

No man ever lived who could be safely intrusted with the liberties of the people. No people ever surrendered their liberties to one man who did not eventually lose them. If the people desire liberty, they must preserve it in their own keeping; if they deposit it with another, it is sure to be embezzled.

The veto power is the most striking illustration of the irresistible desire in human nature to appropriate the liberties of the people when confided to the keeping of one man. The plebeians of ancient Rome, at the instigation of Sicinius, two hundred years after the founding of that city, congregated at Mount Sacre, a few miles from the city, and refused to return unless the patricians would give them some guaranty of protection from oppression. A compromise was made whereby the plebeians were allowed to elect magistrates, called tribunes, who should have the power to protect the people from the oppression of their superiors by the utterance of the word "veto," which stayed the passage of any law, the execution of any sentence, the levying of any tax, the enlistment of any troops, and, in short, arrested the entire machinery of the government. The exercise of this imperial function, designed in the beginning to protect the people from their oppressors, was beneficial for a time, but resulted in converting the republic into a despotism.

During the five hundred years of the Roman republic, which was converted into an empire about the commencement of the Christian era, fourteen dictators were created, largely by the veto power exercised by the tribunes. The last dictator, Octavius Cæsar, became emperor under the name of Augustus. The common people of Rome, called plebeians, confided their liberties to the tribunes for the purpose of resisting the oppressions of the patricians, and the tribunes finally absorbed in their own persons the rights and liberties of both plebeians and patricians.

The power to prevent the enactment of laws and to suspend the execution of existing laws has been known for twenty-five hundred years as the veto power. It is an essential element of despotism.

It was incorporated in our Constitution on the false assumption that every President of the United States would exercise it, if at all, with extreme caution, so as not to interfere with the legislative department. It was proposed by Mr. Randolph, of Virginia, in the constitutional convention, to confer this power jointly upon "the Executive and a convenient number of the national judiciary." This proposition was rejected. Mr. Gerry, of Massachusetts, then proposed a qualified veto, whereby a bill might be passed "by —— parts of each branch of the National Legislature," over the objections of the Executive. Mr. Wilson, of Pennsylvania, and Alexander Hamilton, of New York, moved to strike out that portion of Mr. Gerry's proposition which permitted the National Legislature to pass a bill over the veto, "so as to give the Executive an absolute negative on the laws." "There was no danger, they thought, of such a power being too much exercised. It was mentioned by Colonel Hamilton that the King of Great Britain had not exerted his negative since the revolution. Mr. Gerry sees no necessity for so great a control over the legislature, as the best men in the community would be comprised in the two branches of it." (See Elliot's Debates on the Constitution, volume 5, pages 151–2.)

Franklin, Sherman, Madison, Butler, Bedford, and Mason participated in the debate, and were each opposed to an absolute veto. Dr. Franklin said:

> He was sorry to differ from his colleague, for whom he had a very great respect, on any occasion, but he could not help it on this. He had had some experience of this check in the executive on the legislature, under the proprietary government of Pennsylvania. The negative of the governor was constantly made use of to extort money. No good law whatever could be passed without a private bargain with him. An increase of his salary, or some donation, was always made a condition, till at last it became the regular practice to have orders in his favor, on the treasury, presented along with the bills to be signed, so that he might actually receive the former before he should sign the latter. When the Indians were scalping the Western people, and notice of it arrived, the concurrence of the governor in the means of self-defense could not be got till it was agreed that his estate should be exempted from taxation; so that the people were to fight for the security of his property, whilst he was to bear no share of the burden. This was a mischievous sort of check. If the executive was to have a council, such a power would be less objectionable. It was true the King of Great Britain had not, as was said, exerted his negative since the revolution; but that matter was easily explained. The bribes and emoluments now given to the members of Parliament rendered it unnecessary, everything being done according to the will of the ministers. He was afraid, if a negative should be given, as proposed, that more power and money would be demanded, till at last enough would be got to influence and bribe the legislature into a complete subjection to the will of the executive.—Id., page 152.

Roger Sherman very justly remarked that he—

> Was against enabling any one man to stop the will of the whole. No one man could be found so far above all the rest in wisdom. He thought we ought to avail ourselves of his wisdom in revising laws, but not permit him to overrule the decided and cool opinions of the legislature.—Id., page 152.

In the course of the debate Dr. Franklin further said:

> The first man put at the helm will be a good one. Nobody knows what sort may come afterwards. The executive will be always increasing here, as elsewhere, till it ends in a monarchy.—Id., page 154.

Finally a majority of the States gave the veto power to the President, subject to be overruled by a two-thirds vote of both branches of the National Legislature.

A very small part of the debate on this vital provision has been preserved, but sufficient remains to show that Hamilton and others, who desired a strong executive, if not a king, succeeded in retaining the veto power in its present form by assuming that it would never be abused, because it had not been exercised by the King of Great Britain since the revolution.

It seems strange that the framers of the Constitution, endowed as they were with almost prophetic vision, were misled by such arguments. They were certainly familiar with the struggles commenced in the eleventh century between the kings and the barons, and continued between the kings and Parliament until the revolution and the execution of Charles I in 1649. They knew that for nearly five hundred years the people of England had struggled against royal prerogatives, of which the veto power and the power to dispense with the execution of the laws (originally a part of the veto power) were most obnoxious and that the revolution had practically changed the constitution of Great Britain so that the power to make laws was in fact executed by Parliament alone, and the veto power, by common consent, was abandoned.

The non-use of this power by the kings of Great Britain after it had been practically wrested from them by the revolution, was a poor reason for supposing the power itself harmless for evil. The warning of Dr. Franklin was prophetic. The first man was "a good one." Several that came after were also good. But the executive power has increased here, as elsewhere, until the President has more individual power than the sovereign of any constitutional monarchy in the civilized world.

From the time of the adoption of the Constitution to the 4th of March, 1885, when President Cleveland was inaugurated, the whole number of vetoes of all his predecessors was only one hundred and thirty-three. President Cleveland in a little over three years has vetoed one hundred and seventy-four, and has "pocketed" or refused to sign fifty bills which were presented to him within the last ten days of a session of Congress. The suggestion that many of these vetoed bills were for small pensions to soldiers or widows of soldiers is not a satisfactory reason for the exercise of arbitrary power against the deliberate judgment of a majority of Congress; on the contrary, such legislation may be just as meritorious as any other.

The use of the veto power in ordinary matters of legislation was never contemplated by the framers of the Constitution. Such a suggestion would have been regarded as extremely absurd. In article 73 of the Federalist, Alexander Hamilton discusses at length the veto power and maintains that it was only intended to be used in great emergencies to protect the constitutional rights of the Executive, or to prevent the evident and palpable sacrifice of the public interest, and that there was not the least danger that it would be used under other circumstances. No bill vetoed by the present Executive either by returning it to the House in which it originated, with his objections, or by neglecting to sign it in the last ten days of a session, can be cited which involved a constitutional or an unusually important question of any kind. No case suggested by Alexander Hamilton or any other member of the Constitutional Convention as proper for the exercise of the veto power has arisen since the inauguration of President Cleveland; on the contrary, every bill passed by Congress which has failed to become a law by the action or non-action of the President depended upon matters of fact and discretion confided to Congress alone, as shown by the published debates of the framers of the Constitution.

Nor can it be said that any of these bills were of a partisan character. This was impossible under the organization of Congress since Mr. Cleveland became President, one House being Republican and the other Democratic. There is no pretense that the legislation vetoed by the President was the result of passion or prejudice, or was intended to aid either political party. The vetoes of the President rest solely upon the assumption that it is the duty of the President to nullify every law for which he would not have voted as a member of Congress—an assumption not only of superior wisdom, honesty, and patriotism to both branches of Congress, but also that the Executive, with his multifarious duties, has a better opportunity to ascertain facts and judge of the necessities of every section of this vast country than the Representatives of the people elected for that purpose and supplied at the expense of the Government with committee-rooms, clerks, and all the appliances necessary to conduct the legislation in conformity with the complicated wants of our great and growing country. If he is right, why have a Congress? If the Executive is also the legislative department, we have no further use for Congress. How different the position taken by the early Presidents!

The contrast between Washington and Cleveland is well illustrated by the fact that Washington during the eight years of his administration vetoed only two bills, one because it was manifestly in conflict with the Constitution and the other on account of an oversight of Congress, while President Cleveland in three years of his administration vetoed more than one hundred times that number.

The contrast between Lincoln and Cleveland in respect to the exercise of this kingly prerogative is equally marked. Mr. Lincoln sent but one veto to Congress, and that was simply to correct a manifest error in the bill.

President Cleveland pays no respect whatever to the example of Jefferson, whom the Democrats claim as the great progenitor of their party; on the contrary, he utterly repudiates the teachings of that great statesman. Jefferson occupied the Presidential chair for eight years, from March 4, 1801, to March 4, 1809, and did not in a single instance exercise the monarchial power of a veto. John Adams, John Quincy Adams, Martin Van Buren, Zachary Taylor, and Millard Fillmore followed the example of Jefferson and refrained from exercising the veto power. Harrison and Garfield died in office before a session of Congress commenced.

But times have changed and our form of Government has changed from democratic simplicity at its inception to a one-man power, responsive only to the necessities of party and the influence of money. The discretionary power exercised by the Executive by a misconstruction of the veto power, by loose provisions in the statutes, by the growing number and importance of official appointments, by forced constructions of statutes contrary to their obvious meaning, has clothed the Presidential office with many of the essential elements of the despot. Tyranny is nothing but unlimited discretion. A people governed by the unrestrained will of a sovereign have no liberties. The only distinction between the President of the United States and a tyrant consists in the limitations placed upon the discretion of the former by law. The removal, one by one, by the means above recited, of the limitations upon the Executive office intended by the Constitution and preserved in the early legislation of Congress has increased the power of that office until it overshadows the legislative and judicial departments, which by the Constitution were intended to be equal and independent.

The people of the United States do not realize the growing power of the Executive. There are more than one hundred thousand offices at his disposal. Formerly members of Congress had much to say with regard to the appointments of the officers in their districts or States. This has been prohibited by law, and the entire appointing power practically concentrated in the Executive. A member of Congress is not even allowed to give evidence as to the qualifications of an applicant for office. The President alone determines all questions relating to the appointments to office, either by himself or by a board called the "Civil Service Commission," appointed by him and removable at his pleasure.

The vast revenues collected from the people by taxes are practically used by the Administration as a private fund to augment the power of the Executive. This result is reached in part by legislation and in part by forced constructions of the laws.

The legislation of Congress, secured no matter how or by whom devised, permits the Administration to loan the accumulated funds in the Treasury to such national banks as may be in favor with the Executive, without interest or reward to the Government. And this power has been liberally exercised by the present Administration in loaning over $60,000,000 of the people's money to such national banks as enjoy the good fortune to find favor in the eyes of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Administration also exercises the power, either legally or assumed, to use the revenues of the Government in the purchase of United States bonds at the enormous premium of over 27 per cent. from persons unknown to the public, but presumably well known to the Executive.

The Administration also possesses the enormous power to increase at pleasure the value of bonds and other securities for the payment of money, and to depress to an unlimited extent the products of labor and of the farm and the factory. This vast power is conferred on the Administration by the law which makes it discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase and coin not less than two million nor more than four million dollars' worth of silver bullion per month. Unfortunately for the country, the Secretary of the Treasury exercises his discretion against the people and in favor of the bond-holding, moneyed aristocracy of the United States and Europe. If he had exercised this discretion in behalf of the people, there would have been three hundred millions more coin or coin certificates in circulation; the ruinous discount on silver would have been avoided; wheat and cotton would command from 40 to 50 per cent. more money in the market; United States bonds and other evidences of indebtedness would not be the only profitable investments in the United States; millions of laborers would not be out of employment; thrift, enterprise, and prosperity would exist where gloom and stagnation of business threaten universal bankruptcy, and there would be less surplus in the Treasury to enrich favorites and rob the people by paying enormous premiums in the purchase of bonds not yet due.

However people may differ as to the propriety of using silver as money, no one will deny that the discretionary power given to the executive department by the act of 1878 to expand or contract the currency to favor bondholders and creditors by making money dear, or to relieve the people from bankruptcy by the use of both metals, is an enormous power, and should never be trusted to the executive department of any goverument.

Few laws are passed by Congress affecting the collection or disbursement of the revenue which are sufficiently definite to restrain the administration from discriminating in favor of one class of persons against another, and conferring vast benefits upon the favored to the injury of others, including the United States. A few familiar examples showing how the revenue laws are construed will illustrate the manner in which the Executive exercises an almost unlimited discretion in favor of particular interests to the injury of others.

The tariff law of 1883 imposes a duty on load ore and lead dross in the following language.

Lead ore and lead dross, 1½ cents per pound.

There is no exception in the law. All lead ores and lead dross are included within the plain language of the statute. But silver ore is on the free-list, and the Secretary of the Treasury is called upon to decide whether silver ore containing lead shall be classed as silver ore and imported free of duty or be classed as lead ore and pay a duty of 1½ cents per pound. Under this law the Secretary of the Treasury rules that ores containing more value in silver than in lead shall be admitted free as silver ore.

This ruling practically repeals the law and admits all lead ore free of duty. Whatever the true rule may be, the law confers an enormous discretionary power on the Secretary. It is estimated that the importations of lead ore classed as silver ore under this ruling from 1884 to 1888 through El Paso alone amount to 95,849 tons, which would have yielded a revenue if classed as lead ore of $2,875,470. Large importations of lead ore classed as silver ore are also made through Laredo and Nogales and Baltimore and other ports, and the amount is constantly increasing. It will thus be seen that by this ruling, if erroneous, the Government is losing a vast amount of money which somebody is gaining.

India is a province of England and therefore near to the heart of the Treasury Department. It is a large exporter of wool to the United States. The tariff on wool was inconvenient to the producers of that commodity in India, but this inconvenience has been greatly mitigated by a ruling of the Treasury Department. The amount of duty collected on imported goods of all descriptions, wool included, is determined by the market price of the commodity in the country from which it is exported. For the purpose of fixing the price of imports so as to determine the amount of duty to be paid to the United States, the Director of the Mint is required to state the value of foreign coins in foreign countries, so that it can be determined at what price any given article imported was purchased in the country from which it was exported. The statement is as follows:

The value of foreign coin as expressed in the money of account of the United States shall be that of the pure metal of such coin of standard value; and the values of the standard coins in circulation of the various nations of the world shall be estimated annually by the Director of the Mint, and be proclaimed on the 1st day of January by the Secretary of the Treasury.—Section 3564, Revised Statutes.

It will be observed that the value of foreign coins is to be determined by the amount of pure metal in the standard coins of the various countries; but the Director of the Mint has established a different rule from that provided in the statutes, which, according to his letter to the Senate of May 4, 1888, is as follows:

In estimating the values of foreign coins in the case of countries of a single silver standard, the values of the monetary units, and consequently of the silver coins, are determined by ascertaining the market value of the pure silver in such units, based upon the mean price of silver in the London market for a period commencing October 1 and ending December 24 last preceding, as per daily cable dispatches to the Bureau of the Mint.

In the case of countries having the double standard the value of the bimetallic par is ascertained by comparing the amount of pure gold in a given unit with the pure gold in the unit of the United States.

He does not inform us what statute authorizes him to value the silver coins of one country according to one standard and those of another country according to another standard, nor why he takes the market price of silver bullion in London instead of the amount of pure silver, as required by the statute, as a criterion for fixing the value of foreign silver coins. But whatever his reasons may be, it so happens that he has hit upon a construction of the law which is very beneficial to India and other foreign countries from which wool and certain other commodities are imported.

The rupee is a silver coin of India, the unit of value and a full legal tender in that country. Its purchasing power in India has not been diminished by the demonetization of silver. It contains 165 grains of pure silver, or 181.5 grains of standard silver nine-tenths fine, and is worth, if valued according to the statute, 44½ cents of our money. The Director of the Mint, however, values it according to the fluctuations and speculative sales of silver bullion in the London market. By that process he deducts from the value of the rupee 11.3 cents, and instead of placing the true value, 44½ cents, on the rupee, he fixes it at only 32.2 cents, or a discount of 33⅓ per cent. This makes a like discount of 33⅓ per cent. for revenue purposes on the value of all raw wool imported from India.

The tariff law fixes a duty of 5 cents a pound on all raw wool valued at over 12 cents a pound. Wool valued at 12 cents a pound and less pays a duty of only 2½ cents a pound. The value of wool being fixed in India by the value of the rupee, the undervaluation of the rupee by the Director of the Mint causes a like undervaluation of the wool and brings it into a lower grade upon which there is a duty of only 2½ cents a pound. Wool imported into the United States during the last five years from India which cost in India over 12 cents a pound according to the true value of the rupee, was admitted as being worth 12 cents and below by reason of this undervaluation of the rupee, occasioning a loss to the United States of $895,883.09. For a like reason there was a loss on imported jute from India during the same period of $520,296.14; on dressed skins, $233,025.28; on gunny-bags, $456,356.92, making a total loss on imports from India during the last five years of $2,105,511.43. This loss to the United States was occasioned by the construction of the law by the Director of the Mint, and whatever reasons may be assigned in support of it, it will hardly be denied that equally sound arguments exist in favor of a construction which would have saved this large sum of money to the United States. This illustrates the vast discretionary power of the Executive.

This undervaluation of foreign coins produced a similar effect on the importations of wool from other countries, as will appear from the following table:

On imported wool from—
Russia, 1884 to 1886, inclusive	$1,135,082.20
Mexico, 1884 to 1887, inclusive	158,714.37
Chili, 1883 to 1887, inclusive	213,891.21
Uruguay, 1885 to 1887, inclusive	696,955.68
Total	2,204,642.44
Add loss on imports of wool, etc., from India for last five years	2,105,511.43
Total loss	$4,310,153.87

It would be interesting to pursue this subject further, and, if it were possible, to exhibit for the consideration of the people the various rulings and discriminations of the Treasury Department, whereby special privileges are granted and merchant princes are created in the great city of New York and elsewhere at the expense of the people. But my purpose is already served. I do not desire in calling attention to the veto power to point out frauds on the revenue, but to show the almost unlimited discretionary power exercised by the Executive, and which he may use at his pleasure, to benefit his friends, or to destroy his enemies. This power is not confined to the administration of the revenue laws.

Nearly all land titles in the United States were obtained from the Government, still the Attorney-General assumes the authority to bring suits to set aside any land-patent issued by the Government, no matter when, and thereby and without a hearing cloud the title of any citizen to his land, and involve him in ruinous litigation, who shall incur the displeasure of the imperial power of the administration. An example of this extraordinary power, and the more extraordinary manner of its exercise, is found in the action of the Attorney-General in farming out to private parties the privilege to bring suits in the name of the United States to set aside land-patents in California which have been granted after years of litigation in tribunals created by Congress to carry into effect the terms of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. After thirty years of litigation the Mexican land grants in California have been settled and patents issued to land amounting in the aggregate to over 8,000,000 acres, now improved and inhabited by not less than 800,000 people. Under such circumstances it would be supposed that the Executive would have allowed the matter to rest until Congress should authorize further proceedings. But the Attorney-General has assumed the responsibility to authorize a large number of suits to set aside patents, some of which were issued more than thirty years ago, since which time the lands have passed into the hands of innocent purchasers and are inhabited by thousands of people. These suits will involve enormous expense, cloud the title of innocent purchasers for many years, and the United States will be the loser and not the gainer by the proceedings, as it has been in several suits of like character authorized by the Attorney-General and decided against the United States in every instance by the courts. It may, however, be beneficial for some political purpose or design of which the public are not informed.

Another example of the exercise of executive power is illustrated by the unsuccessful raid of the Attorney-General on the Bell Telephone Company. I have nothing to do with the motives of that distinguished officer in instituting these proceedings. I simply refer to this matter to show the growing tendency of the executive department to interfere with private rights.

The treaty-making power is also confided to the President. To what extent this vast power may be used to advance the ambitious projects of the Executive can well be imagined. The friendship and good offices of such a power as Great Britain might possibly be secured in a close political contest in this country by yielding to the selfish demands of our most formidable rival.

These are a few examples of the discretionary power of the President conferred by the Constitution, by misconceptions of that instrument, by unguarded laws, and usurped by forced constructions of statutes. Few tyrants ever had wider discretion. None ever had equal resources to enforce the tyranny of discretion.

Many of these evils might be remedied or checked by legislation, and the liberties of the people guarded by law if Congress had power to legislate against the will of the Executive. What hope is there for such legislation while it takes a two-thirds majority of each House of Congress to pass any law which the Executive opposes either on account of the law itself or on account of the attitude towards himself of the persons who advocate its passage?

It is not encouraging to conscientious members of Congress laboring to perfect bills in the interests of the people, to know that the President may send them back to Congress without his approval or throw them into the waste basket at the end of the session without investigation. The assumption of the Executive that he can evolve more knowledge from his inner consciousness while shut up in the White House in the ten days allotted to him to sign bills than the representatives of the people can acquire through all the avenues of information accessible to them, was never indulged in by the fathers of the Constitution.

A large majority of each House of Congress is to-day in favor of honest money, opposed to delegating the sovereign right to issue money to private corporations, and in favor of the free use of both gold and silver as money according to the sanction of the Constitution and the usages of all civilized nations for many hundred years previous to the demonetization of silver by the United States and Europe in the interest of the creditor class and for the development of the resources of India at the expense of the United States.

When the President called upon Congress for the power to speculate in bonds under the pretense of supplying the people with money by disbursing the surplus in the Treasury, the Senate by a vote of 38 to 13 consented to this request, with the condition that there should be no further contraction of the currency, and to prevent which the Secretary of the Treasury was required to purchase and coin silver to take the place of the national-bank currency retired in the purchase of bonds and under the operation of existing laws. The President refused to grant this small favor to the people. The bond-purchase bill was buried in the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, and the representatives of the people denied an opportunity to pass upon this small measure of relief. No proceeding has taken place more gratifying to the moneyed aristocracy of Europe and the governing money-trust of the United States than the scheme whereby an excuse to speculate in bonds was obtained by a naked resolution of the House, and all manner of redress denied to the people of the United States, who are loaded down with debt and struggling against impending ruin, forced upon them by contraction.

The spirit of the times and the animus of the powers that be are indicated by the language of the leading Democratic organ of this city. While I know it would be unjust to hold the President responsible for all that is written by his admirers, still I can not suppose that so able and faithful a journal as the Washington Post would intentionally misrepresent the views of the President of the United States. Without attaching too much importance to the editorials of the Post, I must be permitted to call the attention of the Senate to what this most devoted friend of the President says as to the purposes and designs of the Chief Magistrate of the nation, and the real reasons for his vetoes and other executive acts. In its issue of May 10 the following leading editorial appears:

NO MORE POLITICAL PRUDERY.

The tariff bill now pending in the House of Representatives might just as properly be called the Cleveland bill as the Mills bill. It is the response of the Democratic House, through the majority of the Ways and Means Committee, to the urgent demand of the Democratic President for a Democratic reduction of redundant revenues and needless taxation. It is, therefore, the Democratic party's bill, and no man calling himself a Democrat has a right to work for its defeat or decline to support it.

In all human associations men owe obligations to each other, and as individuals are bound to sacrifice something for the general good. The Democratic party had now reached a point where it can not afford to tolerate infidelity to the Democratic creed. And least of all things can it afford to have the Democratic Administration feeding at the public crib men who work in the vineyard of the enemy.

President Cleveland's tariff message is his platform for the Presidential campaign. He is responsible for the fact that loyalty to him and his party is inconsistent with the refusal of loyal support to the pending bill. The Post has, on many occasions, commended the President for his zeal in the cause of revenue reform. His sincerity is beyond question now, and will not be questioned in the future if he uses the power that he possesses to aid in carrying the bill through the House.

In plain terms, it is time to have done with political prudery and to let every so-called Democratic Representative understand that support of this bill is the test by which the Administration will try his Democracy. President Cleveland did not object when Federal prestige was used to unhorse RANDALL in Pennsylvania. Without the aid of the Administration Mr. RANDALL could not have been deposed. Is President Cleveland too fastidious to let Mr. MCADOO, of New Jersey, a close and doubtful State, understand that a Democratic Administration will not find corn for the oxen that plowed the Republican field? The same kind of fire that was built behind RANDALL in Pennsylvania should be used in the cases of MCADOO, FORAN, and any other so-called Democrat who declines to go with his party in the hour of need.

There are emergencies in politics as in war that try the mettle of commanders. Mr. Cleveland has done admirably in laying out the campaign. Will he suffer a repulse in the initial skirmish by reason of excessive fastidiousness? Or will he use the ample means in his power to insure victory?

The following day it gleefully rejoices over the misfortunes of Mr. SOWDEN, of Allentown, in its most facetious style. It says:

Monte-Christo Cleveland after the Sowden-Allentown veto: "ONE."

The others are quite handy, Mr. President—all within easy striking distance—MCADOO, FORAN, and all their jolly fellowship. Strike again, Mr. President, and strike hard. MCADOO will make a beautiful number "Two."

The haughty arrogance with which the Post proclaims in its issue of May 12 the doom of all recreant Democrats who manifest symptoms of conscience and a desire to represent their constituents, and who refuse to—

Crook the pregnant hinges of the knee,
Where thrift may follow fawning, expresses better than words of mine the ample power of the Executive as understood by his faithful organ. In its issue of that day it says:

CALL THE ROLL.

* * * The thing is to pass the bill—

Meaning the Mills bill—

practically as it stands before the meeting of the Democratic national convention. The vote will demonstrate who are the traitors in the Democratic camp of whom we have heard so much.

Mr. SAMUEL J. RANDALL will not be one, however. He is to all intents and purposes a Pennsylvania Republican, and he makes no secret of his intention to voice the sentiments of his immediate constituency in all tariff matters. This is fair and square and upright, and no one was better satisfied with it than Mr. Cleveland himself when he took Mr. RANDALL at his word and deprived him of his Federal patronage at the same time. But Mr. RANDALL has a Democratic following, we are told—twelve good Democrats and true, who are owned by the Republican protectionists who do business in their districts. Who are these gentlemen? It is easy to pick out three in Mr. FORAN, of Ohio; Mr. MCADOO, of New Jersey; and the melancholy SOWDEN, of Allentown post-office; but who are the others?

It seems to us of great importance to know this before the St. Louis convention assembles. It will take the convention about twenty-four hours to renominate Mr. Cleveland, and then he will be so great a man that he need not scruple to take each Congressional backslider by the scruff of his neck and throw him out of the Democratic party. And he will not. The President respects himself, and he has quite made up his mind that his followers shall respect the issue upon which he has decided to fight the campaign. There is an Allentown for every SOWDEN. It only needs that the SOWDEN shall disclose himself in time.

The following also appeared in the same issue of the Post:

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND'S RESPONSIBILITY.

* * * By his own deliberate act he bound his own and his party's fortunes to a policy that is embodied in the pending tariff bill. He put his hand bravely to the plow and it turned a good Democratic furrow. His party does not expect him to look back.

Mr. Cleveland has it in his power to aid his friends in the House of Representatives in passing the Mills bill, the bill that exists as a response to his message; the bill that, coupled with his message, must be his and his party's platform in the Presidential campaign. As we said the other day, it is time to have done with political prudery and to get down to business; it is not a time for sentimentalism or fastidiousness, but for practical politics. There are men who, while enjoying the favor of the Democratic Administration, may be found working, with their coats off and sleeves rolled up, on the Republican side of the fence.

Let them look for their rewards to the party whose work they are doing.

Mr. SOWDEN ought to be able to appreciate the following item, which also appeared in the Post of May 12:

MR. SOWDEN'S CHANCES—HE IS LIKELY TO BE LEFT AT HOME NEXT YEAR.

The Republican Legislature of Pennsylvania has reapportioned the State so that the districts now represented by Representatives ERMENTROUT and SOWDEN are merged into one district, and one of the two gentlemen named can not come back to the next Congress. It looks as though Mr. SOWDEN would be left at home. During the present Congress he has been making himself as disagreeable as possible to the Democrats, and as inimical as he was capable of being to Democratic legislation. Of the several Pennsylvania Democrats who used to co-operate with Mr. RANDALL in opposing tariff reform, Mr. SOWDEN is the only one who has continued to anathematize the Mills tariff bill. And now he has been deprived by a Presidential veto of the influence that might accrue to him from the enactment of a law appropriating $100,000 for a new public building in his own town—Allentown.

In Mr. ERMENTROUT'S town a new public building is in course of erection. Mr. ERMENTROUT now freely declares his conviction that a tariff bill will pass the House this session. He even says, with regard to the free-wool clause, the most critical and important one in the bill, that the prospect of its adoption is improving; and Mr. ERMENTROUT, it is said, is in a fair way to be renominated and re-elected to Congress. "It is useless to kick against the dashboard," he says. "If you can't kick over it, better not kick at all."

The most exact statement of the situation, however, as understood by this devoted organ of the President, appears as the leading editorial in the issue of May 19, as follows:

DESTINY.

When Napoleon the First concluded to become Emperor of the French he crowned himself. It was an interesting scene. The Cathedral of Notre Dame was thronged with the greatest men and women in the world. There were kings and queens, princes, generals, statesmen, and scholars galore, all assembled to grace the triumph of the conqueror. First in place stood the Pope of Rome. He had come to crown the emperor.

When the critical moment arrived, however, Napoleon took the imperial crown and crowned himself. Pope Pius was but a spectator.

A similar scene will occur in the city of St. Louis on the 8th day of June, in this year of grace 1888. Mr. Grover Cleveland has summoned a national Democratic convention to renominate him for the Presidency of the United States, and eight hundred and twenty delegates will assemble to do his bidding. But they will really have nothing to do. When the time comes to vote it will be apparent to the veriest tyro among them that President Cleveland has already renominated himself. He is a man of destiny, and will do as men of destiny do. The Democratic nomination is his by right of conquest, and he will not condescend to receive it from any hands but his own.

Well, let it be so. This is a self-made country, and it is natural that it should fall down before a self-made man. But was there ever so thoroughly self-made a man as Grover Cleveland I.? We think not.

Mr. HAMPTON. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. STEWART. I would rather not be interrupted.

Mr. HAMPTON. I only wanted to give the comments of another Democratic newspaper.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator can do that after I get through. I decline to yield now.

The situation is forcibly stated in this article. No one denies Mr. Cleveland's absolute ownership of the Democratic party. Before reaching Washington he sent word to the Democratic members of the House to discard one of the precious metals, and in all things to do the bidding of Wall street. The refusal of patriotic Democrats to abandon their constituents and join the golden bondholding ring challenged the admiration of the country. The House of Representatives seemed to be an impregnable fortress against any assault from Wall street; but it has fallen. With a wave of the hand of Grover Cleveland I. that body was paralyzed so that it could not even utter the word "silver" when the Senate sent it the Beck amendment on the bond-purchasing bill. At this rate the growing power of this man of destiny has but to continue unresisted for another term of four years to so intrench Grover Cleveland I. in the White House that nothing but revolution can remove him.

I can hardly suppose the President dictated the language in the foregoing quotation, as he is in the habit of dictating the policy of Congress, but he undoubtedly inspired it and impressed it upon the plastic mind of the editor of the Post by the majesty of power by which he controls, subjugates, and tramples down not only the independence of his party in Congress but the customs and usages of the Government and the rights and privileges of the people. Napoleons may dazzle and captivate the people of France, but it will take years of misrule and oppression to subjugate the people of the United States and make them tamely submit to a dictator. While it must be admitted that the Chief Executive has absorbed and is exercising both the executive and legislative powers of the nation, and his example is forming a precedent and pointing the way to imperial power for other ambitious leaders who may follow him, he himself will hardly reach the goal of imperial sway enjoyed by the great Napoleon, which, according to the Post, his conduct so strikingly resembles. There is no doubt, however, that with the resources which the Executive has at his command any other people except the inhabitants of these United States would be deprived of their liberties. Never before in the hands of one man were such vast powers and resources intrusted by a confiding people.

It remains to be seen whether he will be able to fulfill the expectations of the Post by imitating Napoleon and crowning himself because he regards all others unworthy to perform that service.

The most alarming feature connected with the exercise of the veto power by the President is that it no longer attracts attention; on the contrary, the people are fast being educated to regard the Executive as the source of all power. The vetoes of the President are treated by the press as no more remarkable than the passage of bills through either House of Congress, while in the earlier and better days of the Republic the exercise of the veto power was regarded as most extraordinary. A hundred vetoes in a single session of Congress would have created a revolution in those days. Many leading journals of to-day congratulate the Executive on his independence in disregarding the acts of Congress in his almost daily vetoes of bills originating in a Democratic House or a Republican Senate, and subject to the scrutiny of Democratic as well as Republican committees. The idea that the king can do no wrong is not original with these journals. It has been preached during all the ages in every despotic government, and is a doctrine sacred to tyrants. "Long live the king!" "Hosannahs to the conquering hero!" have ever greeted the usurper in his triumphant march to imperial power. Our Republic is being converted into a monarchy on account of an oversight in framing the Constitution. Shall it be remedied?

It was not deemed possible by the founders of the Constitution to make a perfect instrument of government, or to provide against every scheme of oppression the enemies of liberty could devise to rob the people of free government, and consequently a mode of meeting emergencies as they might arise was provided in the Constitution by way of amending that instrument. Still there are persons who would not remedy defects in the fundamental law notwithstanding the liberties of the people were endangered, and would prefer tyranny with the letter of the Constitution as it was, to liberty preserved by perfecting that instrument so as to maintain the form of government designed by the fathers.

John Tyler, who became President by the death of General Harrison, vetoed ten bills during his administration, and his course has been condemned by posterity. His fifth veto aroused the indignation of a majority of Congress. A select House committee was appointed to take into consideration the reasons of the President in refusing his assent to the bill. John Quincy Adams, ex-President of the United States, who did not veto a bill during his administration, was made chairman of the committee. On August 16, 1842, Mr. Adams presented the report of the committee. It is a powerful arraignment of the President, and suggests that he ought to be impeached for his arbitrary and unjustifiable acts in usurping the power and thwarting the will of Congress. The remedy proposed, however, was not impeachment, but an amendment to the Constitution reducing the vote necessary to pass a bill over the veto of the President from two-thirds of each House to a majority, which is the proposition now under consideration. The concluding portion of the report, together with the amendment proposed, is as follows:

The power of the present Congress to enact laws essential to the welfare of the people has been struck with apoplexy by the Executive hand. Submission to his will is the only condition upon which he will permit them to act. For the enactment of a measure earnestly recommended by himself, he forbids their action, unless coupled with a condition declared by himself to be on a subject so totally different that he will not suffer them to be coupled in the same law. With that condition Congress can not comply. In this state of things he has assumed, as the committee fully believe, the exercise of the whole legislative power to himself, and is levying millions of money upon the people without any authority of law. But the final decision of this question depends neither upon legislative nor executive, but upon judicial authority, nor can the final decision of the Supreme Court upon it be pronounced before the close of the present Congress. In the mean time the abusive exercise of the constitutional power of the President to arrest the action of Congress upon measures vital to the welfare of the people, has wrought conviction upon the minds of a majority of the committee that the veto power itself must be restrained and modified by an amendment of the Constitution itself: a resolution for which they accordingly herewith respectfully report.

JAMES COOPER.
K. RAYNER.
THOMAS J. CAMPBELL.
TRUMAN SMITH.

JEREMIAH MORROW.
H. A. PEARCE.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of both Houses concurring therein), That the following amendment of the Constitution of the United States, in the seventh section of the first article, be recommended to the Legislatures of the several States, which, on the adoption of the same by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall become part and parcel of the Constitution:

Instead of the words "two-thirds," twice repeated in the second paragraph of the said seventh section, substitute in both cases the words "a majority of the whole number." (See Congressional Globe, second session Twenty-seventh Congress, 1841-'42, page 896.)

If the amendment proposed by Mr. Adams had been adopted the legislative department of the Government to-day might be able to perform its legitimate functions, notwithstanding the vast accumulation of power in the hands of the Executive. It can not be supposed that bribery alone in the shape of offices and special privileges granted to members of Congress and their friends by an ambitious Executive could control a majority in either House of Congress. The check upon legislation, resulting from a reconsideration in Congress of a bill after a veto, would be sufficient to prevent hasty legislation. If, after hearing the reasons of the President, it should be the deliberate opinion of a majority of both Houses of Congress that a bill should become a law, no one-man power ought to exist in the Government to prevent it.

There is a growing sentiment in the States against the veto power. Nine of them have already qualified it so that a majority of the Legislature can pass a bill over the veto of the governor. They are Alabama, Arkansas, Connecticut, Indiana, Kentucky, New Jersey, Tennessee, Vermont, and West Virginia. Nebraska and Maryland have reduced the majority to three-fifths, while the governors of the States of Delaware, North Carolina, Ohio, and Rhode Island have no veto power conferred upon them by the constitutions of their States. No inconvenience has arisen in any of the States above named for lack of veto power in the governor.

It is absurd to suppose that one man in the White House charged with the multifarious duties of the Executive office can more deliberately examine legislation than the majority of Congress, aided by its committees with no other business but to perfect and pass laws. It is equally absurd to suppose that the one man in the White Honse absorbs and monopolizes all the honor and integrity of the nation.

The arguments in favor of lodging the veto power with the President alone are the same that have been used from time immemorial for placing all power in the hands of a king and regarding him as the fountain of law and justice. It was supposed that the plea of the divine right of kings had become obsolete in the United States and that in the place thereof the people had become sovereign; but the omnipotent sway of Executive power and the commendation it receives from a portion of the public press, remind us that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," and that despotism is the necessary consequence of intrusting the liberties of the people to the safe-keeping of any one man, no matter by what name he be called, whether emperor, king, or president. However much he may be loved by the people the result is the same. Delegated power without a reservation of the right to recall it will never be voluntarily surrendered to the people. The first step in the way of reform in legislation and administration is to restore to Congress legislative power to the end that the people's representatives may defend the rights of their constituents, regardless of the frowns or smiles of an ambitious Executive.

I want it distinctly understood that I have no disposition to criticise the President on account of any unkind feeling towards him personally. On the contrary, I am forced to acknowledge the sagacity and skill with which he controls the heterogeneous masses of the Democratic party by a judicious use of the loaves and fishes. In many things that he is doing, and which I have criticised, he is but following in the footsteps of his recent predecessors. The trouble is that he disregards the restraints imposed upon him by the Constitution and the laws. The exercise of the great natural force with which he is endowed is concentrating the whole power of the Government in the Executive, and if not restrained must ultimately lead to a monarchy. The people admire courage, independence, audacity, and will. These qualities are possessed in a high degree by Mr. Cleveland. While they are guaranties of personal success, they are dangerous to popular liberty. They are the qualities which always increase Executive authority at the expense of the people.

The selection by Mr. Cleveland of the money kings and bondholding aristocracy of Europe and America as his allies proves his sagacity and shows his appreciation of the necessity for the use of money in accomplishing his Napoleonic schemes. If such associations do not arouse the people to action before it is too late, it will be because the boldness and daring of this man of destiny dazzles and blinds them.

In closing my remarks I will quote from a speech by Henry Clay made in the Senate in 1842 in protesting against the usurpations of John Tyler. It is as follows:

> Let me here say, in reply, that the ancient principles and mode of legislation which has ever prevailed from the foundation of this Government has been to fix first upon the general principles which are to guide us, and then to carry out these principles by detailed legislation. Such has ever been the course pursued, not only in the country from which we derive our legislative institutions, but our own. The memorable resolution offered in the British House of Commons by the celebrated Mr. Duning is no doubt familiar to the mind of every one—that "the power of the Crown (and it is equally true of our own Chief Magistrate) had increased, was increasing, and ought to be diminished."

The statement of Mr. Clay is verified by history. In the first quarter of a century after the inauguration of Washington there were six vetoes; in the second quarter, nineteen vetoes; in the third quarter, thirty-one vetoes, and in the fourth quarter, or the last twenty-four years to date, two hundred and fifty-five vetoes, more than two-thirds of which were made by Mr. Cleveland, in addition to his fifty pocket vetoes in the last Congress.

I submit that this is matter for serious consideration.

DISTRICT APPROPRIATION BILL.

The bill (H. R. 9989) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

INAUGURATION DAY IN THE DISTRICT.

The bill (H. R. 8843) to amend section 993 of the Revised Statutes of the United States for the District of Columbia so as to make inauguration day a holiday within said District was read twice by its title.

Mr. DANIEL. Having casually examined the text of the bill, I find that it is almost identical in terms with Senate bill 2551, which has already been passed by the Senate. I therefore ask that the House bill be taken up and passed without reference to a committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the bill be now considered. It will be read for information.

The bill was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have it lie on the table for a few moments, so that I may look at it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie on the table for the present.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON submitted the following report:

> The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5145) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:
> That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 4, and 5, and agree to the same.
> That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$16,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.
> W. B. ALLISON,
> H. L. DAWES,
> A. P. GORMAN,
> Managers on the part of the Senate.
> M. A. FORAN,
> EDWARD J. GAY,
> JOHN D. LONG,
> Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

COMMITTEE ON THE MEAT PRODUCT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. VEST, Mr. PLUMB, Mr. MANDERSON, Mr. CULLOM, and Mr. COKE as the select committee authorized by the resolution of the Senate of the 16th instant, providing for the appointment of a special committee to examine fully into all questions touching the meat product of the United States.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two hours and forty minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, moved that when the Senate adjourn it be to Monday next, and called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 23, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—23.

Bate,	Faulkner,	Kenna,	Ransom,
Berry,	George,	McPherson,	Reagan,
Blodgett,	Gorman,	Morgan,	Saulsbury,
Call,	Gray,	Pasco,	Turpie,
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Payne,	Voorhees.
Daniel,	Jones of Arkansas,	Pugh,

NAYS—23.

Aldrich,	Davis,	Hawley,	Platt,
Allison,	Dolph,	Hiscock,	Riddleberger,
Blair,	Edmunds,	Hoar,	Sherman,
Bowen,	Evarts,	Ingalls,	Stewart,
Chandler,	Farwell,	Jones of Nevada,	Stockbridge.
Cullom,	Frye,	Mitchell,

ABSENT—33.

Beck,	Dawes,	Paddock,	Teller,
Blackburn,	Eustis,	Palmer,	Vance,
Brown,	Gibson,	Plumb,	Vest,
Butler,	Hale,	Quay,	Walthall,
Cameron,	Harris,	Sabin,	Wilson of Iowa,
Chace,	Hearst,	Sawyer,	Wilson of Md.
Coke,	Manderson,	Spooner,
Colquitt,	Morrill,	Stanford,

The following pairs were announced:
Mr. BROWN with Mr. SAWYER.
Mr. COKE with Mr. DAWES.
Mr. COLQUITT with Mr. CHACE.
Mr. BLACKBURN with Mr. MANDERSON.
Mr. EUSTIS with Mr. PADDOCK.
Mr. GIBSON with Mr. TELLER.
Mr. VEST with Mr. PLUMB.
Mr. WALTHALL with Mr. SPOONER.
Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, with Mr. WILSON, of Iowa.
Mr. HARRIS with Mr. MORRILL.
Mr. BECK with Mr. HALE.
So the motion was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 9345) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, May 25, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate May 17, 1888.

INDIAN AGENT.

James D. Jenkins, of Osage, Iowa, to be agent for the Indians of the Sisseton agency, in Dakota.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate May 22, 1888.

FOR APPOINTMENT IN THE ARMY.

To be post chaplain.

Charles C. Pierce, of Pennsylvania, May 12, 1888.

FOR PROMOTION IN THE ARMY.

Corps of Engineers.

Capt. Charles E. L. B. Davis, to be major, April 7, 1888.
First Lieut. George McC. Derby, to be captain, April 7, 1888.
Second Lieut. William L. Sibert, to be first lieutenant, April 7, 1888.

FOR APPOINTMENT BY TRANSFER IN THE ARMY.

Second Lieut. Eugene W. Van C. Lucas, First Artillery, to be second lieutenant in the Corps of Engineers, May 14, 1888.

James S. Mellick, to be postmaster at Dover, Morris County, New Jersey.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 24, 1888.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CLAIM OF WILLIAM GARRETT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting findings of fact by said court in the case of William Garrett vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

BRIDGE ACROSS TENNESSEE RIVER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 7783) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River at or near Knoxville, Tenn., the bill having been returned from the Senate with amendments and a request for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] asks unanimous consent that these amendments of the Senate be non-concurred in and the request for a conference agreed to. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 8560) to establish a department of labor, the bill having been returned from the Senate with amendments and a request for a conference.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I ask that the Senate amendments be non-concurred in and the request for a conference agreed to.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ELIZA WRIGHT OWEN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 42) granting a pension to Eliza Wright Owen, the bill having been returned from the Senate with a message that the amendments of the House had been disagreed to.

Mr. MATSON. I move that this bill be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT PATERSON, N. J.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 1978) for the erection of a public building in Paterson, N. J.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of this bill; and I trust that no gentleman will be cruel enough to interpose a peremptory objection until the bill has been read and I have been allowed one or two minutes—not over two minutes—to show that this is one of the saddest among all these cases, and also one of the worthiest.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase, or acquire by condemnation proceedings or otherwise, a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults therein, for the accommodation of the post-office and other Government offices, at the city of Paterson, N. J. The plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall be previously made and approved according to law, and shall not exceed for the site and building complete the sum of $125,000: Provided, That the site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than 40 feet, including streets and alleys; and no money appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of New Jersey shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $125,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be used and expended for the purpose provided in this act.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Speaker, if I did not inform the House, members could scarcely know that for six years I have waited to secure the passage of a bill such as this. My immediate predecessor introduced the bill and it was favorably reported to the House. That was in the Forty-seventh Congress, and the Republican party gave its approval. He died with "hope deferred." I took up his mantle; and a favorable report, duplicating that which he had obtained, was made in the Forty-eighth Congress, the Democrats being then in control, and recognizing the merits of the measure, and I waited.

A favorable report followed from the Forty-ninth Congress, and again I waited. We met in December. The Committee of this House in the Fiftieth Congress reported in my favor—and I still wait.

Six years of this suffering on my part and two years of vicarious suffering on the part of my predecessor, and this is the first time I have had an opportunity to test the wishes of the House on the proposition so frequently reported. Thus, Mr. Speaker, was my hope deferred! Ought I to be made to bear this any longer? [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. You want to pass the bill, do you not?

Mr. PHELPS. Yes, I want to pass it—very much.

Mr. SPRINGER. All right, then.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let the report be read.

The SPEAKER. This is a Senate bill, and there is no report accompanying it. There is a House report, however.

Mr. PHELPS. I can state to the gentleman in a very few minutes the facts embodied in the report. They make a story of wonderful growth and prosperity. Paterson is a swarming hive. It already has a population of 75,000, and is rapidly growing——

Mr. McMILLIN. I think this had better be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. PHELPS. Then it will not be reached, I fear, during the session. I hope the gentleman will not insist, at least until he hears the facts in reference to the case.

I have consumed one minute of the time I asked for, I presume; now let me consume the other minute in giving the reasons for this bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have no desire to interrupt the passage of the bill; but this committee has days for the consideration of its business. It has already spent some time in presenting its measures before the House, and I think this had better take the usual course.

Mr. PHELPS. The committee report the same bill identically, except as to the amount involved.

Mr. McMILLIN. What amount does the House bill propose?

Mr. PHELPS. The House bill proposes an appropriation of $80,000; the Senate bill fixes the amount at $125,000. In view of the extent of the population there, I think that $125,000 is only a proper appropriation; but I am willing, so great is my anxiety for prompt action in this matter, to accept the $80,000 fixed by the House bill; but I think the gentleman from Tennessee, if he will recognize the fact that this town has a population of 75,000, and is growing rapidly, will scarcely refuse me the sum given by the Senate.

Mr. McMILLIN. Is there a court there?

Mr. PHELPS. There is no court.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let us have the report read.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair has stated, there is no report accompanying the Senate bill. There is a report with the House bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let us have the House report read, then.

Mr. PHELPS. That can be read if the gentleman desires it, or if he does not insist upon it, I will make, as I suggested, a brief statement covering all the points.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think we had better have the report read. Let us see what we are doing here.

The report (by Mr. DIBBLE) was read, as follows:

They found that no city in the State was growing in population and business so rapidly as Paterson. It had in 1850 11,000; in 1860, 19,000; in 1870, 33,000; in 1885, 62,500 inhabitants, by actual census. The estimated population January 1, 1888, was 71,000.

Paterson has large manufacturing industries, among which are over one hundred silk enterprises, with 18,000 operatives, employing a capital of $15,000,000; large rolling-mills, machine-shops, iron bridge-building establishments; large jute, flax, cotton, and thread factories, and many smaller industries, representing a large outlay of capital, and in the aggregate giving employment to many thousands of hands.

There are three great railway lines entering the city, which carry to and from it over 150 tons of freight daily.

The gross receipts of the Paterson post-office are large and regularly increasing. The receipts for the year ending June, 1880, were $24,822.85; for the year ending June 30, 1887, $35,118.20 gross; $15,436 net. The receipts for three quarters of the year 1887 were $26,019.27, and the receipts on that basis for the present fiscal year will be over $40,000, which will make Paterson a first-class post-office. The large foreign population makes the international money-order business very large, to transact which requires more office accommodations.

The deputy collector of United States revenue at Paterson collects, as a tax on liquor sellers, tobacco and cigar manufacturers, $73,000 per annum, and seven breweries pay a malt-liquor tax of $18,000 per year. This amount is paid in Paterson alone, while there is collected here for the district a large additional sum.

In consideration of the foregoing facts, and especially the fact that Paterson pays into the United States Treasury about $300,000 a year, your committee would recommend the passage of the accompanying substitute for bill H. R. 624.

Mr. McMILLIN. It seems that there is need for a building there for a post-office, but at the same time it would appear that the amount fixed by the House bill is ample. The gentleman from New Jersey has indicated his willingness to accept that as the amount to be appropriated for this building. With that understanding I will not interpose any objection to the present consideration of the bill, not, however, with the view of getting it increased in a conference report, which is privileged, but with the understanding that the House stands by its action and recommendation.

Mr. PHELPS. I move, then, to amend the Senate bill by striking out "$125,000" and inserting "$80,000."

There being no objection, the bill was considered, the amendment agreed to, and the bill as amended ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, was passed.

Mr. PHELPS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING, VICKSBURG, MISS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 786) to provide a building for the use of the United States courts, post-office, custom-office, and internal-revenue office at Vicksburg, Miss.; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I ask unanimous consent that the House take up that bill now for consideration, and in this connection, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to take this bill up for present consideration.

The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be constructed a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults, at Vicksburg, in the State of Mississippi, for the accommodation of the United States courts, post-office, custom-office, and internal-revenue office, at a cost not exceeding $100,000, including cost of site; nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and no purchase of site, nor plan for said building, shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the said sum of $100,000 for site and building: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be expended until the plans, specifications, and full estimates for said building shall have been made according to law, and a valid title to the land for the site of said building shall be vested in the United States, and the State of Mississippi shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of any civil process therein: And provided further, That the site so purchased or acquired by condemnation proceedings shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than 40 feet, including streets and alleys.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the report will be read.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Let me say to my friend from Indiana that the Senate bill is a fac-simile copy of the bill reported from the committee of the House, also that this precise bill passed the Senate in two Congresses and has been favorably reported upon twice by the House committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the House report will be read, at least.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I have no objection to the reading of the report, but I think I may probably be able to save the time of the House by making a statement as to what it embodies.

Mr. HOLMAN. Have you Federal courts there?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the population of the city?

Mr. CATCHINGS. It is now about 22,000, and is rapidly growing.

Mr. HOLMAN. How long have you had Federal courts established there?

Mr. CATCHINGS. They have been established for the last three years, and the business of the courts is constantly growing.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will suggest that possibly a smaller sum would be sufficient than that proposed by the bill.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I think not, and hope the gentleman will not press that point. Property is quite valuable there, building sites are difficult to obtain, and the gentleman knows that it is a hilly city and the site will necessarily involve a considerable outlay. I think the amount proposed here is as small an amount as could very well be applied to that purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. Under the circumstances stated I will not interpose any objection.

Mr. BURROWS. Is there a report on the House bill?

The SPEAKER. There is.

Mr. BURROWS. I would like to hear that report read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read it.

The report (by Mr. DIBBLE) was read in part. In full it is as follows:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1591) providing for a public building at Vicksburg, Miss., having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report as follows:

Vicksburg is situated on the Mississippi River, and is the largest and most important city in the State. It has now a population of about 20,000. It is the western terminus of the Vicksburg and Meridian Railway, and the eastern terminus of the Vicksburg, Shreveport and Pacific Railway, and the Louisville, New Orleans and Texas Railway, running from Memphis to New Orleans, passes directly through the city.

It is the northern terminus of a tri-weekly line of magnificent boats plying between New Orleans and Vicksburg, and the southern terminus of a tri-weekly line of boats plying between St. Louis and Vicksburg.

It is the home port of a numerous fleet of boats plying the Yazoo, Tallahatchee, Sunflower, Coldwater, Yallobusha, Big Black, and other rivers, tributaries of the Mississippi River. It is the market for between 70,000 and 80,000 bales of cotton, and handles in transit and otherwise about 200,000 bales.

Its commerce is about twenty millions. It has three banks, two foundries, saw-mills, planing-mills, oil-mills, sash, door, spoke, and blind factories, and very extensive lumber-yards.

The shops of the Louisville, New Orleans and Texas Railway have lately been located there, and will add largely to the business and population of the city. The shops of the Vicksburg and Meridian Railway are in part located there.

It has churches of all denominations, and the finest public schools in the State.

It has a telephone exchange, street railroads, and is lighted by electricity. It has two daily and three weekly newspapers. Most of the streets are handsomely graveled and all of them will soon be. A fine system of water-works is just about completed.

One of the largest and most beautiful of the national cemeteries is in the northern suburbs. The Government pays now for the post-office there $1,240 per annum, but it is small and wholly insufficient for the business. The receipts of the office for the fiscal year 1885 were $17,279.

It is a distributing office for a large area of country, and as new lines of railway are rapidly and continually increasing mail facilities the business of the office is rapidly increasing in volume and importance. A suitable building for the post-office could not be had there now for less than $3,000 per annum.

The Government maintains a signal office there, which costs $180 per annum; the offices of the Government engineers, located permanently there, cost $540 per annum. These offices are also small and insufficient.

There are also a collector of customs and a deputy revenue collector located there. Terms of the United States circuit and district courts are held regularly there, but under many disadvantages, as they are held in the building occupied by the State courts and by courtesy only.

The city of Vicksburg is steadily increasing in population, business, and wealth, and the expenses of the Government in maintaining its various offices there will soon be far greater than they are at present.

In view of the foregoing facts your committee unanimously recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment, namely:

Strike out the words "twenty-five" in line 8 of the bill.

Mr. BURROWS (interrupting the reading). I have heard sufficient of the report to learn that Vicksburg has telephones, street railroads, and is lighted by electricity. I wish to know how much the Senate bill carries.

Mr. CATCHINGS. One hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. BURROWS. And how much does the House bill carry?

Mr. CATCHINGS. One hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. BURROWS. I think, in view of the condition of the streets and of the electric lights, it is more than fair that this bill should pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CHEADLE. I object.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I ask that the bill shall remain on the Speaker's table.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. CATCHINGS said: The gentleman from Indiana withdraws his objection to the bill for the public building at Vicksburg.

Mr. CHEADLE. I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection to the request made by the gentleman from Mississippi? The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CATCHINGS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The corresponding House bill (H. R. 1591) was laid on the table.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House bills of the Senate of the following titles; which were severally read twice, and referred to the committees indicated:

The bill (S. 2475) to increase the appropriation for the erection of a public building at Winona, Minn.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The bill (S. 2546) to appropriate $12,000 for the completion of the public building at Peoria, Ill., and increasing the limit of the cost of said building—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The bill (S. 2278) for the improvement and enlargement of the public building at Petersburgh, Va.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The bill (S. 2315) granting the right of way to the Yankton and Missouri Valley Railway Company through the Yankton Indian reservation, in Dakota—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

BRIDGES ACROSS KENTUCKY RIVER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 2481) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Kentucky River and its tributaries by the Louisville, Cincinnati and Virginia Railway Company; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. TAULBEE. I ask unanimous consent to consider this bill at the present time. The same bill has been reported by the House Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

Mr. TAULBEE. I ask unanimous consent also that the reading of the bill be dispensed with, as it is in the exact form recommended by the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers. It is a bridge bill in the ordinary form.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky also requests unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the title of the bill be again read.

The title of the bill was again read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TAULBEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The corresponding House bill (H. R. 8769) was laid on the table.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House bills of the Senate of the following titles; which were severally read twice, and referred to the committees indicated:

The bill (S. 2674) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Nebraska City, Nebr., and for other purposes—to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (S. 2690) granting a pension to John Gallagher—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill (S. 2845) granting to the corporate authorities of the city of Tuscaloosa, in the State of Alabama, all the right, title, and interest of the United States to fractional sections 22 and 15, lying south of the Black Warrior River, in township 21 and range 10 west—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill (S. 2941) to incorporate the National Academy of Dental Science—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (S. 2973) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section 1661 of the Revised Statutes, making an annual appropriation to provide arms and equipments for the militia—to the Committee on the Militia.

The bill (S. 54) for the relief R. G. Combs and others—to the Committee on Claims.

RETURN OF SENATE BILL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a request from the Senate to return the bill (S. 1948) to authorize the Fort Smith and Choctaw Bridge Company to construct a bridge across the Poteau River, in the Choctaw Nation, near Fort Smith, Ark.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection this request will be granted, and the Clerk will be directed to return the bill to the Senate.

S. H. PEARCE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 2883) for the relief of S. H. Pearce; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. McRAE. I ask unanimous consent that that bill be now considered. It only involves $80, as a refund for an excess of purchase-money for certain property bought from the United States twenty years ago.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $80 be paid to S. H. Pearce, of Columbia County, Arkansas, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for excess of purchase-money paid by him for certain lands in said county.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McRAE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The corresponding House bill (H. R. 4482) was laid on the table.

ELEVENTH CENSUS.

On motion of Mr. COX, by unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. 1659) providing for taking the eleventh and subsequent censuses was recommitted to the Select Committee on the Eleventh Census.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR.

The SPEAKER appointed as managers of the conference on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendments of the bill (H. R. 8560) to establish a department of labor, Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, Mr. FRENCH, and Mr. BUCHANAN.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted, as follows:

To Mr. HAYDEN, on account of important business.

To Mr. LAIRD, for the remainder of this week, on account of important business.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 92) for the relief of Morgan Rawls;

A bill (H. R. 1394) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase additional grounds for the accommodation of Government offices in Council Bluffs, Iowa;

A bill (H. R. 4467) for the erection of a public building at Bar Harbor, in Maine;

A bill (H. R. 7938) to enlarge, improve, and make repairs upon the United States court-house and post-office building in Atlanta, Ga., and to appropriate money therefor;

A bill (S. 325) granting to the Billings, Clark's Fork and Cooke City Railroad Company the right of way through the Crow Indian reservation;

A bill (S. 339) granting a pension to Eliza Douglass;

A bill (S. 626) granting an increase of pension to Andrew Franklin, alias McKee;

A bill (S. 737) granting a pension to Berry Day;

A bill (S. 739) granting a pension to Johanna Loewinger;

A bill (S. 1298) granting a pension to Mary Gammell;

A bill (S. 1300) granting a pension to Cordelia R. Jones;

A bill (S. 1477) granting a pension to Harlow B. Hyde;

A bill (S. 1478) granting a pension to George W. Peavey;

A bill (S. 2651) to remove the political disabilities of John Rutledge, of South Carolina; and

INAUGURATION DAY.

Mr. LEE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 8043) and put it upon its passage. It is a bill to amend section 993 of the Revised Statutes for the District of Columbia, so as to make inauguration day a holiday within said District.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 993 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the District of Columbia, be, and the same hereby is, amended by adding to the days therein declared to be holidays within the said District that day upon which the President of the United States is inaugurated, otherwise called Inauguration Day, and that such day shall be a holiday for all the purposes mentioned in said section.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING, SACRAMENTO, CAL.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1554) to provide for the erection of a public building at Sacramento, Cal., and that it be now put upon its passage.

The bill was read.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, that seems to be rather an extraordinary bill, and I propose that it be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The SPEAKER. It has been reported from the committee and is now on the Calendar.

Mr. BLAND. Well, I think we have enough of these public buildings for the present, and therefore I object, and call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to dispense with the morning hour, with the understanding that gentlemen having reports to present may file them with the Clerk.

Mr. SPINOLA. I understand the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] consents to withdraw the call for the regular order temporarily so that I may ask for the consideration of a joint resolution which has been favorably reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BLAND. I understand that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPINOLA] is obliged to leave the House, and I withdraw for a moment the call for the regular order.

ANNIVERSARY OF BATTLE OF GETTYSBURGH.

Mr. SPINOLA. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 169) appropriating $25,000 for the celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the battle of Gettysburgh.

The joint resolution was read.

Mr. BLAND. I very much dislike to object, but——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I trust the gentleman will not object. This is to provide for a reunion of soldiers of the country—the survivors of the Army of Northern Virginia and the Army of the Potomac. The resolution comes from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. KERR. I object.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask the gentleman to allow me to make a brief statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has objected.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But I trust he will give me time——

Mr. McMILLIN. I call for the regular order. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR] has objected to the consideration of this measure; therefore, let us go on with regular business.

Mr. TAULBEE. I have a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. A motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] is pending.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I understand the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR] consents to withdraw his objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has demanded the regular order.

Mr. BLAND. I think we had better proceed with the regular business of the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] to dispense with the morning hour for the presentation of reports.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia now asks unanimous consent that gentlemen desiring to make reports may file them with the Clerk for reference to the appropriate Calendars. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

FILING OF REPORTS.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

REVISED STATUTES, UNITED STATES.

Mr. COLLINS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (S. 554) to amend Title LX, chapter 3, of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES KELLEY.

Mr. LANE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 2074) granting a pension to James Kelley; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL E. WILSON.

Mr. LANE also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 8931) for the relief of Samuel E. Wilson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DANIEL K. HARRIS.

Mr. MATSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 9920) granting a pension to Daniel K. Harris; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

FLORA HEATH.

Mr. MATSON also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 5529) granting a pension to Flora Heath; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DOROTHEA RUOFF.

Mr. MATSON also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 4825) granting a pension to Dorothea Ruoff; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARGARET J. M'QUARY.

Mr. MATSON also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 8571) granting a pension to Margaret J. McQuary; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN K. THOMPSON.

Mr. MATSON also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 9690) granting a pension to John K. Thompson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. MATSON also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back the following bills adversely; which were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 9036) granting a pension to Elizabeth Hallis;
A bill (H. R. 7475) granting a pension to Pauline T. Carpenter;
A bill (H. R. 5943) granting a pension to John Sheafer;
A bill (H. R. 2119) granting a pension to Ardenia Dillon;
A bill (H. R. 6063) granting a pension to Hila E. Geyer;
A bill (H. R. 4823) granting a pension to John A. Dean;
A bill (H. R. 7012) granting increase of pension to James M. Herrington;
A bill (H. R. 5364) granting a pension to Mary Whipple; and
A bill (H. R. 9139) granting a pension to Bridget Tole.

ARMS AND CARTRIDGES LOANED TO THE STATE OF OREGON.

Mr. LAWLER, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 4447) to credit the Territory of Washington on the books of the Ordnance Department the sum of $12,387.57 for arms and cartridges loaned the State of Oregon; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

C. C. ROBERTS.

Mr. LAWLER also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably with an amendment the bill (H. R. 3557) for the relief of C. C. Roberts; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ELIZABETH BAUER.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 981) granting a pension to Elizabeth Bauer; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BRIDGET WHITE.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio, also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2450) placing the name of Bridget White on the pension-rolls; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LENA NEWNINGER.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio, also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2452) placing the name of Lena Newninger on the pension-rolls; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JULIA B. M'COMB.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio, also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2087) granting a pension to Julia B. McComb; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BENJAMIN M. FISHER.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio, also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1314) granting an increase of pension to Benjamin M. Fisher; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RAILWAY THROUGH INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 7186) to authorize the Leavenworth and Rio Grande Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced the adoption of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 5445) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

VISITORS TO THE UNITED STATES NAVAL ACADEMY.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of the following gentlemen as the Board of Visitors to the United States Naval Academy: GEORGE D. WISE of Virginia, WILLIAM MCADOO of New Jersey, and CHARLES A. BOUTELLE of Maine.

VISITORS TO UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY.

The SPEAKER also announced the appointment of Mr. A. P. FITCH, of New York, on the Board of Visitors to the United States Military Academy, in lieu of Mr. STEELE, resigned.

THOMAS A. OSBORN.

Mr. TAULBEE submitted a report; which was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2216) for the relief of Thomas A. Osborn, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

W. P. TAULBEE,
C. H. MANSUR,
DANIEL KERR,
Managers on the part of the House.

JOHN. C. SPOONER,
GEORGE F. HOAR,
CHARLES J. FAULKNER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The following statement of the House conferees, submitted in accordance with the rule, was read:

Statement of conferees on the part of the House of Representatives, on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2214) for the relief of Thomas A. Osborn.

The conferees recommend that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment is as follows: Strike out all after "Osborn," in line 8, down to end of bill.

W. P. TAULBEE,
C. H. MANSUR,
DANIEL KERR,
Conferees on the part of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope we shall have some explanation of this matter.

Mr. TAULBEE. I ask that the amendment of the Senate, which, if this report be adopted, will be concurred in, be read.

The Clerk read the amendment of the Senate, as follows:

Strike out the following:

"Provided, It shall be proven to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that said money was lost without fault or negligence upon the part of said Osborn."

Mr. TAULBEE. If any further explanation is desired, I am ready to give it.

The conference report was adopted.

Mr. TAULBEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of further considering the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. TURNER, of Georgia, in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9345) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Chairman, I ask consent that we return to line 43 of the bill for the purpose of adopting an amendment, to insert after the word "hundred" the words "and eighty-two;" so as to make the appropriation for the star-route service $5,482,000 instead of $5,400,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. I object.

Mr. MCRAE. The sum which this amendment proposes to appropriate conforms to the estimate of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, whose duty it is to award these contracts.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] is not in order.

Mr. BLOUNT. Debate is not in order; and I do not care to go into any discussion now as to whether the item which we have passed is proper.

The Clerk read as follows:

For mail-messenger service, $900,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to amend the clause just read by inserting, after the word "hundred," the words "and fifty;" so as to make the appropriation for the mail-messenger service $950,000. Some recent information furnished by the adjustment of accounts discloses that by the end of the fiscal year the sum which I now propose will be required; that the actual increase of the service will necessitate the expenditure of this amount. If there is any objection to the amendment I will have read several letters from the Department with reference to this matter.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD for the information of the Senate two letters in reference to the amendment just agreed to.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

The letters are as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., March 23, 1888.

SIR: In my letter of estimates of amounts to be appropriated for this office for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, dated October 21, 1887, I recommended that the appropriation for the mail-messenger service for the fiscal year should be $900,000, the same amount as the appropriation for the current year. That estimate was made on the basis of the service as reported to the 30th of September, 1887. Since the date of that letter I have carefully gone over this estimate of the service, and have noted the increases which have taken place, and have reached the conclusion that the sum there stated as necessary for the fiscal year 1888-'89 should be increased. From the report of the clerk in charge of the mail-messenger service I find that the increases during the last few months have been considerable, exceeding the expectations entertained by me at the time of my submission of the letter of estimates. During the month of February the increase was $11,109.35, and for the twenty-one days of this month the increase has been $7,107.08.

The rapid and extraordinary extension and increase in the railway mail service during the last six months has created a necessity for an increase in this mail-messenger service beyond any former experience of this office. The number of routes in operation on June 30, 1887, was 5,518. The net increase since that date up to March 21, in number of routes, is 259, and the increase in the rate of cost thereof has been $32,976.56.

The rate of cost of this service on the 30th of June, 1887, was	$829,548.81
The rate of cost on March 21, 1888, was	862,525.14
Being a net increase since June 30, 1887, of	32,976.33
The appropriation for mail-messenger service for the current fiscal year is	$900,000.00
The rate of cost of same to March 21, 1888, is	862,525.14
Leaving an unexpended balance on March 21, 1888, of	37,474.86

Should the increase for the ensuing three months be at the same rate as that of the present month of March and the preceding month of February, the whole of the appropriation would be more than exhausted by the end of the current fiscal year. We would then begin the fiscal year of 1888 with an expenditure larger than the appropriation asked for, which is the same in amount as the current year, to wit, $900,000.

While I do not anticipate that the increase per month in this service for the balance of the year will reach the average of the increase of the two months above mentioned, to wit, February and March, which average would be $9,108.21, still I am persuaded that the increase will be very considerable, and the appropriation mentioned in my letter of estimates of October 21, 1887, of $900,000 will not be adequate to meet the requirements of the service for the ensuing fiscal year.

Under these circumstances, I have the honor to request that a letter be addressed to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of the House of Representatives asking that the appropriation for the mail messenger service for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1888, and ending June 30, 1889, be $950,000 instead of $900,000, as asked in said letter of estimates of October 21, 1887, being an increase of $50,000 on that estimate.

Very respectfully,

A. LEO KNOTT,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., May 14, 1888.

SIR: I inclose herewith a copy of a letter addressed to you under date of March 23, 1887, calling your attention to the unexpected and unprecedented increase in the rate of cost of the mail messenger service for the months of January and February of this year, and suggesting the necessity for revising the estimate for this branch of the service, submitted in my letter to the Postmaster-General under date of October 21, 1887.

In view of the facts then before the Department, I thought that the estimate of $900,000 per annum would be sufficient for the fiscal year beginning on the 1st of July, 1888, but the large increase in the extension of the railway mail service has brought with it a very large increase in the cost of the mail messenger service, as shown by the increase in the cost for the first two months of this year, and I had the honor to suggest, in said letter of March 23, last, the advisability of increasing the estimate to $950,000 for the next fiscal year.

In an interview with Hon. James H. Blount, chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of the House of Representatives, he informed me that the letter of March 23 had not reached him.

Upon referring to the books of the Department I find that the increase in the rate of cost for the month of March of the present year was $10,351.01, and for the month of April $10,098.76, showing that the increase spoken of in my letter of the 23d of March is likely to continue.

The average rate of increase per month last year was but $2,400.

It is apparent from the above statements that the increase for this year will be much in excess of that of last year, and enforces the necessity for an increase in the appropriation for the next fiscal year of at least the sum I have suggested, namely, $50,000, making the whole estimate $950,000 per annum.

I have the honor to request that the above facts be brought to the attention of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of the House of Representatives.

Very respectfully,

A. LEO KNOTT,
Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. DON M. DICKINSON,
Postmaster-General.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of agent and assistants to distribute stamps, and expenses of agency, $8,000.

Mr. PERKINS. I was engaged for a moment in conversation with a member, and did not observe when the Clerk read lines 59, 60, and 61. I desire to offer an amendment to that clause, and I ask consent that we return to it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I must object. I have just objected to a similar request made by a gentleman on this side.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the pay of agents and assistants to distribute postal-cards, and expenses of agency, $7,800.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to make an inquiry in reference to a preceding paragraph.

Mr. BLOUNT. Which paragraph does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. HOLMAN. The paragraph preceding the one the Clerk is now reading.

Mr. BLOUNT. What line?

Mr. HOLMAN. It is in lines 75, 76, and 77, and I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of agent and assistants to distribute stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, and letter-sheets, and expenses of agency, $16,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me there is a remarkable increase in amount.

The CHAIRMAN. To what does the gentleman refer?

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is not a marked increase. The gentleman is mistaken. It is identically the sum appropriated for the present fiscal year.

Mr. HOLMAN. Sixteen thousand dollars.

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. Perhaps I am mistaken. I thought the whole appropriation was $8,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. We appropriated for the next fiscal year what has been appropriated for this fiscal year.

The Clerk read as follows:

For miscellaneous items, $1,000.

Mr. PERKINS. I move to strike out the last word. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to this bill in good faith asking for an additional appropriation for the postal-clerk service of the country.

As was stated by me yesterday, the amount appropriated for this fiscal year is $5,246,790.21. That is an increase over the appropriation of last year of $256,549.59. This is but an increase of 5 per cent., while the increase of the railway mail service has been substantially an increase of 10 per cent.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we of the great West know that we have not adequate and efficient service. I ask to have read a letter from one of these postal clerks running on the Missouri Pacific system from Hannibal, Mo., to the city of Denison, in the State of Texas, to show the overwork of the clerks and the unsatisfactory work on that line.

DENISON, TEX., February 20, 1888.

SIR: Yours of 8th instant received. In reply I would say that the mail service in this the seventh division is in a very bad shape. In the first place, the superintendent, Thomas, knows nothing about the mail service on our line, which runs from Sedalia, Mo., to Denison, Tex. There is being carried into Denison almost every day from one to three thousand pounds of mail unworked. It is impossible for the present force to do the work even if they were all good and experienced men, but with one-fourth of the force that are new and inexperienced men it is so much worse. There are several of the men that are going to quit on the account they can not stand these hard runs. I have sent in my resignation, to take effect on the 1st day of April, 1888, so do not make my name public until after that time. I can not give you all the details on paper, for they are legions; but that the mails are not being worked up and properly dispatched is of daily occurrence. We have reported all failures, but the superintendent, Thomas, pays no attention to it. That he is the most complete failure is evident to new as well as old clerks, not only on this line but on all the main lines in his division. I see a Senator from Texas defending the Postmaster-General. If he knew the amount of mail that was detained by the small force on this line I think he would change his mind.

This mail (unworked) that I spoke of is delayed from twelve to twenty-four hours, and the men on the line are doing all it is possible for men to do to work and forward it, but they have double the mail they ought to have for the amount of men. Superintendent Thomas has ordered all old and new clerks alike for examination; that to the old men is as useless as the fifth wheel to a wagon, but he wants to make a big show and advertise his ability as civil servicer, but does not seem to care anything about the mail being worked. If there is anything further that I can do for you, write after my resignation takes effect. You make any information I have public and give the author of what I say, for I can prove all I have stated here and a great deal more that I can not think of now. Hoping this will be satisfactory,

I am yours, etc.,

WILEY ANDERSON.

B. W. PERKINS.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. PERKINS. I will withdraw the pending amendment, and move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman who wrote that letter which has just been read at the Clerk's desk was one of these clerks, and one of the most efficient in the service. He had served for years; was chief clerk of his car, and knows exactly what he is speaking about.

As I suggested yesterday, Mr. Chairman, the complaints which are made in reference to this matter are without distinction of class or party. The people ask for larger, better, and more efficient service. I have a bundle of papers here representing all organizations, all parties, and all classes of people, asking for this service. I should like to have them all read for the information of the House, but will have to content myself by asking to have read an extract from the Savannah News, whose political orthodoxy can not be doubted.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Savannah News.]

It is very sad to have to confess the fact, but every day is making it more apparent that the Republican administration of the Post-Office Department in this part of the country was much better than what our friends the Democrats are giving us.

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. PERKINS. I next ask to have read an extract from the "Herald and Presbyter" of March 14, 1888, published at Cincinnati, Ohio. The Doctor Babb referred to is one of the editors, who has for fifteen years lived at or near San José, Cal.

The Herald and Presbyter, while owned, I believe, by Republicans, is in no sense a political or partisan sheet, and has about 20,000 subscribers.

The Clerk read as follows:

To Subscribers: We are having trouble with our mails, and would therefore caution subscribers about sending money without taking necessary precautions. We have failed to receive many letters during the past three months. Two letters have failed to reach us from Dr. Babb, the first failure in fifteen years. Last week his regular letter did not come, and this week we have not received the Sabbath-school lesson, and have substituted another. We hope this will not occur again. The safest way to remit money is by bank drafts, payable to our order or post-office money-orders.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask the Clerk to read an extract from the Chicago Tribune.

The Clerk read as follows:

PROVIDING AGAINST POSTAL BLUNDERS.

[Chicago Tribune.]

"You'll write me, John, of course?" said the wife of a Chicago man who was packing his valise for a journey East.

"Certainly, Maria," he replied. "I have already written several letters and deposited them in the post-office here, and as soon as I reach Philadelphia I shall mail you two or three more by special delivery. You know I am only to be away three weeks, and I am almost confident some of those letters will reach you before I return. Keep up a good heart, Maria. We are in the hands of a Democratic Administration, but the Lord reigns over all."

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. PERKINS. Here is an extract from the Abiline Gazette, which is ex-Governor Glick's paper. He is an ex-governor of my own State, and is the United States pension agent at Topeka. He is the only Democrat ever elected governor of Kansas; hence his orthodoxy can not be questioned. He is now engaged in manipulating the politics of the State in the interest of His Excellency Grover Cleveland.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. PERKINS. I will withdraw my amendment and move to strike out the last three words in order that I may complete my statement.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask the Clerk to read an extract which I send up from Ex-Governor Glick's paper, The Abilene Gazette, of the 22d of January.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Glick's paper (Abilene Gazette) about 22d of January.]

RELIEF! RELIEF! RELIEF!

The time has come, in fact it came long ago, for the United States postal authorities to do something for the Western mail service. We do not know whether the rank service which we have been receiving is due to incompetency or lack of sufficient help, but one thing we do know, and that is, it is about as weak as the people are going to stand by and accept without kicking vigorously.

For months past pouch after pouch of mail has been carried beyond Abilene and returned on the next train from six to twelve hours late.

Day after day, week in and week out, this office has received numerous and repeated complaints of failure to receive papers. We have traced the matter down and find that it is due to the rotten mail service. We are possessed of ordinary patience, but the time has gone by for us to longer remain silent.

We have from time to time submitted calmly to the outrageous service which this Western country has received from the postal authorities.

We propose to do it no longer. From now on we are going to howl loud and long until relief of some kind is given us.

To Mr. R. M. Thomas, superintendent of the railway mail service, St. Louis, Mo.: Will you do something to relieve this disgraceful condition of affairs?

To Hon. Don M. Dickinson, Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C.: Can you stand by and see us suffer in this way without helping us?

To Grover Cleveland, President of the United States, Executive Mansion: We appeal lastly to you for advice and assistance. Exert your influence, give us a good postal service and we will do our best to carry Kansas for you in November.

To the Stoughton bottles Kansas is misrepresented by in Congress: Why do you stand idly by and see your constituents suffering for lack of postal facilities or incompetency of present employés? Why don't you make the Postmaster-General's life a dreary waste until you obtain relief for us?

Mr. PERKINS. Now, that is some excuse, coming from a representative Democratic organ of our State, for the motion which I made here, and to which such strenuous objection was made. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the members of our State have been charged with incompetency and with idleness because we do not and did not insist that the Administration should give better mail facilities and mail service to our people, because we do not make the life of the Postmaster-General a dreary waste until this better service is secured. [Laughter.] And yet on yesterday, when I contended for this thing in the interest of our people, I was charged with raising "sectional considerations" and "partisan issues."

Mr. Chairman, if we were given the powers of omnipotence we might accomplish all asked of us, but without the power to perform miracles we can not hope to secure an efficient and satisfactory mail service with the Democratic party in power.

Why, sir, the complaint that I have made is universal. It is not political or partisan. It comes from all classes. It is to be ascribed almost entirely to the inefficiency of the mail service, and yet perhaps not entirely to that. My attention has been called to the case of a postmaster recently appointed in one of the districts of my own State which well illustrates some of our difficulties. For a number of days the postal clerk running on the train past that point received no mail whatever from that office, and not understanding the reason, one morning when the train was halting there he ran over to the post-office and asked the reason for this condition of things. He was coolly informed by the new appointee, the representative of this Administration, that the sack was not yet full and he was not ready to send it out. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

I heard of another case down in my friend's country, somewhere in Southwestern Missouri, who called upon the Administration at Washington for some postage-stamps, and they sent them to him in great blocks or sheets. He never had seen them in that form before, the two or three that he had had occasion to buy during the course of his lifetime at 2 or 3 cents each, the prevailing price, were always separated, and when they came to him in the form of sheets he concluded at once that they were circus posters [laughter], and hung one of them up on the door of his office and called his wife to look at it. He told her to come and see what the "durned fools had sent him from Washington; when he writ them for postage-stamps they sent him the circus posters." [Renewed laughter.] He told her, though, that he had never yet seen circus posters like them before; the circus riders were all exactly alike, and no place was given where the show was to come off. [Great laughter.]

Mr. WASHINGTON. Did that take place in the gentleman's own district?

Mr. PERKINS. No, sir; in the district of my friend from Missouri. [Renewed laughter.]

Now, some of the inefficiency in the mail service may be ascribed to such causes as that; and I have complaint after complaint from people all over the country because of the inadequacy of the mail service, and the inefficiency of those engaged in carrying it on.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Can you give the name of the postmaster in Kansas and the other one in Missouri to whom you have referred? What are their names? I would like to know so that we can have the matter corrected.

Mr. PERKINS. I do not like to give away political secrets, though I have no doubt I could give their names if necessary.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Does not the gentleman know that those stories were made up here in the city, and for political purposes?

Mr. PERKINS. I saw them in the newspapers, and give them here by way of illustration to show the efficient men appointed to office by this Administration. Having seen them in the newspapers I give them as actual occurrences, not supposing the newspapers would tell anything but the truth, and particularly concerning this "reform Administration." [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHINGTON. I suppose the gentleman saw them in Republican newspapers.

Mr. PERKINS. There is nothing political about such complaints, they come from all classes and all sections, and now in the name of a long suffering, long enduring, but Christian, forbearing people, I ask for better service.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. PERKINS. I will insert as a part of my remarks an extract from the Sedan Times-Journal, a paper published in my own district. The article appeared in the Times-Journal of the date of November 18, 1887:

JUST THE SAME.

The cussedness of our mail service remains just the same. Tuesday morning of this week a big mail arrived at this office. In the lot came 3 copies of the Chicago Daily Inter-Ocean, dated respectively the 9th, 11th, and 12th of November. Two copies of the Newton Republican, one dated the 10th and the other the 12th of November. Three copies of the Topeka Capital, one dated the 8th, one the 11th, and one the 12th of November. In our opinion there is positively no use to have any such "monkey work" as this. Take the Newton Republican for instance. It is printed in the morning in time for the early trains, and there is nothing on earth, except the utter carelessness or incompetency of the postal authorities, to prevent its arriving in Sedan on the evening of the day it is printed, yet it is invariably from two days to a week old when it arrives at Sedan. This is another thing for Colonel Vilas to give his attention to. The Kansas people are long-suffering and patient, and have no way to help themselves, but they will do some "mighty tall kicking" some time soon unless their mail service is medicated and lubricated and generally rejuvenated and regenerated.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I need only say that the newspaper attacks of the kind mentioned by the gentleman are common to all administrations, and that the record of this Department shows that even from Kansas the Democratic administration is freer from attacks even of Republican journals than the Republican administration was. I do not deem it, therefore, necessary or proper to go further in this matter. I think the House and the common sense of the country would suggest that if the gentleman desired to serve the people of Kansas by having these errors corrected he had better adopt the plan of going to the Department and making his complaints there, rather than parading them in the House.

I ask the Clerk to continue the reading of the bill.

Mr. TOOLE. I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I can not permit this opportunity to pass without condemning the policy which puts it in the power of the Post-Office Department to deny to the people on the frontier the inestimable privileges and benefits of adequate mail service, and then to shield itself behind a doubtful authority of law or an inadequate appropriation. I speak only for Montana. We have seen office after office discontinued because no service was ever put on, or having been put on was discontinued because, forsooth, the amount realized from the cancellation of stamps was not sufficient to pay for the service.

Who ever expected the star-route service, which was designed to reach the remotest settlements on our frontier, to be self-sustaining or return a net revenue to the Government? No such rule of construction ever obtained to such an extent before, and who can sanction it now with an ample Treasury? If this is the legitimate result of a strict adherence to a platform declaring in favor of "government economically administered," I confess I never suspected it, and take this occasion to say that a declaration of principles so vapid and illusory needs some reformation. No such cheese-paring, parsimonious economy can be justified in times of general prosperity, and especially when the demands for increased and better service are greater than ever before. Compared with other benefits secured to us the mail service is paramount. It is, and ought to be, independent of politics; it is the people's service; the rich and the poor, the weak and the strong, the citizen and the stranger, are alike entitled to its benefits. The remotest part of this land where homes and settlements are planted should have reasonable facilities for the acquisition of that intelligence which the mails alone can furnish. No other blessing of this Government enters so largely into the contentment and prosperity of the people or is so potent in carrying the star of empire into the wilderness. It is the forerunner of civilization, the nucleus around which communities grow and prosper, and without which intellectual retrogression and moral decay are inevitable.

I want to put on record what the public estimate in Montana is of the present star-route service which is accorded us. Here is an extract from a paper published in the heart of an agricultural and stock-raising community in Montana, and which is a fair reflex of public sentiment upon the present policy:

When men saw the United States mail carried out beyond the settlements, they followed in its wake, for wherever it penetrated they could build homes and enjoy life to a reasonable degree. And though we of Montana came in advance even of the pony express and planted the germ of civilization far out from the frontier, nearly 1,000 miles west of the mails on the same latitude and 500 miles north of the overland, the Government was gracious and soon sent the overland mails to our relief, and for twenty years has stood ready to extend its lines as settlement has progressed, thus insuring a speedy and rapid development, and we have felt happy that we were a part of a government so watchful over the interest of the struggling pioneers in the far West and so ever ready to listen to their appeals and grant the request.

The distance to many of our homes has been lengthened into weeks. The great West has been made a thousand miles more remote, and we can see nothing so great after all about our boasted best government upon which the sun ever shone. The economic policy has ruined the star-route service and left those points not favored by a railroad practically out of the world. Had we never enjoyed the benefits of an expeditious service we might probably have been content with the miserable apology that is now called a mail service. But having once had a good service and our frontier homes having for these years been gladdened with the news of the world fresh and crisp, it is galling in the extreme to be turned back twenty years in the scale of progress.

The nation grew and prospered under the former system of service and we heard nothing of the Territories being a burden. But to-day while the present Administration is puzzling how to prevent the accumulation of millions in the national vaults the West is stinted with a beggarly service not half equal to the demands or to what it once enjoyed. And stranger still there are men and newspapers in our midst who are acquainted with all these facts who will say they indorse the present policy of the Administration. We believe in a judicious exercise of judgment in the distribution of the funds of the nation, but there is a vast difference between a wise and careful exercise of justice and the puritanic and parsimonious policy to which the country is now subjected. The people of the Territories having no voice in national affairs seem to have no rights that the powers at Washington are bound to respect, and there is certainly nothing in which it could make its neglect and total disregard more keenly felt than in the distribution of our mails.

Many of these things are plain and unvarnished truths and ought to be told, and the fact that I am in political accord with the majority of this House furnishes no excuse or justification for their suppression upon my part; but, upon the contrary, impels me to disclose them here and now in the earnest hope that justice to the people on the frontier shall no longer be delayed or denied and that the grievances complained of may be speedily remedied.

During the delivery of the foregoing the hammer fell.

Mr. ROGERS took the floor, and yielded his time to Mr. TOOLE, who then resumed and concluded his remarks as above.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. Chairman, every suggestion made by my friend from Montana applies with equal force to the Territory which I represent on this floor. In no branch of the public service has complaint been more widespread and universal than in connection with the mail service as now conducted in Washington Territory; and every day's mail comes to me freighted with complaints from every direction, that the mail service, as at present administered, does not begin to afford the measure of relief to those people that they enjoyed under former administrations.

I submit, while I am in hearty accord with every suggestion looking to the reduction of public expenditures and an economical administration of the affairs of the Government, that it is unwise economy to strike at the people's service—the mail service—which is established not for the purpose of enriching the Government by reason of the revenues arising therefrom, but for the purpose of giving to the people the facilities which their business interests require.

I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that the people of Washington Territory, a large proportion of them, were not born in that remote region of the Republic. They have peopled heretofore the States of this Union. They have enjoyed the benefits which attend upon State governments, and it is now especially trying to them to be deprived of those benefits which they have heretofore enjoyed. I have considered it right and proper that I should place myself on record in this connection and demand for the people I represent that measure of relief which their splendid resources and their rapidly increasing business interests so imperatively demand.

Mr. CANNON. As regards the postal service, the trouble is not in an insufficient amount of money being appropriated. Whatever trouble may exist, the appropriation at both sessions of the last Congress were far more liberal for the service all along the line than they have been since I have been coming to the House, a period dating back some twelve or fourteen years ago.

Now, I can readily see how the gentlemen upon the other side after a change of administration could claim with force that there should be a change in the offices; they could say that they are responsible, and being responsible they should have their friends in power. I am not here to combat that proposition as a general proposition. I believe, however, that it should have some exceptions; and the most marked exception to my mind ought to be made in connection with the postal administration of this country.

Mr. DOCKERY. Has not that exception applied under this Administration?

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman asks me whether that exception has not applied under this Administration. I answer by no manner of means. It is true when the Administration came into power it could not in the twinkling of an eye discharge the employés in the railway postal service; but it did discharge them as rapidly as possible, and more rapidly than the good of the service demanded. That is so in my section, and, I understand, it is so all over the country; and much of the trouble has come from the discharge of trained employés who understood their business, and of the appointment of new employés who had to be educated, and many of whom are slow of education.

Mr. DOCKERY. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that he differs from his colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], who conceded that the Administration was unpartisan in that Department.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman is wrong in making that statement. I stated distinctly as to the $800-grade men, who are the lowest in the service, every man of them had been dismissed; but the higher-grade men, who required years of experience, have not been dismissed, because the Administration did not dare to dismiss them.

Mr. CANNON. I will say further that I am not familiar with the service east of the Alleghanies, but I know in my section the removals have been by the wholesale. Nobody ever heard me complain of that, except in so far as it affected the service. I think the Post-Office Committee might well devote its attention to legislation—the Democratic party being in power—that looks to making permanent during efficiency and good behavior the positions of the railway postal employés without reference to which party has the administration, because it is poor satisfaction to either a Democrat or Republican through the country when his letters and papers go astray and the service is in a bad fix to be told that the mails are manipulated by a Democratic or Republican postal employé.

We want good service. I will acknowledge that in the early months of this Administration some allowance might be made for them with reference to this service.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to say just a few words more.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. CANNON. I renew it. I know from complaints I heard in my section of the country until the time I came here, and from reports that have reached me since, there is but little, if any, improvement in this service. I know an instance myself where it took nearly thirty days for a letter to travel a distance of 30 miles in my own State; and I know of frequent instances where two, three, and four days after the mailing of a letter it has not been delivered, when it should have been delivered in one day. I know of business people in my section that are driven, in sending important business letters, to use the express company, because they dare not trust their important mail to the Post-Office Department. I know of several instances of that kind where considerable loss and great trouble has been brought upon the citizens by the imperfect mail service.

Therefore I say again to my friend from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] and other gentlemen that the trouble is not on account of the failure to appropriate sufficient money; but it is on account of improper and negligent administration. But I want to be fair about this matter. I am not here to say that if the Republican party had come in and the Democratic party had gone out three years ago there would have been no complaint. I am here to speak of the fact as it is; and I say you may talk and you may appropriate all you choose, but except you reach the Postmaster-General and have the methods of administration improved your talk and your appropriations will be in vain.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, we are having several subjects thrust upon us here, some of which demand a few words of reply. The allegation is made with reference to the mail service in the Territories that under the present Administration it has not been so good as it has been in the past. Unfortunately for the country it happens that the Territories are the field where were located the operations of Mr. Brady which brought so much scandal upon the Department, necessitating a reform and debarring any return to those methods. Beyond that, sir, I say that the service in that part of the country, since it has reached a healthy basis, has been gradually and steadily improving, as shown by the official report.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. I would be glad to, but I have no time, because I have to answer other criticisms that have been made. Mr. Chairman, my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] rises here and, with all the authority of an official at the head of a Department, having at his command the reports of his subordinate officials in every branch of the service, announces an opinion as to the efficiency of postal employés. Now, if my friend did occupy the position of head of that Department and had the facilities for obtaining accurate information which that position would give him, I would cheerfully accept his conclusions.

I know his capacity, I know his integrity, I know his energy; but nevertheless, sir, I am quite certain that his information upon this subject is not so good as that of the gentleman at the head of the Department. I wish to tell him and the House now that the records show that in every section of the country there has been a gradual but decided improvement in the qualifications of the postal clerks. He has referred, and other gentlemen have referred, to the fact of new men being employed, and have intimated that that has resulted in a deterioration of the service. On the contrary, the records show that the standard of qualifications is higher now than at any previous time. The changes that have been made in the railway mail service have been made gradually, and there are a large number of employés now in that service who were in it when this Administration began.

But, sir, without reference to the political affiliations of postal employés, I say that the methods of examination adopted by a previous administration, and wisely adopted, establish the fact that the standard of merit is higher now than it ever was at any former period. Of course, sir, it is easy, and has been at any time in the history of the country easy for any of us, to tell of defects in the mail service. Negligent persons are sometimes employed in that service. I have myself known of errors that were very offensive to me and my own community, and they have occurred time and again for years past.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has made a statement with reference to the improved character of the service; has he the figures to support that statement? I would rather have the figures than the mere statement.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will take pleasure in having them put into the RECORD. I did not anticipate that after this whole subject had been gone over, a political discussion would be started at this stage of the bill; if I had any such anticipation I would have had the figures at hand.

The statistics of case examinations and errors continue to show favorably the improving efficiency and discipline of the service and the correction of abuses therein. The record of probationers receiving permanent appointment is higher than for several years past, as shown by the following averages:

Year ended June 30—	Per cent.
1883	80.37
1884	81.41
1885	83.11
1886	82.68
1887	85.34

Number of letters and pieces of other mail distributed in 1884	4,519,661,900
Number of errors made in the distribution of the same	1,167,223
Number of letters and pieces of other mail matter distributed to each error, 1884	3,872
Number of letters and pieces of other mail matter distributed to each error, 1883	4,153
Percentage of correct distribution, 1884	99.97+
Percentage of correct distribution, 1883	99.97+
Number of letters and pieces of other mail distributed during the fiscal year 1886	5,329,521,475
Number of errors made in the distribution of the same	1,260,443
Number of letters and pieces of other mail matter distributed to each error, 1886	4,228
Number of letters and pieces of other mail matter distributed to each error, 1885	5,574
Percentage of correct distribution, 1886	99.98—
Percentage of correct distribution, 1885	99.98+

In 1887 the number of pieces handled was 5,851,394,057, and the number of errors checked 1,734,617, being a correct distribution of 99.97 per cent. of all mail handled, or one error to every 3,373 pieces.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. ROGERS. I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, there is a vast deal of clap-trap in all this discussion about removals from public office under the present Administration, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] ought to be better advised before he assumes the right to say just what removals have been made throughout the country. It has not been a great while since I called upon the Post-Office Department for a list of all the persons who were in the railway mail service in Arkansas, with a statement of when they were appointed and by whom, and I undertake to say here now, upon my recollection, for the statement is not at hand just now—upon the authority of that official statement, made to me by the Department in writing, that not a single solitary removal had been made up to that time under the present Administration of the postal clerks employed in that State.

Mr. COX. How long ago was that?

Mr. ROGERS. It has been some months—perhaps a year, but not a great while. And I state now upon my own knowledge of what is going on in Arkansas that there has been to my knowledge only one removal among the postal railway mail clerks—I mean among the old appointees—and he was a Democrat who was appointed, I presume, as a Republican under some former administration, but, I think, claims to have changed his politics, and was afterwards removed on the recommendation of the chief clerk, who is a Republican and who has been in the service for years and is now.

Mr. PERKINS. There are no complaints of the service in your State, are there?

Mr. ROGERS. I spoke on that subject yesterday. I am replying now to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], and I say that he has no facts to justify his statement that the service in that State has been injured by the removal of the old clerks and the appointment of new ones, because no such facts exist. I know, of course, that in the extension of the railway mail system and in the general increase of the service which has taken place in that State new appointments have been made, not a great many of them, but I repeat that when I last examined the question there had been but one removal of an old appointee made. I thought I had the statement in my desk, but do not find it at the moment. The trouble has been that the superintendent of the service in that division was a man whose conduct indicated beyond all question, to my mind, that he did not intend that any Democrats should get in, even when they were appointed, if it could be prevented. That has been the fact, and everybody knows it.

Why, sir, a man from Missouri, recommended by a Republican Congressman, could get his appointment in six months, but under the administration of the officer to whom I refer, a first-honor man of the university of my State, a graduate of law, could not get his appointment in less than twelve months. His examination was all right, no fault to find with that, but there is something outside which prevented such men from coming up to the private standard of that superintendent. Thank God, his services have been dispensed with, and I hope the good work will go on until there is not a single man of that class left at the head of these divisions and controlling these appointments, with the power in his hands or right to say whether or not a man shall go into the service. This is all I have to say on that point.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, as this matter has been brought up, I ask to have printed with my remarks the following extract on the subject of removals, from the annual report of the Postmaster-General:

It may some time be required of this Department to undertake control of the most advanced and rapid modes of correspondence of modern device. I purpose no discussion of the subject, which has already attracted and must continue to enlist the general attention of the Congress to such an extent that discussion here could be of little additional value. It involves protracted argument upon not only the question of general expediency, but of the proper means of dealing justly with present conditions. Yet, if it shall happen that the difficulties yield to patient consideration, and the demands of the country for the best auxiliaries to its business facilities, it will be of supreme importance to the end to make wise provisions for a safe and satisfactory establishment of the requisite force of employés without dangerous increase of Federal power, and steps for improvement in the establishment of the postal service must be a beneficial beginning.

The present status (October 31, 1887) of the force is shown, so far as figures may show it, by the following recapitulation of changes during the time of my service in this office:

The whole number of clerks March 7, 1885, was		4,356
To which have been subsequently added		495
Making a total October 31, 1887		4,851
Of the clerks in service at the first date named—
The number remaining is		2,271
The number gone is	2,085
Appointments to new places	495
Making the present number of my appointment		2,580
Total		4,851

To effect these changes, irrespectively of the 495 added clerks, it has been necessary to make appointments to the number of 3,138.

For vacancies occurring as follows:

By resignation		1,309
By removals:
For partisanship	283
For disciplinary causes	805
		1,188
By death		84
By expiration of probationary appointments, recommended by division superintendents to be dropped		463
By expiration of probationary appointments made recently before March 7, 1885		152
		3,138
Add new appointments		495
Total number of appointments		3,633

Of the resignations, some were in anticipation of failure on probationary examinations, and some because unfitness had been disclosed by the regular examinations of clerks not on probation. On the 31st day of March, 1885, notice was given through the Daily Bulletin that—

"Railway postal clerks who have become efficient and valuable men, against whom no just complaint of neglect, inattention, or want of fidelity, honesty or efficiency can be brought, and who have not turned their attention to political labors during their service, need have no fear of being disturbed so long as they continue to render meritorious and faithful service."

Experience has strengthened the conviction of its expediency as a rule of service, and it has been faithfully observed. There may yet remain, doubtless, some within its exceptions the facts concerning whom have not been known.

Mr. Chairman, nearly one-half of the clerks who were in the service under the former administration remain still in the service. I believe there is scarcely another man in this land who, as head of the Post-Office Department, would have withstood party clamor and kept his enemies in service to the extent to which this has been done in that Department.

In reply to the gentlemen who are now parading these complaints, permit me to say that in my opinion the present Administration has done more toward the advancement of civil-service reform than any other in the history of this country. It has gone forward with an iron will, giving great offense sometimes among its own friends, but pursuing its policy steadily. If, here or there, the course of the Administration has not appeared entirely satisfactory to all, I wish to say that no administration can have its absolute will in this country. In Great Britain civil-service reform required one hundred years of struggle before it reached its present status. It was commenced by administrative efforts, the legislative branch always discontented and complaining. The present Administration of our own Government has suffered from complaints in this matter; but the wonder with me is not that there has been a failure to go beyond the law in reference to the civil service, but that so much has been done as we are aware of. In the light of the experience of other countries, I did not expect the progress which has been made in this direction. I trust that gentlemen will deal fairly in this matter, especially those who have seen fit to approve of the civil-service policy itself.

The removals among postal clerks have been remarkably few. Now, after the Administration has been in power nearly four years, about one-half or a little less than one-half of the old clerks remain in service, and the average rate of merit is increasing all the while. I, for one, am content with the record which the Administration has made in this respect. It did well when it complied with the law, and it was not required to go beyond it. When it went beyond it it did so amidst the grumblings of its own party and the laughter of the Republicans.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendments of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE SUPERINTENDENT FOREIGN MAILS.

For transportation of foreign mails, $547,000.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making an observation with reference to our foreign mail service. I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that of the $425,000 appropriated and paid during the last year for sea service postal transportation, less than $75,000 went to American vessels, and over $350,000 to foreign steam-ship lines. I did not rise for the purpose of complaining of the Post-Office Department because of this condition of things, but to call the attention of the Committee on Postal Affairs to the importance of early legislation which shall secure the encouragement and establishment of American steam-ship lines for postal communication. Gentlemen are aware that under the law as it now exists the Postmaster-General is not authorized in any case to go beyond the sea and inland postage in paying for the transportation of United States mail. On all those lines which connect with South America, with the West Indies, with the nearby countries with which we have communication by American steam-ship lines it is impossible with such compensation as this to permanently maintain such lines. The result has been that even of the small amount we have appropriated for postal service on steam-ship lines, more than four-fifths of it during the last year has gone to foreign steam-ship lines; and American steam-ship lines are being rapidly driven from the service.

Look for a moment at the compensation which is given to the American line running between New York and the ports of Brazil, amounting last year to less than $10,000. It is impossible in the nature of things that an American steam-ship line can be maintained when such paltry compensation as this is paid.

During the past year even Canada, with the aid of a subsidy by the Canadian Government and a subsidy by the Government of Great Britain, the aggregate being $160,000 per annum, has placed in service a steam-ship line running from British Columbia to the ports of Japan and China. We are to-day paying to the American steam-ship lines running from San Francisco to the ports of Japan and China only the paltry sum of $10,000 against $160,000 paid by Canada and Great Britain for substantially the same service to a competing line, which, within three years, unless the Government of the United States shall deal more liberally with its steam-ship lines, will drive our steam-ship line from the service; and thus an American steam-ship line will disappear from the ocean.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention for a single moment to what the nations of Europe have been doing while we have been refusing to pay even a paltry compensation. In 1885 France spent for her steam-ship service $5,152,000, Great Britain over $3,000,000, Italy $1,732,000, and even Brazil $1,472,000, and poor barbarian Japan nearly $300,000. Unless this Government speedily comes up to the level of its duty and encourages American steam-ship lines, within five years I predict the last American steam-ship line will have been driven from the ocean, and foreign steam-ship lines, supported by liberal pensions, will have taken their place.

I desire at this time simply to call the attention of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to the fact that the chairman of that committee has at this session introduced a bill, which has been referred to that committee, and which I had hoped would have been reported long before this, authorizing the Postmaster-General to increase the compensation in such liberal measure as to encourage the establishment of American steam-ship lines and American postal communication, especially with the countries of South America, Central America, Mexico, and the West Indies.

I notice even during the last year the money we have expended has chiefly gone to foreign lines. The North German Lloyd Line has received $129,348, while the American Line, making nearly as much mileage, running from New York to the ports of Brazil, received less than $10,000. The Cunard Line from New York has received $70,000 during the past year; the White Star Line, $35,000; the Guion Line, $38,000, and the Inman Line, $12,736, etc.

Mr. Chairman, I am aware that on this bill it is not possible to have legislation that ought to be had, but such a bill is before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and I appeal to the chairman of that committee and I appeal to the membership of that committee to no longer allow the measure to slumber in that committee, but to report it here in order that this Congress may be brought to consider the question as to whether this Government shall not do something worthy of its name, worthy of its prestige, worthy of its power, to encourage the establishment of American steam-ship lines.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine complains that more is paid to foreign steam-ship lines for carrying the American mails than is paid to American vessels. Permit me to say, while that is true, the amount paid to American vessels is at a rate three times more than is paid to foreign vessels.

I will read a brief extract from the report of the Postmaster-General.

For conveyance of mails to ports to which American vessels do not ply, $363,-89.29.

For conveyance of mails to ports to which American vessels ply, $148,820.

We pay because we have not a ship going into those ports.

The policy of the gentleman's party has brought that about. The policy which obtains nowhere else on the face of the earth, except in America, amongst civilized nations, has had much to do with it. Italy, Russia, France, England, all the great continental powers allow any one of their citizens to go to any country on God's footstool and buy a ship where he can buy the cheapest and take that ship under its nationality, but the American Government refuses to do so. We can not build ships as cheaply as they can abroad, and in that condition of affairs how can it be expected, with such a policy as we have had, we shall carry the commerce of the world or secure any large portion of it?

The gentleman is right when he says that legislation must be had or we shall be swept from the ocean entirely. By our laws we have still left our coasting trade, but our policy must be changed if we expect to have American vessels ply on the ocean.

My friend's remedy is that while this can not be done, you shall go into the Treasury and take the money gathered from the people all over the land and pay, in addition to the commerce of the world, an additional sum to keep our vessels afloat. I do not care at this time to go into the discussion of that question as it is likely to come up hereafter; I shall therefore content myself with the few remarks I have made in the way of response.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move to strike out the last word. The observations of my friend from Georgia with reference to certain problems connected with the decline of our merchant marine in the foreign trade call upon me to make a single suggestion on the policy which this country has pursued with reference to the importation and registry of foreign-built vessels.

I have simply to say that the policy of restricting registry to vessels built in this country is that which has existed from the foundation of the Government—adopted originally on the recommendation of Washington himself, approved by Madison, approved by Jefferson, and by all the fathers of the Republic; a policy under which the merchant marine of the United States engaged in the foreign carrying trade had, until 1855, its highest prosperity. Now, certainly if during all that period the merchant marine of the United States had this continuous prosperity, why should it be argued to-day that a change of this policy would overcome difficulties which have caused a decline in our shipping in the foreign trade since 1855?

Mr. Chairman, it is not the first cost of the steam-ship or the sailing vessel which causes the difficulty in this regard. That difference is not so material in itself. The main difficulty is due to the higher expense of running our vessels after they are built.

I read the other day from the report of Consul Russell, at Liverpool, showing that, according to his investigations in November last, seamen, officers, stokers, all kinds of employés engaged upon steam-ships, received on American steam-ships 38 per cent. more in wages than was paid to similar men employed upon British steam-ships; and I also read from the same report the statement of this consul that it cost 27 per cent. more to feed our sailors and laborers upon American vessels than it did upon British vessels, simply because the American laborer demands better living than the foreigner.

Now, in view of these facts, Mr. Chairman, in relation to the matter, the remedy suggested by my friend from Georgia is certainly inadequate.

Here we have to face not only this difference in the cost of running the vessels, but we have to face a subvention or postal subsidy of $3,000,-000—a postal subsidy, for this is the language used in the reports of the British postmaster-general—which was paid to British vessels during the last fiscal year for the transportation of her mails.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLOUNT was recognized.

Mr. DINGLEY. I should like to be permitted to continue a few minutes longer.

Mr. GUENTHER was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. DINGLEY.

Mr. DINGLEY. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, we have to face a subvention of $3,000,000 by the English Government for this mail service, as well as one of $5,000,000 on the part of France, and nearly $300,-000,000 paid by Italy. In the face of these facts, certainly if the Government of the United States shall look on and refuse to extend any assistance in this direction, refuse even to give the most meager compensation, it can not be otherwise than that the American steam-ship lines will eventually be driven from the sea. There is no help for it.

I say, therefore, to my friend from Georgia, without desiring to discuss other questions, upon which there may be differences of opinion, that he must see, and the members of the House must see, that unless this Government shall do at least as much for the American steam-ship lines as Great Britain, as Germany, as France, as Italy, and as other foreign governments are doing for theirs, that the day is not far distant when the American steam-ship lines will have been driven from the ocean. I was rejoiced, therefore, when I noticed that my friend from Georgia, who has usually taken the lead in opposition to liberal compensation to American steam-ship lines, in the early days of this session introduced a bill authorizing the Postmaster-General to give a more liberal compensation to American steam-ship lines for this service, and I trust the better feelings which led him to adopt that course will strengthen as he goes on and faces the exigencies before us.

One point further. My friend has suggested that we give American lines a larger compensation per letter than we give to foreign lines. That is true, but it should be borne in mind that the foreign steam-ship lines have taken possession of those routes on which there is the largest mail, and that a rate per letter which will give the North German line $124,000 for the transportation of mails, will give to the American lines making nearly as great mileage, running from New York to the ports of Brazil, only $10,000, because the mail happens to be less, notwithstanding the mileage is the same. Evidently such a basis of compensation is unjust. Indeed, in fixing compensation for transportation of mails on our other routes we have little regard to the number of letters to be transported, but to the length of the route. It costs no more for a steam-ship to carry a hundred sacks of mail than ten sacks.

Hence I want to call the attention of my friend from Georgia to the fact that the basis on which we are paying for foreign mail transportation by steam-ship lines to-day is to the great disadvantage of American lines, and to the advantage of foreign steam-ship lines; and I appeal to him and to the gentlemen who are members of the Post-Office Committee to see that there shall be some legislation reported to the House correcting this injustice and doing justice to American companies.

Mr. BLOUNT rose.

Mr. GUENTHER. I ask the gentleman from Georgia to yield to me for a minute.

Mr. BLOUNT. I want the time myself, and can not yield.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] has stated that our present navigation laws began with the administration of General Washington and have continued up to the present time, and that the prosperity of our shipping has grown out of that legislation. And yet, while it is true that shipping began to improve, and that about 1857 or 1858 we were the second in point of tonnage, I believe, of all the commercial nations of the world, the fact is we have gone down since that time until we carry but a small portion of commerce under that legislation, and the gentleman admonishes us that unless we do something else we will have no ships on the ocean.

Then this law is a failure. But the gentleman says the reason does not lie in the ships, but in the difference between the prices of labor. The difference, Mr. Chairman, in the prices of labor obtained in 1858 as well as it does now, so that does not account for it. The real fact here, Mr. Chairman, is this. The navigation laws could not regulate this thing. Circumstances that could not be controlled and that can not be controlled now, came into play; at that period we began to make iron vessels; they were stronger and speedier than the wooden vessels, and they took the place of them. That is the whole story, and it is so to-day; the labor question does not touch it. Those vessels can be built cheaper abroad, and other nationalities have understood it well. Where the prices of labor in their own countries, in Germany, Italy, France, and Russia, were lower than they were in England, they have still had to go to England where there is higher-priced labor in order to buy cheaper ships.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does not each one of these nations which buy their ships where they can buy them cheapest, does not each one of them pay an annual subsidy, amounting in England last year to $3,000,000?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes; that is true in part. But those nations found it absolutely necessary to go abroad to purchase their ships.

Now, let us see about this subsidy business. England, with her immense commerce, gave subsidies last year amounting to $3,175,819. Is it that which gives to Great Britain the command of the ocean? Only a few of her lines are subsidized, and the great body of them traverse the ocean parallel to those lines unaided, and they command the commerce of the world. They do so in spite of the subsidies to other lines that are traversing the ocean.

The same system applies to any of the other nations which subsidize their lines. The subsidized lines carry but a small fraction of their commerce. Their commerce is not taken by subsidized lines; it is taken in spite of them; and the unaided lines traverse the ocean side by side with subsidized lines and prosper.

Mr. HOLMAN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it not the fact that the Government of Great Britain has given subsidy to certain lines of vessels as a part of its colonial system?

Mr. BLOUNT. That is true; but we can not go into all these questions at this time. I want to call attention to this fact——

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DINGLEY was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. BLOUNT.

Mr. BLOUNT. I only wish a moment more to finish a sentence. I want to call attention to the fact that the subsidized lines from Great Britain are so slow that the merchants of this country and of England are complaining because the mails are carried on the subsidized lines instead of on the swifter lines running to this country. They say the goods get here before the mails. That is what subsidy has done in facilitating mail transportation.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Do I understand the gentleman from Georgia to say that he knows of lines of steam-ships that are running successfully parallel with subsidized lines?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir; running from Europe to this country.

Mr. DOCKERY. I move to strike out the last word but three.

Mr. Chairman, I have no desire at this time to engage in what it must be evident to every member of this House is a profitless discussion. There is no proposition pending before the committee. But when a proposition is presented, as I apprehend it will be very soon when this bill is returned from the Senate, I propose to discuss at some length the business principles involved in the suggestions of the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY]. It is conceded by both sides of the House that that gentleman is particularly well informed on all matters relating to our merchant marine, and is usually extremely fair in debate.

But I must confess my surprise at the manner in which that very able gentleman has presented some of his propositions to-day. He stated that a certain line—I do not now recall its name—running from New York to some point in Europe, received $124,000 per annum, while another line, running from New York to Brazil, received only $10,000. He should have been frank enough to state that the line receiving $124,000, if it had been an American line carrying the American mails, would have received three times that sum. The lines to which he refers, the North German Lloyd and the Guion Lines, receive $1.27 and $1.39 per mile, respectively, as I now remember the figures; but they receive it simply because of the amount of mail they carry. The lines running to South America receive no compensation of a like total, because they carry but little mail for the United States.

Whether or not the compensation is adequate is a question I do not propose to discuss now; but the House and the committee will see at once the unfairness of the illustration offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY]. The law passed in 1858 discriminates, and discriminates properly, in favor of American lines by giving them sea and inland postage, while the foreign line receives only sea postage, and the gentleman is fully advised of that fact.

As to the causes that have led to the decline of the merchant marine, we will discuss those later on. They are grave; they should receive the attention of Congress, and when the time arrives I shall present my views on that question; but at this moment, and without any proposition pending, I shall not further trespass upon the indulgence of the committee.

Mr. DUNN. I did not intend to participate in this debate, and I should not have done so had not my distinguished colleague on the Shipping Committee [Mr. DINGLEY] brought into the discussion matters which would be more pertinent to one which is to come hereafter. He insists that we shall adhere to the system which he says was adopted by the advice of Washington and Jefferson for the benefit of American shipping. The gentleman will remember that they and the other statesmen of that day also advised the continuance of the African slave trade for the benefit of American shipping, and that the New England ship-owners and ship-builders insisted upon retaining it until 1808 for the benefit of the American merchant marine. Is the gentleman ready to return to that policy to promote and stimulate that interest?

They also advised the enactment of old obstructive bottomry laws of that date, prohibiting the importation of merchandise in other than American-built vessels. Is the gentleman willing to go back to them? The existing conditions which prompted those statesmen to advise that policy have passed away, and with them the policy of obstruction has passed away and been abandoned by all nations of the world except the United States, which still refuses registration to foreign-built vessels. The gentleman says that it is not the question of the cost of the ships which determines the amount of the carrying trade enjoyed by our vessels. I am not sure, Mr. Chairman, that statistics prove anything conclusively, but if they do, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] is very unfortunate in that statement, for it is a fact that vessels of the United States took and maintained the lead of all nations in the foreign carrying trade just so long as and no longer than we could build and have cheaper ships than the people of any other country. Taking the statistical tables we find that in 1821 wooden sailing vessels (the only sea-going vessels of that period) could be built in the United States at from $38 to $42 per ton of burden; the same vessel then cost $50 to $60 per registered ton in Great Britain. Vessels of the United States then carried 88.7 per cent of the foreign trade, and foreign vessels carried 11.3 per cent. of it. In 1845 the cost of building vessels (same class) in the United States was $45 to $50 per ton, and in England $60 to $65 per ton. Vessels of the United States then carried 81.7 per cent. of the foreign trade, and all foreign vessels carried 18.3 per cent. of that trade.

At this latter date England commenced building iron vessels, and could build them at a cost of $90 to $100 per ton.

In 1855 it cost $45 to $50 per ton to build wooden vessels in the United States, and in England it cost $65 to $70 per ton to build them, and $70 to $80 per ton to build iron vessels. At that time United States vessels carried 75 per cent. of the foreign trade and all foreign vessels carried 24.8 per cent. of it. At this date England commenced building iron and steel steamers and at a cost of $70 to $80 per ton.

In 1860 it cost $90 to $100 per ton to build iron vessels in the United States. In the short space of five years, under the influence of this changed condition of things, the per cent. of foreign trade carried in vessels of the United States had declined from 75 to 65 per cent., and that in foreign vessels had increased from 24 to 33 per cent. It is significant, at least, to note that this change from wooden vessels, which could be built cheapest in the United States, to iron vessels, which could be built cheapest in England, marked the commencement of the rapid transfer of the foreign carrying trade from vessels of the United States to those of England. If it be not cause and effect, it is at least a remarkable coincidence.

I will here call attention to the further significant fact that the cost of building iron vessels continued to steadily decline in England until now it costs $40 to $60 per ton to build iron vessels over there, while it still costs $75 per ton to build iron vessels in the United States. Vessels of the United States now carry 15 per cent. of the foreign trade, and foreign vessels carry 85 per cent. of it.

I will have printed as part of my remarks a table, from which I have gathered these facts, on page 90 of the report of the Commissioner of Navigation for the year 1887:

It will be seen from this table that our percentage of the carrying trade increased steadily as long as we built the cheapest ships, and also in proportion as the rate of tariff taxation on cargoes decreased; and that it steadily and rapidly declined as the tariff went up and when the vessels in use could be built cheaper abroad than in this country.

The gentleman says that it is the subsidies paid by England and other countries that have driven our vessels from the seas.

Mr. Chairman, Great Britain pays not one dollar of gratuitous subsidy. She pays only for service rendered in transporting her mails from the home country to her colonies, which belt the earth, and to foreign countries, where her commerce goes. Not a dollar of gratuitous subsidy does she pay. When the proper time comes I shall vote cheerfully for a more liberal policy on the part of our Government in regard to the transportation of foreign mails than that which is now in force; but, sir, to ask that this Government shall "see" the gratuitous subsidies of other governments, which have not accomplished the purposes for which they were granted, and "go them one better" is, in my judgment, a most unwise and pernicious as well as unconstitutional policy.

Subsidies will not accomplish the desired results. They have not done so. We have not been driven from the seas by subsidies. We were driven from the seas by high-tariff taxation on cargoes and by high-priced vessels long before any foreign nation paid a gratuitous subsidy. We were out of the competition before we were placed under that disadvantage. England has gained her ascendency without one dollar of gratuitous subsidy such as is asked for in the bill which has been introduced in this House, and such as France pays, such as Italy pays, such as Spain pays, and such as Germany pays only to her Japan and Chinese lines. That is a modern experiment, the result of which is not yet seen. So far as results can be seen it has proven most disastrous. In Italy and France some of the largest ship-building and ship-owning concerns have been brought into bankruptcy by this insecure and unreliable stimulus, the ever-recurring evil—overproduction.

Subsidies have not driven our people out of competition. This has resulted from a tariff which denies cargoes to our vessels. We may take out a cargo of our own manufactures or our productions of the soil, but we can not bring back a cargo at will, as English vessels can to their country. We must run a vessel costing 30 per cent. more than our foreign competitor, and we must go much of the time in ballast, because of the tax on our cargo, while the competitor's cargo is untaxed. High-priced vessels can not compete with low-priced vessels and untaxed cargoes.

Mr. HATCH obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. DUNN.

Mr. DUNN. I am much obliged to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] for his courtesy.

Mr. Chairman, the tables which I have here show not only that the cargoes of American vessels increased in percentage from 1821 down to the time when Great Britain learned to build iron vessels at a lower price than we could build them, but that so long as we could build cheaper ships to supply the world's demand than any other nation the number of ships built in this country steadily increased. In 1813, responding to the world's demand for cheap ships, we built 364 sailing vessels at a cheaper price than they could be built elsewhere in the world. In 1855 we built 1,781 sailing vessels, a larger number than was built elsewhere in the world. Exactly as the tariff on cargoes went down, and so long as we could build the vessels needed by the world, the number of vessels built in this country increased, and the percentage of the carrying trade of the world which American vessels took went up, until we built 1,781 vessels in that year, and carried 75 per cent. of the foreign trade.

After 1860 the tax on cargoes of vessels commenced going up with us, and the cost of building iron vessels in this country was higher than elsewhere, while in Great Britain the cost of building iron vessels declined. Thus we lost in exactly that ratio. The number of vessels which we constructed diminished until in 1887 it went down to 299 steam-vessels and 545 sailing vessels. During all that time the cost of building iron vessels in Great Britain went down from $80 to $100 per ton to $40 to $60 per ton. We commenced building iron vessels at $90 to $100 per ton, and to-day the cost with us is $75 to $80 per ton. In Great Britain the cost of constructing iron vessels has gone down from $75 per ton to $40 per ton. In this country the cost of building iron vessels is maintained at what it was nearly thirty years ago, while in England it has been reduced to one-half. Yet gentlemen express astonishment that the cheaper vessels and untaxed cargoes of Great Britain should have driven us from the sea, while we insist on adhering to high-priced vessels and highly-taxed cargoes. And I desire to say further that during all that time the disparity in the cost of sailing vessels has been as great as it is now, on account of difference in wages, etc.

Mr. DOCKERY. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. I renew the pro forma amendment. Mr. Chairman, the suggestion made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] with reference to the basis of compensation for transportation of the mails by steamers seems to call upon me for a single word of explanation of what I have already said.

It should be borne in mind that under our laws the basis of payment for transportation of mails by steam-ship is the number of letters that may be carried. American vessels may receive per letter and per package more than foreign vessels do, but it will be observed that this basis of compensation is inevitably greatly to the disadvantage of steam-ship lines which happen to be American lines connecting with South American and Central American countries as against other lines running the same number of miles. For example, although an American line running from New York to Rio runs as many miles as the North German line, running from Europe to this country, yet it does not on this basis of compensation get one-twelfth the amount that the European line receives.

The point to which I desire to call the attention of my friend, the chairman of the committee, is that this basis of compensation is all wrong. It ought not to be on the basis per letter carried, but per mile of transportation. When we come to fix the compensation on our star routes we do not have regard to the fact whether one or two or three or four or a dozen sacks of mail matter are to be carried. That makes no difference in the cost of transportation, but we have regard to the distance to be traveled. A steam-ship running from New York to Brazil, in performing the same number of miles as the North German line of steam-ships to Europe from the city of New York, has the same expense in carrying ten sacks of mail that the North German line does in carrying a hundred.

What I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to is the necessity of changing the basis of compensation in order to do justice to American steam-ship lines, and in order to establish a fair basis of compensation. That is the basis upon which we pay vehicles for transporting the mail on our star-routes.

A word in reference to one other point. I did not intend to trench on the question of free ships, but I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN], who alleges that the cause of the decline of our merchant marine in the foreign trade has been the high tariffs, as he calls them, which have taken away their cargoes, to the fact that our foreign exports and imports, which make cargoes to be carried, have never increased so rapidly as since the war under what the gentleman calls the high-tariff system. The difficulty is not in want of cargoes, for there is an abundance of cargoes. If the American marine in the foreign trade had increased in proportion to the increase of our foreign trade we would have more than six times what we now have. It is not the want of cargoes to and from any country, but it is because the foreign vessels have seized our exports and imports instead of American vessels. That is the difficulty.

Gentlemen who charge that a change from the revenue tariff of 1846 has caused the decline in our foreign carrying trade should remember that the decline began in 1855 under the revenue tariff, and that it was as rapid in the six years before the war as in any six years since the war.

By unanimous consent the formal amendments were withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For balance due foreign countries, $75,000.

Mr. ADAMS. I move to strike out "$75,000" and insert "$80,000."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to detain the House more than a few minutes in what my friend from Missouri called and what I myself may call a profitless discussion. But I can not permit to pass without challenge a statement which fell from the chairman of the committee a few moments ago. I understood him to say in reference to the efficiency of the postal service that but little complaint existed except in sections of the country associated with the star-route service.

Mr. BLOUNT. I admit there are complaints, and there always will be. I do not believe the service is perfect, or that it ever will be.

Mr. ADAMS. The confirmation of the statement of the gentleman from Georgia may be found in my own section of the country. It is a fact that complaints do exist in the city of Chicago. Ordinarily we might infer such complaints are owing to the malice of political opponents of the Administration. I will not go into the question whether the complaints are justifiable or not. I merely state the fact there are complaints, and that the newspaper in Chicago which has taken the most prominent part in making these complaints is not a Republican paper, but a Democratic paper, which is the enthusiastic supporter of Mr. Cleveland, and which will, so far as I know, support the nominee of the Democratic party for the Presidency.

So far as I am concerned personally I have always been treated with fairness by the officials of the Chicago post-office, and personally I have no complaints to make against them. But, sir, it is true there is dissatisfaction existing amongst the business men of that city. Fac-similes of letters have been published in that paper to show what mistakes have been made in reference to letters plainly addressed. There are other complaints. There may have been some changes in the personnel of that post-office, and there may be less complaint now—that is within a few weeks—than existed heretofore.

Mr. MCKINNEY. Is the gentleman referring to the Chicago post-office?

Mr. ADAMS. I am.

Mr. MCKINNEY. Let me inquire whether the Postmaster-General has not entirely reorganized that post-office?

Mr. ADAMS. I understand some changes have been made.

Mr. MCKINNEY. And have not the changes been made with the express purpose of doing away with the complaints to which the gentleman has referred?

Mr. ADAMS. I do not complain; I complain of nothing.

Mr. MCKINNEY. The complaints, then, you refer to as having been made by others, have they not been relieved by the action of the Postmaster-General?

Mr. ADAMS. The statement of the gentleman fully confirms what I have already stated, and I therefore need not proceed any further.

Mr. MCKINNEY. That is all we admit in that connection.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. You admit that you have been all wrong.

Mr. MCKINNEY. We admit that there has been some wrong, but not all wrong.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to occupy the time of the committee for a few moments only. I want to call attention to some statements that have been made, especially by the gentlemen whose sections have been most benefited by the liberal policy of the present administration of the Post-Office Department. It is a remarkable fact that the principal complaints come from those sections which have received the most liberal treatment. I refer particularly to the complaints which we have heard from Illinois and Kansas.

Illinois has received an increase of expenditures during the period of nineteen months, beginning with the 1st day of July, 1886, and ending with the 1st day of January, 1888, of $62,713.20, there having been 1,045 and a fraction miles of new railroad service established in that State during that period.

Then, with reference to the State of Kansas, I desire to notice the remarks of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS], who seems to be a constitutional "kicker" against the administration of the Post-Office Department. It might be inferred from the statements of the gentleman on yesterday and again to-day that there has been a most parsimonious and illiberal policy pursued by the Post-Office Department in dealing with that State; but I find, sir, by reference to the report of the Postmaster-General, and by inquiry, that during the fiscal year from July 1, 1886, to June 30, 1887, 1,393 miles of new railroad service was established in that State; and also that during the next seven months, from the 1st day of July, 1887, to the 31st day of January, 1888, 1,350 miles of new railway service was established, making a total in the nineteen months of 2,743 miles of new railroad service established in Kansas, at an increased annual cost to the Department of $164,623.20. Now, in addition to that, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that expensive contracts have been made for fast-mail service largely for the benefit of the State of Kansas. In 1885 the Postmaster-General, by contract with the Burlington and Quincy Railroad Company, established a fast-mail service from Chicago to Omaha at an extra annual cost of $195,370.91. Before the fast-mail service was put on the cost of service on that line of railway was $174,968.69 per annum. The total cost, since the fast mail was put on, is $372,339.60.

Mr. PETERS. The gentleman does not want to charge that to Kansas?

Mr. ENLOE. The State of Kansas gets the benefit of it.

Mr. PETERS. Yes; but our fast mail service does not go over that line; it goes over the Missouri Pacific from St. Louis.

Mr. ENLOE. I will come to the other line presently. I have the authority of the Post-Office Department and the Postmaster-General himself for stating that this service was established, in a great measure, for the benefit of the States of Kansas and Nebraska, and these States are among the largest beneficiaries of the service. Since that mail line was established a reweighing of the mails took place, in March, 1887, which added to the annual cost $61,678, showing a total annual increase of cost for fast mails by the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad of $257,048.93.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this mail was expedited twenty-four hours, according to a statement of the Postmaster-General, and Kansas gets the benefit of the expedited service, enabling that State to get the Eastern mails twenty-four hours earlier than before. Again, on March 12, 1887, Postmaster-General Vilas contracted with the Pennsylvania and Missouri Pacific Railroads for a fast mail service from New York to Kansas City, via Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Columbus, Indianapolis, and St. Louis, at an annual increased cost of $199,395.20. This line expedites the mails to Kansas by from twelve to twenty-four hours, and all that great section of the country, from which these complaints seem to come spontaneously, gets the benefit.

The total cost of the messenger and transportation service in the United States is $29,806,518.87, of which Kansas gets, in round numbers, $888,000, or about 3 per cent. of the whole amount.

The increase of the postal clerks has been 603 in the nineteen months preceding January 31 last, and Kansas gets 150, or the lines working the Kansas mails, being 26 per cent. of the total increase of mail-messenger service.

There were applications from Kansas up to January 31, 1888, for new service on 400 miles of railway, but the railroad companies had not complied with the requirements of the law in returning the distance circulars so that the contracts could be made.

The increase, then, in the annual cost of the mail service to Kansas for the nineteen months to which I have referred amounts to $164,623.20. The cost of the messenger service of which Kansas gets the benefit is $111,358.75. The cost of the transportation service is $777,315.67. The total cost of the service, of which Kansas is the principal beneficiary, is $888,674.42. The annual excess of cost of this service in the State of Kansas over all postal-revenue receipts is $269,189.77. And I want to state right here in answer to the gentleman's charge that the administration of the Post-Office Department has been "partisan in its character, parsimonious in its allowances, and palsied in its execution," that such a charge comes with bad grace from Kansas. The difficulty in that region is attributable not to parsimony or illiberality, but it may be attributable to some extent to the fact that we have not been able to get Democrats into the railway-mail service out there.

It is the most difficult branch of the service in which to make a change, and I suspect that accounts for a good deal of the complaint, and for the charges of inefficiency in the service in that State. It is at least worth the trial of a change in the personnel of the service. The Democratic administration must bear the responsibility, and take the criticism and abuse for the inefficiency or neglect of these mail clerks, and if the administration must be criticised and condemned by the opposition, it should be criticised and condemned for the conduct of Democrats, and not of Republicans.

Mr. SYMES. The complaint made yesterday by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS], and by several other gentlemen from Western States and myself, was that there was a deficiency and inefficiency in the star-route service. It is no answer to that statement to say that on account of the additional railroads built in Kansas or other States there has been an extension of the service on the railroads. The substance of the complaint was that where towns are growing up very fast, where perhaps there will be ten towns in one county started in the course of three months, containing from 100 to 500 people, where post-offices should be established and the star-route service put on, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, pursuing the picayune five-cent economy characteristic of many branches of this Administration, haggles and higgles and counts the cost month after month and almost year after year; while these citizens are paying for the mails being brought to themselves and their families out of their own pockets. That was the substance of the charge gentlemen made here yesterday on both sides of the House on this proposition.

Mr. PERKINS. And again this morning.

Mr. SYMES. Yes; and now the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] attempts to answer that proposition and that charge of inefficiency in the star-route service of the railroads by getting up and reading statistics from the Department to show that the mail service has been extended where railroads have been built.

Mr. ENLOE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SYMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. ENLOE. Has not the mail service been frequently extended in Kansas and other Western States——

Mr. SYMES. Does the gentleman refer to the star-route service?

Mr. ENLOE. I refer to the railway mail service at points between which there is no intermediate population. Is not the Government paying a great deal to deliver the mail to people who pay very little of the expense of its delivery?

Mr. SYMES. I understand, of course, that the service is extended over lines of railroad after those lines of railroad are completed. They are mostly lines which extend from one Western metropolis to another and as regards the extension of the service to stations on the railroad, I have not heard any particular complaint. The Post-Office authorities could not help doing that. It would be absurd and ridiculous in the extreme to stand up and defend the Department for efficient service because it drops the mail bags as the train stops at the different stations after another great line of railroad in the course of progress in that country has been completed.

But let me be specific in the complaint, and it can not be answered in the way the gentleman from Tennessee attempted to answer it. In my own State in the past three years at least fifty prominent country towns have sprung up as large as many important towns in the South and in New England and other Eastern States. They have grown up as by magic; and I say every one of those towns has needed star-route service connected with the new railroad stations or these new extended lines of railroad as much as letter-carriers are needed in Washington or the little star-route service throughout the old State of Maryland, and the Department has been negligent in granting the amount required.

My complaint is plain. It is that when the Second Assistant Postmaster-General has received petitions of scores of citizens, of hundreds of citizens, yea, of thousands of citizens, his answer has been, "I am doing the best I can with the money appropriated by Congress to aid me in establishing this new service, and there is a great deficiency in the revenues of the service in your State——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SYMES. I desire to say just a word or two more. I do not wish to trouble the House on this further than is necessary to have it understood——

Mr. PETERS rose.

Mr. BLOUNT. If some understanding can not be come to, I will move that the committee rise in order to close debate.

Mr. SYMES. I withdraw the pro forma amendment, and will take another opportunity to complete my remarks.

Mr. BLOUNT. How much time do the gentleman from Kansas and the gentleman from Colorado desire?

Mr. PETERS. I desire to be recognized for, say, three minutes.

Mr. SYMES. I shall be satisfied with another five minutes.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask unanimous consent that after these two gentlemen have spoken debate shall close on the pending paragraph.

There was no objection.

Mr. SYMES. I am very glad that I opened up this question with other gentlemen in the House yesterday; for I desire to say I have been mistaken, and Western men generally and members from the Northwest and Southwest have been mistaken, in the information that has been given them by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. I had presumed it was for want of appropriations by the Post-Office Committee that the star-route service in the West was so insufficient and inefficient. But I found by the statements of the gentleman from Kansas on the committee [Mr. PETERS], of the distinguished chairman of the committee, and of other gentlemen as to the amount of money remaining now at the service of the Department, that I had been mistaken. I want to put the responsibility where it belongs; and I am satisfied, taking the words of these gentlemen in this House, that it belongs on the back of the picayune Second Assistant Postmaster-General. He has made statement after statement, as I have been informed by gentlemen—and I have had communications to the same effect myself—and made excuses for not extending the star-route service where it is needed, which have been equivocal and erroneous and very great mistakes in the lightest way of putting it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what was the object of that? Why have the citizens of the West, the Southwest, and the Northwest been paying out of their own pockets for having the mails delivered to their towns and their families, instead of this great Government doing it for them? The Second Assistant Postmaster-General is probably not so much to blame after all. The subordinate officers in any great department, in any great machine, whether it be political, civil, or of any other character, generally follow what they understand to be the policy of the head. It was given out by the ex-Postmaster-General, it was given out by this Administration, it is illustrated throughout the whole course of the Administration that a 5-cent picayune economy is the order of the day. We are treated one day to a speech from a leading Democrat and a message from the President, telling us that we are on the verge of a great maelstrom of ruin because we have so much money in the Treasury, and the next day we have a veto from the President for the protection of the money in the Treasury, even going so far as to veto a bill which relieves a poor little postmaster to the extent of a few hundred dollars, which he has paid out for extra clerk-hire, and for which, in the judgment of a committee of this House and of the House itself, as shown by its action in passing the bill, relief ought to be granted, and following that a veto of a bill granting a pension to a crippled ex-soldier.

Passing down from the head through all the Departments you find that character of men who, in Western language, are quick to "catch on" to what they understand to be the spirit governing the heads of the Departments in which they are engaged, and many a Republican office-holder in the Departments has figured up some bit of 5-cent economy for the benefit of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General to show him that he would not be justified in extending this or that star route because it would not pay, while all the time the pioneers upon your frontier are paying the expenses of carrying some of the mails out of their own pockets.

Mr. RAYNER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him, how does the administration of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General compare with the administration of his almost immediate predecessor, who came very near going to jail, and who, if justice had been meted out, would be in prison at this time?

Mr. SYMES. Mr. Chairman, the ingenious criminal lawyer always tries to divert attention from a statement of fact, a pertinent illustration, or a legitimate deduction, by asking a question entirely foreign to the matter under discussion——

Mr. RAYNER. If the gentleman will permit me, instead of being an ingenious criminal lawyer, I have not tried a criminal case in ten years, and the ingenuity of the criminal lawyer is shown in attempting to acquit Mr. Brady here of the charges which were established against him.

Mr. SYMES. Well, I take it back, then. The gentleman is able and ingenious, any way, and would be so if he were defending a criminal.

My complaint in behalf of the people who are settling up the great West is plain and true, and it has not been answered——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I want to reply briefly to some statements made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] in relation to the benefit which Kansas is supposed to receive from the fast-mail service to which he has alluded. He first spoke of the fast-mail service which has been established upon the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy route to Omaha, and when I called his attention to the fact that Kansas as a State was not particularly interested in that service he presented a statement from the Post-Office Department which seemed to contradict that view. Any one familiar with the geography of the Western country would know that the expedition of the mail service to Omaha would affect but a very small portion of the State of Kansas, and that only the portion along the northern border.

The only fast-mail service that is really of any benefit to the State of Kansas is that which has been alluded to, which runs over the Missouri Pacific to Kansas City. But the gentleman here again, either designedly or otherwise, misstates the situation of affairs. He seems to have overlooked the fact that there is a large portion of the United States beyond Kansas, and that this fast-mail service is not for the benefit of Kansas at all, although that State may be and probably is benefited by it to some extent. Kansas has increased in population 600,000 since the census of 1880. Of those 600,000 people a great many have gone in from other States and made their homes there, thus necessitating a large increase in the extent of the mail service. But the fact that these fast mails are of as much advantage to the Pacific Slope and to all of the Territories in the Western portion of the country seems to have entirely escaped the attention of the gentleman.

Mr. PERKINS. I will ask my colleague, was not that fast-mail service of which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] spoke established for the benefit of the Pacific coast mail and the China mail, and not at all for Kansas or Nebraska?

Mr. PETERS. Almost entirely.

Mr. PERKINS. Exclusively.

Mr. ENLOE. I wish the gentleman would give his authority for that statement.

Mr. PETERS. It was established in order to expedite the Pacific and China mail and the mails for the Territories beyond. Of course incidentally it did prove of benefit to the people; but that was not the real object or purpose of putting on the service. I am free to say that if there had been no country beyond Kansas that fast mail would not have been established, and if it had been established under such circumstances it might well have been open to criticism. But in addition to what I have stated I know from personal observation how the business works. I have been in the mail-cars from Kansas City west, and I know that very often it has not been possible to freight the mails on those trans-continental lines in the postal cars, but they were placed in the express-car, and after a certain portion of them had been distributed going through Kansas then the remainder were put in the mail-car.

The trouble has not arisen from the fact that appropriations have not been sufficient, or from the fact that we have not had fast mails. The trouble has arisen from the management and the working of the mail service in the mail-cars, and it is about that that the complaints come, when they come at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order of the House debate is exhausted, and the question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 2, line 17, and insert, after the word "thousand," the word "dollars."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it pass as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. TURNER, of Georgia, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9345) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and had instructed him to report the same back with the recommendation that it pass with amendments.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask that the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole be voted on in gross.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If no separate vote be demanded, the amendments will be voted on together.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLOUNT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 6800) for the relief of John Powers; and

A bill (H. R. 2216) for the relief of Thomas A. Osborn.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FORNEY. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. BLOUNT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the title of the bill first in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9377) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

INTERNATIONAL MARINE CONFERENCE.

Mr. BELMONT. The gentleman in charge of the bill first in order has agreed to yield for a few moments that I may bring up a bill already passed by the Senate which it is very desirable the House should dispose of at once. It is a bill providing for an international maritime conference, and is a measure of great importance. It has been recommended in a special message of the President and in a report from the Navy Department. It has also the approval of all or nearly all of the maritime associations and commercial exchanges in the country.

Mr. FORNEY. I have no objection to the consideration of the measure referred to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT] if it does not take any time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the title of the bill which the gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to bring up.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1851) providing for an international marine conference to secure greater safety for life and property at sea.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of this bill. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. Let us hear it read. How much time will it take?

Mr. BELMONT. It is a bill which has already been passed by the Senate. It provides merely for an international maritime conference.

Mr. CANNON. I suppose it will have to be read, at any rate.

Mr. BELMONT. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to move a substitute.

Mr. CANNON. Then let us hear the substitute.

Mr. BELMONT. Let the substitute be read.

The substitute proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations was read.

Mr. FORNEY (during the reading). I think this bill will take some time for its consideration, and I must object.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It is an important measure, involving the safety of human life at sea.

Mr. FORNEY. If it will give rise to no debate, I do not object.

Mr. DINGLEY. I believe no time will be occupied in its consideration.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. As soon as the bill has been read I think the Committee of the Whole will agree to it.

Mr. BELMONT. If when the reading of the substitute is concluded there is any objection, I will not press the proposition.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the substitute.

Mr. BELMONT. Mr. Chairman, I think that this proposition needs but a very brief explanation. I had the honor, early in the session, of introducing the bill which it is now proposed to substitute for the Senate bill. There has been nothing done to establish an international code of marine signals since 1856. Fast steamers are now engaged in commerce and the passenger traffic of the country, and the necessity for some change in the old signals has become pressing. This has been made apparent on many occasions. The necessity for an improved system of fog-signals for both sailing and steam vessels is universally recognized, as stated in the report accompanying the House bill:

Numberless disasters at sea in foggy weather sufficiently attest the fact that the international "rule of the road" now in force is inadequate, especially in regard to steam-ships. They are now required to give in fogs a prolonged blast of the steam whistle every two minutes. This indicates their proximity, but gives no clew to the direction in which either vessel is steering. Moreover, two steamers, a mile apart and moving at half speed, could meet within the two minutes' interval provided by the signals.

This was clearly shown in the recent collision of the steamships Britannic and Celtic, belonging to the same line and sailing under the same general instructions. It was demonstrated that the Britannic could have only given the same signal to port as is now the standing signal to be given under all circumstances in foggy weather. The naval court which investigated that disaster emphatically condemned as insufficient the present system of signaling in fogs, and recommended the adoption of some more effective plan.

Mr. CANNON. When is it proposed to hold this conference?

Mr. BELMONT. In October next; and it is necessary that the appropriation should be made now, in time to make suitable preparations.

Mr. GUENTHER. I would like to ask the gentleman to explain the difference between the substitute and the original bill.

Mr. BELMONT. The Senate bill provides an expenditure of $30,000. It seemed to the House committee that $20,000 would be sufficient. The Senate bill provided that the United States delegates should receive the same compensation and allowances as members of the House of Representatives, which seemed to the House committee not sufficiently explicit; and in the amendment they suggest that the delegates should be compensated at the rate of $5,000 per annum.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is the balance substantially the same?

Mr. BELMONT. Substantially the same. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be adopted.

In this connection I ask consent to insert a list of commercial bodies which have passed resolutions in favor of the proposed conference:

THE MARITIME ASSOCIATION OF THE PORT OF NEW YORK,
New York, February 27, 1888.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with your request, I beg to hand you herewith list of 72 commercial exchanges which have recommended your measure for an international marine conference.

In addition to the memorials already sent, I beg to inclose memorials from the Cotton Exchanges of New York, Mobile, and Birmingham Ala.; Chambers of Commerce of San Francisco and Wilmington, N. C.; Boards of Trade of Newark, Kansas City, McKeesport, Denver, Los Angeles, St. Joseph, and Omaha; New York, Mercantile and Mechanics and Traders' Exchanges and Brewers' Board of Trade; New Orleans (La.) Sugar Planters' Association, Mechanics, Dealers and Lumbermen's Exchange; Sioux City Jobbers and Manufacturers' Association; St. Paul Jobbers' Union; Detroit Mechanics and Manufacturers' Exchange; and Cleveland Board of Lumber Dealers, asking the enactment of the measure.

It will be remembered that the subject has been favorably recommended to Congress by the President, and been commended by the Department of State, Navy Department, Bureau of Navigation, Signal Service, and, we are informed, by the New Jersey Legislature.

Very respectfully, yours,

F. W. HOUGHTON,
Superintendent.

Hon. PERRY BELMONT.

House of Representatives bill No. 6551, introduced by Hon. PERRY BELMONT, "providing for an international marine conference to secure greater safety at sea," has been supported by the following commercial bodies, namely:

Alabama—Mobile: Chamber of Commerce, Cotton Exchange; Birmingham: Chamber of Commerce.

California—Los Angeles: Board of Trade; San Francisco: Chamber of Commerce, Merchants' Exchange.

Colorado—Denver: Chamber of Commerce and Board of Trade.

Connecticut—Bridgeport: Board of Trade; New Haven: Chamber of Commerce.

Florida—Jacksonville: Board of Trade.

Georgia—Savannah: Cotton Exchange.

Illinois—Chicago: Citizens' Association.

Iowa—Sioux City: Jobbers and Manufacturers' Association.

Kansas—Fort Scott: Board of Trade; Wichita, Board of Trade.

Louisiana—New Orleans: Merchants' and Manufacturers' Association, Mechanics, Dealers, and Lumbermen's Exchange, Chamber of Commerce, Louisiana Sugar-Planters' Association, Board of Underwriters.

Maryland—Baltimore: Merchants' Exchange, Board of Trade, Corn and Flour Exchange.

Massachusetts—Boston: Fish Bureau, Chamber of Commerce, Merchants' Club, National Board of Trade.

Michigan—Detroit: Merchants and Manufacturers' Exchange, Board of Trade.

Maine—Portland: Board of Trade, Merchants' Exchange.

Minnesota—St. Paul: Chamber of Commerce, Jobbers' Union; Minneapolis: Jobbers' Association; Duluth: Chamber of Commerce; Mankato: Board of Trade.

Mississippi—Vicksburg: Cotton Exchange.

Missouri—St. Joseph: Board of Trade; St. Louis: Merchants' Exchange; Kansas City: Board of Trade.

Nebraska—Omaha: Board of Trade.

New Jersey—Newark: Board of Trade.

New York—New York: the Maritime Association of the port of New York, Mechanics and Traders' Exchange, Cotton Exchange, Lager Beer Brewers' Board of Trade, Building and Material Exchange, Produce Exchange, Mercantile Exchange.

New Hampshire—Portsmouth: Board of Trade.

North Carolina—Wilmington: Chamber of Commerce, Produce Exchange.

South Carolina—Charleston: Charleston Exchange.

Tennessee—Nashville: Merchants' Exchange.

Utah—Salt Lake City: Chamber of Commerce.

Virginia—Norfolk: Merchants' and Manufacturers' Exchanges; Cotton Exchange; Richmond: Chamber of Commerce.

Wisconsin—Milwaukee: Chamber of Commerce.

Also commended by the President of the United States, Department of State, Navy Department, Bureau of Navigation, United States Signal Service, Legislature of New Jersey.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first paragraph of the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and requested to invite the Government of each marine nation to send delegates to a marine conference that shall assemble in the city of Washington on the 1st day of October, in the year 1888, or at such other time and place as he may designate, to appoint five delegates, one of whom shall be an officer of the United States Navy and one an official of the Life-Saving Service, to represent the United States at said marine conference, and to fill vacancies in their number."

SEC. 2. That it shall be the object of said marine conference to revise and amend the "Rule of the Road at Sea" and the "International Code of Flag and Night Signals;" to adopt a uniform system of marine signals, or other means of plainly indicating the direction in which vessels are moving in fog, mist, falling snow, and thick weather, and at night; to compare and discuss the various systems employed for the saving of life and property from shipwreck, for reporting, marking, and removing dangerous wrecks or obstructions to navigation, for designating vessels, for conveying to mariners and persons interested in shipping warnings of approaching storms, of dangers to navigation, of changes in lights, buoys, and other day and night marks, and other important information; and to formulate and submit for ratification to the Governments of all maritime nations proper international regulations for the prevention of collisions and other avoidable disasters.

SEC. 3. That the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, for the necessary expenses of said marine conference, including the pay and allowances of the representatives of the United States therein, which shall be at the rate of $5,000 per annum, and actual necessary expenses of such delegates as are not salaried officers of the United States, and the latter shall be allowed their actual necessary expenses. The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to provide the conference with such facilities as may be deemed necessary.

SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State to transmit to Congress a detailed statement of the expenditures incurred under the provisions of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will explain how this money is to be expended.

Mr. BELMONT. Partly in the salaries of the delegates and partly in the preparations necessary for receiving the delegates from all other maritime nations. The expenditures are to be made under the direction of the Secretary of State, and under the terms of this bill he must account to the House for the same.

Mr. GUENTHER. Are those gentlemen who are delegates on the part of the United States going to receive two salaries, $5,000 as fixed by the bill and their salary as naval officers?

Mr. BELMONT. No; the delegate who is to represent the Navy and the one who is to represent the Life-Saving Department of the Government are to serve without pay, but to have their necessary expenses paid.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is there any intimation as to what the pay of the others will be?

Mr. BELMONT. Five thousand dollars per annum during the term of their service.

Mr. HOLMAN. For what length of time are they to be engaged? This conference being called to consider a single subject, it would seem it would not require a considerable length of time.

Mr. BELMONT. I can not say how long the conference will be in session.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think the conference of 1856, if the gentleman will pardon me, was in session only about three weeks.

Mr. RANDALL. I presume it will be in conference until the $20,000 is expended.

Mr. HOLMAN. That amount seems unnecessarily large.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask a single question in this connection of the gentleman from New York; that is, supposing this conference should provide certain rules and regulations, how are those rules and regulations to be enforced?

Mr. BELMONT. By international agreement, just as the rules which were adopted in 1856 are enforced. The gentleman must be aware that nothing has been done since that period, and therefore this conference is to be held.

Mr. RANDALL. Are the rules of 1856 in force?

Mr. BELMONT. As to flag signals. The result of that obsolete system is that when fast-sailing vessels are passing each other at sea it becomes almost impossible to make out the signals according to the present system. One of the important objects of this conference would be to establish signals for use at sea during fogs. At present it is impossible to indicate anything more than the near proximity of a fast-going steamer. There is nothing to show the direction of its course; and this has been the cause of a great many collisions which are occurring constantly.

Mr. DUNN. If the gentleman from New York will allow me one moment, I will answer the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania more specifically. These international rules of the road or code of signals are not in force until adopted by all the maritime nations of the world and the licensed officers of vessels, inspection officers, and all the admiralty courts of the world enforce them against all the vessels of all nations. Until a few years ago our Government was in the attitude of having our vessels subject to these international rules without having given notice to our mercantile marine of what the rules were, and the courts held that they were bound by them. The courts were constantly deciding questions involving damages under rules of which notice had never been given by the enactment of a statute adopting them.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think, in view of the statement made by the gentleman from New York, that half the sum named in the bill would be ample. I suggest that the sum should be $10,000.

Mr. MCADOO. Say $12,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out "$20,000" and insert "$10,000" in the first line of section 3.

Mr. MACDONALD. I move to make the amount $15,000.

Mr. BELMONT. I do not feel authorized to accept the amendment, but I think the committee might vote on it.

The question being taken on the amendment offered by Mr. MACDONALD, to make the amount $15,000, it was not agreed to.

The question being taken on the amendment offered by Mr. HOLMAN, to make the amount $10,000, the Chairman stated that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 41, noes 46.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will have to raise the question of a quorum, unless my friend from New York will agree to my proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT].

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 48, noes 77.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the point as to a quorum with the understanding that a vote shall be taken on $15,000.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN was not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now ask that a vote be taken on $15,000.

The CHAIRMAN. That can only be done by unanimous consent, that motion having been already voted upon.

Mr. BELMONT. I agree to that proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from New York ask unanimous consent that the committee may vote again on the proposition to insert $15,000. Is there objection? The Chairs hears none.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I would like to have that part of the bill which relates to salaries again read.

Objection was made.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York if the salaries of the representatives of this Government are fixed by the bill at $5,000.

Mr. BELMONT. I have already stated to the committee that the delegates who are to receive compensation are to receive $5,000 per annum. Those who serve under the appointment of the Secretary of the Navy to represent the Navy Department and Life-Saving Service, being already officials of the Government are to serve without pay.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. How many officials of the Government are to serve without pay?

Mr. BELMONT. Three.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman from New York permit me to ask him if this is to take further argument or debate?

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I do not propose to debate it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to insert $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. I did not object to the amendment which has just been acted upon; but I suppose I can offer a new amendment, which is to reduce salaries.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is too late. The paragraph to which he refers has been passed. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. Do I understand the Chair to rule that an amendment to reduce the amount of salaries is out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The amount of the salaries was fixed in the preceding paragraph. The bill is being considered by paragraphs and the paragraph referred to has been passed. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

The substitute was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside and reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 9377) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

Mr. FORNEY. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

There was no objection.

Mr. FORNEY. What time do gentlemen on the other side desire for general debate?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Gentlemen on this side want an hour and twenty minutes. Perhaps so much time will not be occupied.

Mr. FORNEY. I have no objection to that; this side having the same amount of time, if it desires.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to one hour and twenty minutes on each side. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORNEY. The bill now under consideration is accompanied with a report which shows the changes that have been made in the current law. There is very little difference between the bill which the committee has reported and the current law. The amount which is embraced in this bill is estimated by the clerk to be $20,472,394.35. The current law is $20,681,640.67. There is, therefore, a reduction of something over $209,000.

In the report it is shown that there is an increase of salaried officers to the number of fifty-five, but there is really only an increase of seventeen. The apparently larger increase arises from the fact that certain employés of the Signal Office hitherto paid out of a general appropriation are now provided for specifically.

There is no new legislation in this bill except where it is proposed that the law library shall be kept open every day as long as either House of Congress is in session. That is the law now, but to avoid any necessity of repetition in each bill it is proposed to place it in that way.

There is also another change that is proposed, which comes under the heading of "Standard weights and measures." It is proposed there to provide that—

> Such necessary repairs and adjustments shall be made to the standards furnished to the several States and Territories as may be requested by the governors thereof, and also to standard weights and measures that have been or may hereafter be supplied to United States custom-houses and other offices of the United States, under act of Congress, when requested by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The necessity for this arises from the fact that in some of the States the standard weights and measures have been injured and there is no existing law authorizing the repair of the same. I believe that is the case in New Jersey and New Mexico.

Under the head of the "Senate" there is really no change proposed from the current law. There is an apparent reduction of some $37,000, but that arises from the fact that the next session will be the short session.

Under the head of "House of Representatives" certain light changes are made in regard to the salaries of the Clerk, the Sergeant-at-Arms, and the Doorkeeper. The salaries are increased $500 each, but in fact these officers receive no more pay under this bill than under the current law. The Clerk is entitled under the existing law to some $1,200 for horse-hire, carriage, etc., and that allowance has been reduced to $700. The Sergeant-at-Arms is entitled under the present law to an allowance of $500 for a horse and wagon, and the Doorkeeper has a like allowance of $1,100. The committee have reduced each of these sums by $500, so that instead of providing for an increase of the salaries of these officers the result may prove to be an actual reduction of their compensation, because they will be required to show how they have expended the money. We have added to the provision the words "or so much thereof as may be necessary," which will require an account to be rendered to the Comptroller of the amount expended in the public service.

I desire, however, to call the attention of the committee to a change which has been made in regard to the preparing of a general index to the Journals of Congress. At the present time we have one clerk and an assistant engaged in this work. The clerk receives $2,500 and his assistant $2,000. At the rate the work is going on the general index will not be completed in less than sixteen years. They have now reached the Nineteenth Congress, and possibly by the end of this year they will have reached the Twenty-fifth. It is proposed by this bill that the force for that work shall be increased. We propose to give the clerk eight assistants, with salaries amounting in the aggregate to $8,000 per annum, and it is supposed that it will take four years to complete the index. If this is a work that is desirable at all, it certainly ought to be completed within four years.

These are the principal changes in the bill. There are some slight changes in the Treasury Department. There is a reduction of force in some bureaus and an increase elsewhere. For instance, there is a reduction in the force in the division of customs, and there is also a consolidation of divisions under one head to be called the "miscellaneous division." There is a reduction of the force from 18 to 10. The aggregate cost of the 18 is $27,680. The aggregate cost of the 10 is $15,120.

There are some slight changes in the office of the Supervising Architect, in the office of the Second Comptroller, and in the Treasurer's office, all of which are set forth in the report.

There is also a slight change made in the independent treasury at New York. The force in the office of the Assistant Treasurer is rearranged. This is done in accordance with the request of the Assistant Treasurer and upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury.

There is really no increase in the aggregate amount which is appropriated for the current fiscal year; but it is expected that by this rearrangement the service will be rendered more efficient.

In the War Department there is considerable reduction of force in the Quartermaster-General's Office. That office has also been reorganized, but this has been done in accordance with the wishes of the Quartermaster-General. The force is reduced to the extent of twenty-three persons, making a difference of $18,915 in the aggregate salaries.

There are other slight changes in the War Department—none of any great importance.

The Navy Department has been reorganized under the supervision of the Secretary of the Navy. There is no change in the number and salaries of the officers, except in the Bureau of Ordnance, where we have given an assistant draughtsman at $1,400, one clerk of class 1, and one copyist, and in the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing, where one additional clerk of class 4 and four clerks of class 1 are provided for. This increase of force is believed to be necessary from the fact that at this time the Navy Department is building some thirteen ships.

In the Interior Department there are some changes, principally in the General Land Office, the additional force numbering some twenty-eight persons. This includes ten principal examiners of land claims and contests at $2,000 each. The work in that branch of the office is behind, and this increase is made for the purpose of settling contests now pending. In the Land Office there are also fifteen additional clerks provided for.

There has also been a change in the Patent Office, where we increase the force. That is a self-sustaining office, and the committee thought it necessary to allow two additional principal examiners at $2,400 each, ten additional clerks of class 1, and one draughtsman at $1,000.

In the Post-Office Department there is a slight increase of clerical force; this addition, which embraces about ten persons, being due to the fact that the service of that Department has been enlarging annually.

I will reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH obtained the floor, and yielded to Mr. CANNON.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say only a word at this time touching this bill. It contains some items to which, as the consideration of the measure progresses under the five-minute rule, I desire to call attention. All I wish to say now is that the apparent reduction in this bill of $209,246.32 upon the appropriations in the law of 1888 is only apparent, not real. This bill is in effect the same as the law for the current year. I hold in my hand a statement showing the items in the law for the present year which have not been estimated for or required for the coming fiscal year, or which are transferred for consideration to another bill.

The first item is leave-of-absence pay in the Engraving and Printing Bureau, $17,000. This item, which is embraced in the appropriations for the current year, does not appear in this bill providing for the next fiscal year, having been transferred to the sundry civil bill. An item of $5,900 for assay office at St. Louis, Mo., is dropped out of the present bill, because, in the judgment of the committee, that office is no longer needed. In the law for the present year there is an item of $60,000 for furniture for the new State, War, and Navy Department buildings; and, of course, no such item is embraced in the present bill, because those buildings have been furnished. Another item, $1,500 for unveiling Garfield's statue, which was appropriated for in the last bill, does not, of course, require to be repeated. An item of $6,000 in the bill of last year for subsistence of agents of Quartermaster-General's office does not appear in the bill now before the House, because that work has been done and those agents are no longer necessary. Then there is the appropriation of $4,000 for the biennial register, which drops out of this bill because the work is not required except in alternate years. An item of $2,500 for education of feeble-minded children is omitted from this bill, and will appear in the sundry civil bill. The same may be said in regard to the item of $25,000 for education in Alaska. That item, I presume, will appear in the sundry civil bill; at least it is reserved for consideration in connection with that bill. An item of $10,000 for marriage and divorce statistics is omitted from this bill, because that work has been accomplished under the appropriation made for the present year. The item of $12,000 for clerk-hire at pensions agencies drops out of this bill, because an appropriation for that purpose has been made in the pension appropriation bill; and the same remark may be made in regard to an item of $3,000 for stationery for pension agencies.

The reduction in expenses of the Senate because of the short session is $37,094.02. This reduction occurs, of course, in alternate years; and the appropriations in the present bill are decreased to that amount, because the session of the Senate during the next fiscal year will be a short one. Then there is a reduction of expenses of the House because of the short session amounting to $19,021.10. The aggregate amount of these items is $203,015.02, which, being deducted from $209.246.32, the apparent reduction in the bill now before the House, makes the actual reduction $6,231.20. Amendments have been authorized by the Committee on Appropriations, to be proposed in Committee of the Whole, which are more than sufficient to make up this amount of six thousand and odd dollars. I publish as a part of my remarks the statement to which I referred:

Apparent reduction of the bill as reported to the House for 1889, under the law for 1888		$209,246.32
Items in the last law not estimated for or required for 1889, or which were transferred for consideration to another bill:
Leave-of-absence pay, Engraving and Printing Bureau	$17,000.00
Assay office, St. Louis, Mo	5,900.00
Furniture for new State, War, and Navy buildings	60,000.00
Unveiling Garfield's statue	1,500.00
Subsistence of agents of Quartermaster-General's office	6,000.00
Biennial Register	4,000.00
Education of feeble-minded children	2,500.00
Education in Alaska	25,000.00
Marriage and divorce statistics	10,000.00
Clerk-hire at pension agencies	12,000.00
Stationery for pension agencies	3,000.00
Reduction in expenses of Senate because of short session	37,094.02
Reduction in expenses of House because of short session	19,021.10
		203,015.12
Actual reduction		6,231.20

I do not know whether it was material for me to go over these items. Perhaps I might have contented myself with stating that the bill is in the main a continuation of the law for the present fiscal year. Having made these remarks, I reserve what further I may desire to say until we come to consider the specific items of the bill.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, how much of my time has the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] occupied?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CUMMINGS). Ten minutes.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I yield for twenty minutes to my colleague, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BOOTHMAN].

Mr. BOOTHMAN. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Accounts reported, on February 21, 1888, the following resolution as a substitute for the bill H. R. 5632, which had been introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE], relating to the salaries of messengers and other employés of the House stationed at the various doors of the House. I will ask the Clerk to read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be, and it hereby is, requested to report in the forthcoming legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill an item appropriating the sum of $4,582 to be expended in equalizing the salaries of the following employés of the House, namely:

Five persons in attendance at the north door of the House.
Four persons in attendance at the east door of the House.
Three persons in attendance at the west door of the House.
Four persons in attendance at the east lobby door of the House.
Four persons in attendance at the west lobby door of the House.
One person in attendance at the seal room of the House.
One person acting as captain of House pages.
One person in attendance at the ladies' reception room of the House.
Seven persons in attendance at the north gallery doors of the House.
Three persons in attendance at the south gallery doors of the House.
Four persons in attendance at the west gallery doors of the House.
Six persons in attendance at the east gallery doors of the House.

In all, forty-three persons; and that such sum shall be expended so as to make the whole pay of said employés equal to $100 each per month for the time they are so employed.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. That resolution was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and placed upon the Calendar. It will appear from the reading of the resolution that if this legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill be passed before that resolution is called up it will practically render it nugatory and of no effect. There is nothing, then, to be done if this appropriation is passed, so far as that resolution is concerned.

I call attention to this matter at this time for the purpose of saying in the hearing of the House that when the proper time arrives I will move to incorporate in the pending appropriation bill an increase of these salaries, if it may so be called, amounting to some $4,600. I will say in passing that so far as seeking any political advantage in this matter is concerned, it can not be charged against me, because each one who is to be benefited by the passage of this resolution belongs to the other side of the House. But, as this matter was introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] and referred to the Committee on Accounts, we believed, in the spirit of fairness, this House could not consistently with its dignity ask one man to do the work that another man is doing for two or three hundred dollars less per year.

The situation of these House messengers is just this: At the north door there are two men employed at $1,200 per annum, two at $1,000 a year, and one man at $720—each of these men doing exactly the same work, each presumably having the same amount of financial responsibility to take care of.

Certainly no man who is fair minded will say $1,200 is too much money to pay an employé of the House of Representatives who is required to give all his time and attention to his work. These employés when the House is in session, as we know, are compelled to be in attendance night and day, and when the House is not in session they are required to take care of committee-rooms.

Now, take the next door, the west door. There are three persons in attendance there—one man at $720, one at $900, and one at $1,000, all doing the same work, putting in the same number of hours, and employed in the same way. At the east door there are four men employed, all at $1,200 a year. At the east lobby door two men are employed at $1,200 a year and one at $1,000. At the east gallery door there are four men employed at $1,200 a year., one at $1,000, and one at $67 per month. At the ladies' reception-room, one man at $800, having as much to do as any of these other men; one man at the seal-room at $1,200; four men at the west lobby door at $1,200 each; three men at the north gallery door at $1,200 each, one man at $1,000, one man at $900, one man at $840, and one man at $67 per month; at the south gallery door, three at $1,200 each; at the west gallery door, three at $1,200 and one at $1,000.

Now, no man can consider this situation of affairs—these men performing the same work and putting in the same number of hours—without coming to the conclusion that they should receive the same salary. Either each should be reduced from $1,200, or all should be put at $1,200. I believe no man can say justly that any one of these men gets too much who receives $1,200 a year. There should therefore be no reduction, but they should all be brought up to the $1,200 basis.

Now, it is necessary, if this change is to be wrought and this equalization take place, that it be done at once. The only objection, I suppose, that may possibly be urged is that it will be introducing new legislation upon an appropriation bill. I think that point of order will not lie against it. I am very sure it will not, and I propose at the proper time to offer amendments to the bill, which, in order that they may be understood, I shall now point out and indicate the places where I shall ask to insert them as changes in the bill.

On page 14, after the word "at," in line 9, I shall propose to amend the bill by striking out the words "one thousand" and insert "twelve hundred."

In line 21, on page 14, strike out the word "ten" and insert "eight;" and after the word "each," first occurring in line 22, on page 14, insert the following, "and two folders employed at the west door of the House and the north lobby door of the House, at $1,200 each."

Strike out the word "five," in line 22, on page 14, and insert "three;" and after the word "each," last occurring in said line 22, insert "and two folders, one employed at the north gallery door and one at the ladies' reception-room of the House, at $1,200 each."

Strike out the word "three," in line 23 on page 14, and insert "one;" and after the word "each," in line 24 on said page, insert "and two folders during the session, one employed at the east gallery door of the House and one at the north gallery door of the House, at $100 per month each."

Strike out the word "fifteen," in line 24 of page 14, and insert "thirteen;" and after the word "each," in line 25 of said page, insert "and two folders, one employed at the north door of the House and one at the west door of the House, at $1,200 each."

The effect, Mr. Chairman, of these amendments would be to give to the men employed here a salary at the rate of $100 a month for the time employed—that is, those who are employed annually, and those employed for the session, at the rate of $100 a month. I think it but fair and just to the employés of the House that this action should be taken.

It does seem to me that the proper and economic principle upon which our friends on the other side are holding themselves out to the country, and on which they claim to be running this Administration, will not be infringed by paying to these men, who have certainly worked hard enough to earn the money, an equal amount of wages for an equal amount of work.

That is all I desire to say now, and I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I yield now ten minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, when the present Administration came into existence, it found itself confronted by a difficulty as great, perhaps greater, than ever was met by any administration upon its advent to power. Coming in as it did upon its professions of devotion to civil-service reform, and meeting, as it did, the hungry and almost desperate crowd of those who for twenty-five years had been deprived even of the husks of office, it had a great perplexity confronting it. With the head of the Government writing pleasing letters to George William Curtis, with those immediately in charge of the Departments of the Government seeking to placate the hungry hordes which streamed in from every direction to the capital, the task of pleasing all was not an easy one, and, while upon the part of the President of the United States these professions of his devotion to the cause of civil-service reform remained unabated in their frequency and force, yet some means had to be devised by which those immediately in charge of the Department might do something to avert the consequences of the ever-rising and swelling tide of discontent. A circular was put forward by the head of at least one of the Departments of the Government trying to provide a new method of securing the displacing of officials and replacing them by those who were true to the faith.

The Postmaster-General (not the present one) sent his invitation all through the country to the hungry brethren, requesting them to file charges against officials of the last administration against whose name heretofore no word of suspicion had ever been breathed, whose places were needed for hungry applicants, and whose removal it was feared would offend the "Mugwumps." I stand in my place here to-day and say that there are in the Departments of this Government, as the result of this policy, piled up affidavits almost by the ton against men whose records are as pure and whose private characters are as upright as are the records and the characters of those who invited the charges against them. These affidavits are filed there in vast quantities, I say, and their contents are kept secret from the men affected by them. The persons charged are not allowed to see or examine the charges to prepare answers to show their utter and abominable falsehoods. These charges remain there in the archives of this Government, perhaps at some future time to rise up and blast the fair names of honest men when the facts which could now be produced to show their falsity will be beyond the power of men to gather together.

In the last Congress I introduced a bill to provide for simple justice to the men whose names had been thus aspersed. It was never reported. At the first opportunity afforded in the House at its present session I reintroduced that bill, to wit, on the 4th day of January last. It is, as its title reads, "to afford persons in the civil service of the United States Government an opportunity to inspect charges which may be filed against them, and to reply thereto, and for other purposes." Before reading the bill I will simply say that it asks no reinstatement of the men removed on those secret charges filed in this surreptitious manner, but simply provides that they shall be made acquainted with the matter of the charges, and have the right to file counter affidavits proving their falsity, to remain on record with the charges.

The bill is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1628) to afford persons in the civil service of the United States Government an opportunity to inspect charges which may be filed against them, and to reply thereto, and for other purposes.

Whereas it has become a common practice to file in the various Departments of the General Government charges affecting the personal and official integrity of persons employed in or under the supervision of said Departments, and such persons have been denied inspection of said charges and afforded no opportunity to reply thereto, but such charges remain in the archives of the Government, liable hereafter to be produced at a time when the proof of their falsity may have passed beyond the reach of the persons affected thereby: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act any person now or heretofore employed in the civil service of the Government of the United States against whom charges affecting his personal character or official action shall have been heretofore filed in any Department of the Government, shall have full opportunity to inspect the same, and make copies thereof, and to file his answer thereto with accompanying affidavits and proofs.

SEC. 2. That hereafter no head of a Department, chief of bureau or division, or other official in the civil service of the United States shall file, or order filed, or allow to be filed, or to remain on file, in the archives of such Department, bureau, or division, any charge affecting unfavorably the personal character or official action of any person employed in the civil service of the United States Government, unless the said charge shall be first verified by the oath of the person making said charge; and within five days after the filing of such charge, so verified, the official immediately in charge of such Department, bureau, or division, shall cause a copy of said charge and verification to be mailed to the post-office address of the person against whom said charge is made, or served personally upon said person, and shall allow such person to inspect said original charge and verification, to take a copy thereof, if he shall so desire, and shall receive and annex to such charge, and file, the answer which such person so charged shall make thereto, together with such accompanying affidavits and proofs in relation thereto which such person so charged shall offer for filing: Provided, however, That this section shall not apply to the case of any official against whom criminal proceedings for official misconduct shall have been actually commenced, until after the actual arrest of such person.

SEC. 3. That any person offending against the provisions of this act shall be deemed to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall be fined not more than $5,000.

This bill is in the interest of fair play and of common justice. That bill, sir, sleeps the sleep of the just in the room of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service. It has not yet been reported. I suppose the committee has been so busy endeavoring to discover the last vestige of civil-service reform under the present Administration that it has had no time as yet to consider the merits of this bill.

I stand in my place in the American Congress to-day and denounce this proceeding on the part of the Government as un-American, unfair, and unjust, and I ask that some steps be taken by the people's representatives to provide some means to innocent persons whereby these charges may be met, whereby the replies to them may be placed in the same archives in which the charges are placed, and remain there as their refutation. I repeat, the bill does not contemplate a reinstatement of the men removed upon these charges. It provides simply that they may be allowed a safeguard against the aspersion of their name and their honor hereafter.

Why should not that be done? That these charges are there I know personally. I have read some of them. Personally I know that some of them are as false as the foulest aspersions against the brightest and purest characters can ever be. There are charges there affecting gentlemen in my own State, whose reputation at home has never been breathed against and whose official records were of the best. Men whom I know to be the soul of honor and of official probity are charged there with malfeasance in office, and with almost every impropriety spoken of in the English language, and to my personal knowledge falsely so charged; and they, when removed, were complimented upon their excellent records.

The practice of receiving these charges, filing them, and refusing an inspection of their contents, and all opportunity to the persons thus charged to file for the protection of their honor and fair name hereafter the proof with them of their falsity, I stand here to denounce as one of the most outrageous invasions of common right and common fairness ever witnessed in any land or in any age. I do not complain of the removal of these men from office. I only ask that it be done in a fair and honorable manner. I do not ask that these men who have been removed upon false charges preferred by hungry sneaks should be reinstated. The Administration in power is charged with the conduct of Government and will be held responsible for the results, and in my judgment it is entitled to have its own agents. But I do demand that they have the privilege this bill gives them and which the sense of fairness of the American people, if the people had their say, would instantly accord them.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Dakota [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee and of some other people to that portion of the bill which appropriates money to support the Territorial government of Dakota. The amount carried in the bill is $66,000, in round numbers, and some people labor under the impression that this amount pays a considerable portion of the expenses of our Territorial government, and I wish, as far as possible, to remove that impresion.

The necessary expenses of the Territorial government of Dakota for the year 1888 will aggregate $600,000, and of this amount the people of the Territory pay out of their own pockets over $550,000. The amount carried in the bill for this purpose is largely in excess of the necessary amount for other years, owing to a session of our Legislature, which will convene in January next. Our Legislature meets biennially. The average amount appropriated by the General Government for this purpose is about $35,000. The people of Dakota pay the sum of about $550,000 for the support of the Territorial government; also pay into the United States Treasury annually over one hundred thousand, the proceeds of internal-revenue taxation, and pay to Federal Territorial officials, in the way of fees, salaries, etc., about $15,000 per annum. In addition to all these we pay annually about $2,600,000 for the support of our common schools.

The governor of the Territory, all of our judges, and the secretary of the Territory are appointed by the President. The judges, in turn, appoint the clerks of all the courts in the Territory, and the governor appoints nearly one hundred officials. Among these are those who disburse every dollar of the money our people pay towards the support of their Territorial government. Not an officer of their selection handles a dollar of the Territorial funds. The governor appoints those who make contracts for the support, enlargement, or construction of all public institutions, and every cent of the Territorial money that our people pay goes through the hands of appointees of the governor.

True to the principles of the Democratic platform, our present governor was appointed from New York. I might add that at least two-thirds of these officials would not be in offices to-day had the people the right of selection. If the expense of carrying the transcontinental mail over the Northern Pacific and Manitoba lines of railway was not charged to our postal expenditures, the mail service of the Territory would pay an excess of nearly $20,000 over and above its cost. The average annual appropriation by the General Government of about $35,000 is a spoonful of sugar thrown to 600,000 people to compensate them for the miserable, carpet-bag, Territorial government that is imposed upon them.

The amount carried in this bill should be largely increased or stricken out altogether. So far as the wishes of the people of Dakota are concerned, they would much rather it would be stricken out than that it should be presented as an excuse for denying us self-government and home rule. If the Government would remit to us the amount that we pay annually into the United States Treasury we would cheerfully assume the responsibility of our Territorial government. The idea that this mere pretense should be made of supporting our Territorial government is simply ridiculous.

We have in Dakota in flourishing condition two universities, two insane asylums, three normal schools, an agricultural college, a school of mines, and, I might add for the benefit of those who violate the law, two strong penitentiaries. We have placed a common-school education within the reach of every child and an education of the higher grades within the reach of very many of our youth.

This average appropriation of $35,000 annually is the compensation our people receive for being dominated and tyrannized over by nonresident officials, many of whom have no interest whatever in our affairs, except to draw their salaries. It is what we receive for having no voice in our national affairs; it is what we receive for paying a hundred thousand dollars annually into the United States Treasury; it is what we receive for being the subjects of a violation of the Constitution of the United States of solemn treaty obligations and acts of Congress.

If it would be any benefit to the people of the United States to be relieved from the burden of this appropriation, the people of Dakota would most cheerfully assume it. We believe if our affairs could be managed by officers of our selection the money we pay would be much more economically disbursed and used, which would far more than compensate us for the amount of this appropriation. Not an officer of our Territory who disburses any portion of the Territorial money is responsible to the people for his official acts. Every one is appointed by the governor, and nearly every one is a politician, and is found hovering around caucuses and conventions at every opportunity.

But few people who live outside of a Territory understand the condition of the people thereof in relation to this matter of Territorial government. The Territorial government is a mockery and delusion. The officers are generally appointed as a reward for some political service to the administration.

My limited time will not permit me to present anything like a full description of the disadvantages of the Territorial government. Permit me to say that the six hundred thousand people in Dakota are heartily tired of it and would gladly relieve the people of the United States from the burden of the pittance annually appropriated by the General Government towards supporting a governmental Territory.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAKER].

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Mr. Chairman, the proposition to admit a new State into the Union involves certain general principles which have received much consideration during the decades in which this Union of ours has grown from a baker's dozen of struggling States, with 3,000,000 of people, to a great Republic of thirty-nine States (one only thereof now seeking her constitutional right of admission to the Union), with an aggregate population of over 60,000,000. These principles have been clearly defined and stated during the debates incident to the formal ceremonies of admitting into the Union the twenty-five States that have been created since the Federal Constitution was formally ratified; and during the more recent debates upon the pending bill for the admission of the new State of Dakota have been restated with great force and clearness. When Michigan was asserting her right to admission, that great apostle of State rights, Mr. Calhoun, said:

> Ours is a Federal Republic, a Union of States. Michigan is a State, a State in course of admission, differing only from the other States in her Federal relations. She is declared to be a State in the most solemn manner by your own act.

Calhoun opposed the admission of Michigan because he believed that the act would constitute the admission of a power in the Federal Government that would destroy the last vestige of State rights and give the complete control of all the States to Federal authority. Nevertheless, Michigan was admitted into the Union just twenty-four days after that eminent statesman made those declarations.

Relating to the admission of South Dakota we have from the Committee on Territories the majority and minority reports known as No. 709, presented February 24, to accompany House bill 1679, entitled "A bill to provide for the admission of South Dakota into the Union and for the organization of the Territory of North Dakota." We have also report No. 710, accompanying House bill 1942, entitled "A bill to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of North Dakota, and for other purposes," being purely an enabling act, embracing the views of the majority and minority of your committee.

We have before us also Report No. 1025, accompanying House bill 8466, a bill to provide an enabling act for Dakota, Montana, Washington, and New Mexico, which report embraces the views at length of both the majority and minority of the committee.

In the Forty-ninth Congress the Committee on Territories of both Houses of Congress made reports relative to the admission of South Dakota, and the documents known as Report No. 2577, upon House bill 8120, and Report No. 2578, to accompany Senate bill 967, were both submitted May 25, 1886.

These several reports are commended to the careful consideration of this House because they throw considerable light upon the subjects to which they relate and reveal something of the motives underlying the opposition to the immediate admission of South Dakota. My honored friend from Illinois, Mr. SPRINGER, whose able pen indited, I presume, the reports presented by him, takes strong grounds upon the questions at issue. He, speaking for the alleged majority of the committee in the reports last referred to, tells the people of Dakota that—

> The question as to whether the Territory should be admitted as a whole or subdivided into two or more States or Territories is not remitted * * * to the people of that Territory, that being a question * * * in which the people of all the country are equally interested.

Further—

> That they have neither the area, the population, nor the legal right to be admitted into the Union other than as one State.

By such declaration it is, in effect, asserted that the 600,000 people of Dakota have no right or capacity for self-government, for home rule. He asserts, in substance, that the people within a proposed State have no right or power to create a State only as consented to or ratified by the people without the proposed State. I desire just here to place before the House and recall to my honored friend's mind certain other declarations of his, involving, to my mind, the same identical principles; declarations that redound vastly more to his patriotism than the sentiments already quoted. Writing to Mr. Ford, editor of the Irish World, the gentleman says:

> I take pleasure in complying with your request for an expression of my views on the Irish question. Every lover of liberty throughout the world is in sympathy with Mr. Parnell and his compatriots in Parliament in their demand for home rule for Ireland. Americans, more perhaps than others, share this feeling. The London Times and other Tory organs demand "the maintenance of the integrity of the empire," which is but another name for English rule over the Irish people without their consent. This presents a vital issue—home rule against foreign rule, freedom against slavery. I am for home rule, freedom, and Parnell.

Yours, very truly,

WILLIAM M. SPRINGER, M. C.,
of Illinois.

These are sentiments worthy of an American statesman; but now the gentleman declares in effect to the new State of Dakota as she stands before Congress with her 77,000 square miles of territory and her 350,000 children—all stalwart American citizens—asking recognition of her constitutional right of home rule: "Every lover of liberty throughout the world rejects the demand of Dakota and her people for home rule for that State. The Congress of the United States in general, and the majority of the Committee on the Territories in particular, more than others perhaps, share this feeling. The report of the so-called majority demand the integrity of the nation outside your State, and insist upon the right of the people of all the country who are equally interested to rule you without your consent because you have neither the area, the population, nor the legal right to exercise home rule. Foreign rule for Dakota. Vassalage for her people. I am not for home rule or freedom in the State of Dakota, though I am for Ireland."

Such, if I mistake not, is the logic of my distinguished friend from Illinois, but let us hope that he will in the end be willing to concede to the new State of South Dakota what we all with him wish for down-trodden Ireland.

The present condition of affairs in that region has been embalmed in verse. This is not a quotation from the report of the so-called majority before referred to, but is given for the benefit of my friend from Illinois:

"Thus departed Hiawatha
To the land of the Dakotas,
To the land of handsome women,
Striding over moor and meadow,
Through interminable forests,
Through uninterrupted silence;
Never thought he of the railroads,
But on foot he tramped it slowly,
Till he reached far-off Dakota,
That would be a State but can not,
Can not be a State at present
For the House is Democratic,
And Dakota begs to differ;
So out in the cold they thrust it,
And its very cold and frigid—
Very cold, says Hiawatha,
As he shook himself and shivered,
Very cold is this Dakota,
Uncle Sam rejects it coldly,
So 'tis cold to Uncle Sammy,
Sends him down the blizzard roaring,
Howling, shrieking, swearing, tearing,
Freezing all the world before it,
Making ice of all the rivers,
Burying under snow the cities,
Forcing all men's teeth to chatter,
For its icy breath is colder
Than thermometer can measure,
Colder than the arctic circle,
Cold it is unutterable.
Thus spoke Hiawatha, shivering
As the blizzard surged around him,
That's what ails far-off Dakota;
In the cold we've shoved Dakota,
And Dakota's getting even;
She would be a State, but can not,
But she beats us on the blizzard."

It may be safely asserted that the admission of every new State into the Union, from Kentucky in 1791 down to Colorado in 1875, was antagonized upon grounds and for reasons as strong or stronger than those we now hear, at all events urged with distinguished ability by eminent statesmen equal in patriotism to the able gentlemen who feel constrained to lift their voices in opposition to the admission of South Dakota at this time.

In weighing the evidence adduced in the present case, both in my capacity as a member of the Committee on Territories and in the honorable position as a member from the Empire State upon this floor, I conceive it to be our duty to act in a candid, non-partisan, and impartial manner, remembering that our votes affect the interests and involve the rights of nearly a half million people, who have, in a spirit of loyalty, created of themselves and their 77,000 square miles of territory a new State, and now desire to be admitted to equal rights under the Constitution of their fathers into the sisterhood of States.

We are to deal, Mr. Chairman, with great and sacred interests. In my judgment we sit here in the capacity of a great court of equity, governed in our deliberations, as we should be, by well-settled principles which demand application at our hands, by our decree, with regard solely for the rights of those concerned as by the facts may appear just and equitable.

The original purpose of the union of States, as declared by our forefathers, was—to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity.

Unto Congress was reserved the power to admit new States into this Union. Congress has the—power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territories belonging to the United States.

Congress has no power to create a new State, but may admit a new State into this Union, and shall guaranty such State when into the Union a republican form of government.

The people, and they only, who shall exercise the power to resolve accordingly, may create a new State, and when they come presenting a proper state of facts, a case in equity, and petition Congress for admission into the Union, I submit most earnestly that it is the duty of this court of equity to admit the new State. It is the right of such State to be admitted without delay and to be guarantied a republican form of government, to the end that justice may be established, domestic tranquillity insured, common defense provided, general welfare promoted, and the blessings of liberty secured to themselves and their posterity. There is clearly a mutuality of obligations.

If all needful and requisite conditions are complied with; if, as I have stated, a complete case in equity is presented, so that it is made manifest that a "new State" in the sense implied by those words exists, I submit they have a right to be admitted into the Union. Congress is in duty bound to grant the prayer of the petitioners and admit the new State. To refuse is a denial of justice to the people of such State, a denial of a clear constitutional right.

In my judgment, our duty is the same as if the Constitution had in so many words provided that whenever a new State shall be formed and present to Congress a constitution republican in form, with evidence that the people thereof possess the intelligence, capacity, resources, and various qualifications necessary to maintain themselves as a State, and that they have voluntarily pledged themselves to fidelity to the Constitution of the United States, and to assume and discharge all the duties and obligations of statehood, then and in such case it shall be the duty of Congress to admit such new State immediately on an equality with the original thirteen States.

The benefits in such case are mutual. To deny the right is like a parent refusing to accept the stalwart son that comes with the ability to bear a share of the burdens theretofore borne by the parent alone, and to deny and reject that mutual strength and protection which comes through union.

Were we threatened with foreign invasion, and the danger impending of losing some part of our domain embraced in either of the States whose borders are washed by the waters of either ocean, could we reach out and call on the hardy men who have made the vast plains of the Northwest blossom like the rose, and say you are not capable of self-government, unworthy of statehood, have no place in our Union of States, but you may come and help us repel the invader that threatens a part of the Union.

Having said this much in a general way, let us, Mr. Chairman, consider the facts as now presented with regard to Dakota. It appears that the people residing in that portion of the Territory which lies south of the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude have framed and adopted a State constitution—that they have organized the machinery of a State government and through their authorized agents presented such constitution to Congress and now ask admission into the Union. The power to admit this State into the Union exists, as I have said, alone with Congress, and the question that confronts us is: Is it proper to do so? As I have stated, it is the duty of Congress to admit new States when the requisite conditions exist. That such is true is apparent from the provisions of the Constitution which, by giving such authority contemplates the exercise thereof in proper cases.

Therefore the question which demands our first consideration is: Do the conditions exist in the present case which should prompt the performance of that duty? This involves other questions which may be classified as follows:

First. Have the people of the proposed State, in an orderly and authoritative manner, expressed their desire to become clothed with the power of State government?

Second. Have they proceeded in a justifiable and regular way to place themselves in condition for admission?

Third. Are the constitution and State government which they have adopted and organized republican in form?

Fourth. Do such conditions exist as to area, population, production, resources, morals, lawful and orderly practices, as will assure the existence and continuance of a permanent State government?

If all these propositions are affirmatively established, then beyond question it is the duty as well as within the power of Congress to admit Dakota into the Union.

Certain facts appear to be established and are undisputed, namely, that at the Territorial Legislative Assembly for the Territory of Dakota, held at the capital of said Territory in February, 1885, a law was duly enacted, with the approval of the governor, calling a constitutional convention for all that portion of Dakota south of the forty-sixth parallel; providing for its assemblage, the payment of its expenses, and the conducting of an election thereunder; that delegates were apportioned to each county, aggregating in number 111; that an election of such delegates was duly held throughout such part of Dakota in June following, and in September thereafter, on the day and at the place appointed by the law, the convention duly assembled; that it duly organized, and, during a session of eighteen days, drafted a constitution, provided for its submission to a vote of the people, and for the election of the officers specified in such constitution; that on the 3d day of November succeeding such constitution was ratified by a vote of the people, 25,226 voters in favor thereof to 6,565 against it; that State officers, a Legislature, and members of Congress were duly elected; that thereafter, in December next ensuing, at the temporary capitol of the State, pursuant to the schedule of the said constitution, the State Legislature assembled and elected two persons as United States Senators. By such schedule the governor, the Senators, and the members of the House of Representatives thus elected, together with two other persons, were constituted a committee to present such constitution to this Congress and ask admission for the new State into the Union. That those gentlemen have performed their duty. Thus far all the proceedings must be admitted as regular and orderly, and they evidently seem to be a clear manifestation, in an authoritative way, of the desire of the people of the State of Dakota for admission into the Union. The regularity of this mode of seeking admission can not be successfully questioned. Twenty-five States have been admitted since the adoption of the Federal Constitution. Of this number, twelve have been admitted under proceedings, in principle, the same as taken by Dakota, namely: Tennessee, Kentucky, Florida, Maine, Vermont, Michigan, Arkansas, Wisconsin, Iowa, Kansas, California, and Oregon. In some of the cases of the States just named the direct question of the regularity of the mode of proceedings by which admission was demanded was in issue, thoroughly debated, and the propriety and validity of so proceeding affirmed in both Houses of Congress by large majorities.

Some of the ablest statesmen that ever graced the legislative halls of the nation participated in those discussions. It would seem that this question is clearly and unquestionably foreclosed and settled by such precedents. It would seem that such grounds, if ever firm enough whereon to found an argument, were forever swept away by the floods of eloquence which in those days carried into the Union the States named. May it not be asserted that it is too late for Congress to question the propriety of the proceedings taken by Dakota? I think so.

An examination of the constitution discloses that it and the State government thereunder are republican in form. Whether the domestic policies proposed to be enforced are wise or unwise, whether they meet with our approval or disapproval as individuals, are not questions for us to consider. The people who have adopted the constitution, with those who may hereafter voluntarily share with them in the benefits to be derived from the State government, are alone the ones to be benefited or injured by such policies.

So long as there is nothing therein that affects the general welfare of the people of all the States, or which would tend to render the State an undesirable member of the Federal Union, the Constitution clothes Congress with no power to object to the admission of the State because we individually may differ with the people of that State regarding such policies.

The important inquiry relates to the ability of those people to become a permanent and enduring and successful member of the United States of America.

The proposed area is 77,000 square miles. This will constitute a State the eighth in size in our Union and nearly equal to any one of three of the seven largest ones. In this connection it may be of interest to notice the areas of the several States, beginning with the largest and numbering them in their order:

*No Territorial government.
†Reduced from 100 to 70 square miles by recession of part to Virginia, in 1846.
The whole area of the States and Territories, including water surface of lakes and rivers, is nearly equal to 4,000,000 square miles.

It will be seen that South Dakota as a State is equal to the combined areas of several of the States, and if precedent shall govern, if the wisdom heretofore displayed by the nation shall prevail with us, Dakota must be regarded as ample in area to constitute a strong, substantial, permanent State. But, it is well said, area alone is not sufficient; capacity for production is essential. That capacity in Dakota's case is well known and will not be controverted. It has productive soil throughout its entire extent; it is traversed by no considerable mountain ranges; it is well watered; it is within the parallels of latitude where nearly all the necessary products for the maintenance of the human race can be readily produced.

What are the facts as shown by the most recent census? These are some of them. It has 50,237 farms in actual operation, with an average of 194 acres each. It has 3,754,864 acres of land under actual improvement and cultivation. In 1884 it raised 7,553,030 bushels of corn, 12,829,578 bushels of wheat, 2,257,491 bushels of flax, 11,783,727 bushels of oats. It had then 142,321 horses and mules, 584,510 head of cattle, 205,985 sheep, 250,916 hogs. These figures are given by the official census made in June, 1885, under the act of Congress authorizing the same. That census discloses also the following interesting facts:

Value of farms	$87,131,050
Value of live-stock	25,950,022
Value of farm products for 1884	17,095,805

It will be seen that these figures are those given for 1884, as the census was taken in June, 1885, and related, of course, to the previous year. In a community growing so rapidly as that it is fair to presume that the increase was very large during the past years (1885, 1886, and 1887). It is claimed by parties who are familiar with the condition of the Territory, that by reason of the increase and the enhanced price of farm products for 1885, 1886, and 1887, the values may reasonably be estimated at 50 per cent. over the census just referred to.

The assessed valuation for taxation of property for 1885, exclusive of railroads, which are taxed upon their gross earnings, as shown by the auditor's report, was $63,570,197. The number of miles of railroad in the State of Dakota is something over 1,650. It appears that at the close of the year 1887 there were in operation and in course of completion over 4,000 miles of railroad, an increase of about 100 per cent. in a little over two years.

It should be borne in mind, too, that these assessed valuations being as they are, for taxation purposes only, like many of the States, are much below the actual value. It would seem to be the case here, for, by the auditor's report made in the fall of 1885, the valuations per acre of land and the value per head of animals are given as follows:

Land per acre	$3.55
Horses per head	46.57
Mules per head	56.47
Cattle per head	14.09
Sheep per head	1.15
Swine per head	2.09

A good mode of ascertaining the permanency of resources is to consider the amount of capital employed in banking, and this also exhibits the faith which the people themselves have in their future. It appears that there were in the fall of 1885 in the State 26 national banks, employing a capital of $1,525,000, with an aggregate surplus of $375,000; since then the figures are largely increased. That the people expended for school purposes in 1885 $1,200,000. That they maintained in 1884, as appears by the report of the superintendent of public instruction, 1,535 schools, and had at that time 1,340 schoolhouses, and that the number of colleges, universities, and normal schools in the State is 12. The records of the Post-Office Department disclose the fact that they had, in 1885, 606 post-offices, 33 of which are Presidential offices, more in number than those of any one of thirteen States now in the Union. It appears, further, that the postal revenue for that portion of the Territory included in the new State for the year ending June 30, 1885, amounted to $225,802.23, while the record shows that on the 1st of January, 1888, the increase in all these figures was nearly 100 per cent.

The people of the new State, it appears, have also made preparation for statehood, having full and complete machinery for charitable and penal institutions, erected and maintained at their own cost and expense, namely, a penitentiary, an insane hospital, and an asylum for the deaf, dumb, and blind. It must be conceded that with all this array of facts, which have at no time been questioned, that the area, resources, and wealth of the new State are entirely sufficient to convince any that the State comes fully armed and equipped with all that is requisite to entitle her to a full share of the rights, benefits, and privileges guarantied by the Constitution, and to enable her to bear more than a full proportion of the burdens incident to membership in the family of States. Her population is, as appears by the census taken in June, 1885, 263,553, and admitted by all to be now not less than 400,000, certainly all that may with reason or justice be demanded of any new State applying for admission into the Union.

It is largely more than was possessed by any other State upon emerging from a Territorial condition to statehood, and the only States which have been admitted out of the twenty-five which had a larger population than Dakota are those which were formed from other States or admitted by compact and treaty.

The present basis of representation in the House of Representatives is 151,911. No State ever organized from the public domain had at the time of admission anything like the present population of South Dakota. I reproduce here a table showing the ratio of representation and the population at date of admission of all the States.

In the way of population the most careful research will fail to show that more population has ever been required as a condition for admission than sufficient to entitle the people to one Representative in the lower House of Congress. This number at the last apportionment was a little less than 152,000, so that in Dakota's case there exists not only a unit of population sufficient for one Representative, but under the rule adopted by Congress in making such apportionment Dakota is clearly entitled to two members of the House of Representatives. Having, then, complied with all the conditions which have ever been required, or which can reasonably be required, of a people seeking to emerge from a condition of Territorial government to that of a State government; having sought in vain for the invitation through an enabling act, as extended to half of the States heretofore admitted, and now having come, as I have said, thoroughly armed and equipped as a State, presenting in one hand her constitution, thoroughly republican in form, and exhibiting in the other hand facts and statistics proving that her resources are ample to feed the world, and, I say, with no controversy existing with reference to such facts, what objection can be urged against Dakota's immediate admission?

It is said, first, that she has proceeded in her application for admission in an irregular and revolutionary method; second, that the State has been organized out of a portion only of the great Territory of Dakota. This Territory was organized subsequent to the admission of the States of Iowa, Minnesota, and Wisconsin, which were carved out successively and admitted as States from territory including what is now the Territory of Dakota.

Let us examine these propositions and ascertain if the objections made are at all tenable. It will be borne in mind that twenty-five States have been admitted since the Constitution was adopted by the thirteen original States. Of the twenty-five, Texas was admitted under a treaty compact, it being at the time an independent sovereign state; West Virginia was admitted by virtue of the power to consent to a division of one State into two or more States; Maine was admitted by the consent of Massachusetts, of which it formed a part; Vermont was admitted by the consent of the contiguous States of New Hampshire and New York, which made some claim to it; Louisiana was admitted under the treaty with France, but was already an organized community.

Twenty States, therefore, are all that have been admitted into the Union from the Territories belonging to the United States, exclusive of Louisiana. Some of these have been admitted without any previous Territorial organization. One-half of them had previous enabling acts and the remaining half had no such acts, or at least none under which proceedings were taken to organize themselves into States and make application for admission. The method pursued by Dakota is precisely identical in principle with that pursued by Tennessee, Iowa, Michigan, Arkansas, Wisconsin, California, Oregon, Kansas, Florida, and Kentucky. Thus it is shown that one-half of all the States admitted into the Union from the outlying and unorganized territories belonging to the United States pursued the same identical course which the people of Dakota have pursued in their efforts to obtain admission of their State. Can it, then, be claimed with reason that Dakota has pursued any irregular method, since she has followed the precedents which have been approved by Congress in one-half of all the States admitted from Territories? Upon principle are not these precedents just as binding upon Congress as those where the other method was pursued? What, I ask, is an enabling act but a mere invitation to the people of a portion of the territory of the United States to organize themselves into a State and apply for admission into the Union?

I have said Congress can not make a State. It has the power to admit new States, not to create them. Congress organizes Territorial governments solely under the authority of the Constitution, which gives the right "to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territories or other property belonging to the United States." The people alone can organize the State. It must be their work. No other power or tribunal can do it for them. The power is reserved to Congress to admit new States.

Congress may clothe a community in a Territory with the forms of laws under which they may proceed to organize for themselves a constitution and State government, and all the effect which the law of Congress has upon the subject is merely to throw around their proceedings such forms of law as will allow and direct an orderly movement of the people to the desired end. If Congress neglects or refuses to thus directly furnish such community with the forms of law—the invitation—under which these proceedings may be had, may not the local legislative authority perform that, or may not the people themselves in their primary capacity assemble in public convention, frame and adopt a constitution, organize a State government, and demand admission of the new State thus formed into the Union? Either method is clearly regular.

The power of Congress, I submit, is merely to determine whether all the conditions exist which entitle the new State to admission, and having determined affirmatively, it is the duty of Congress to grant without delay the admission which a fair construction of the Constitution in its letter and spirit evidently entitles them to. It appears that for seven years—ever since the session of Congress in 1879—those people have been appealing to Congress to invite them, by its legislation, to do that which they have finally proceeded to do in the absence of such an enabling act, because it was denied them by Congress; and in the exercise of their rights as American citizens they have in an orderly and regular method, in accordance with recognized precedents, created a new State. Every step taken, every act done, all their proceedings are conceded to be orderly, regular, methodical; their constitution republican in form, their State organization and government complete in all things, their representatives here in respectful waiting, ready to co-operate in the great work of administering the affairs of the great American Union, and through their duly accredited representatives the new State, of right, I say, demand admission into the Union. Congress, under the power conferred by the Constitution, could do no more if the new State had been created after the security of an enabling act. Can the clear right of these people to be clothed with the power of local self-government and to be allowed to form an integral part of the American Union be denied with equity because they have pursued the methods sanctioned by Congress in one half of the cases instead of those pursued in the other half?

Upon the question of the admission of the southern portion of the Territory only and the taking from the entire Territory of this part to form a State, it would seem there should no difficulty arise.

The policy of the Government from its earliest history has been to form States of medium size, and that policy has never been departed from except under peculiar circumstances—circumstances which necessarily took the cases out of the general rule.

When the Government of the United States was in its infancy, even before the formation and adoption of the Constitution, we find this policy enforced by those who were the founders of that Government. After the close of the Revolutionary war there was found a great outlying territory not incorporated or included in any State, lying east of the Mississippi River and north, as well as south, of the Ohio River. Claims of ownership to this territory or some portions of it were made by several of the States. Virginia seemed to have the strongest claim to the largest portion. Her patriotic people were willing to yield that claim for the benefit of all the States, but only upon condition.

First. That such Territory should not be kept for any considerable time in a colonial condition. The wrongs pertaining to colonial existence, then happily righted, were too recent and too fresh in the minds of the people of the new nation to allow the thought to be entertained for one moment that a people could be kept outside of the Union in a state of dependency when they were in a condition to exercise the rights of sovereign statehood.

Again, the areas of the States already in the Union were familiar to them, and so we find that by the compact under which patriotic Virginia ceded her claims to the territory northwest of the Ohio River she imposed the condition that in all that territory whenever 60,000 free inhabitants should assemble and become permanent citizens that they should have the absolute right to form for themselves a constitution and State government republican in form, and should be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States. More than that, we find that the condition was imposed that no great State in area overshadowing the other States should be formed thereout, but that such territory should be divided into not less than three States and not more than five. It appears that in following the provisions of such compact four States have been formed, namely, the great States of Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, and Illinois. In forming the States of Kentucky and Tennessee and o Mississippi and Alabama, the same policy with reference to area has been adhered to.

When the country lying west of the Mississippi River was acquired from France all that portion which included the States of Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, and the Territory of Dakota had the like provisions of the ordinance of 1787 extended to it, and the States of Missouri, Arkansas, Iowa, Wisconsin, Kansas, Minnesota, and Nebraska followed in the same line of policy.

Now, what have been the exceptions? First, the State of Texas. As we have seen, that State was admitted by treaty compact. It was itself an Empire or State. Its people exercised their own sovereign will upon the subject of admission, but it appears further in that compact whenever by their own volition they may choose to adopt the policy which theretofore governed the United States in the admission of new States, they are at liberty to do so, and may separate into five sovereign States if they will. California, Colorado, and Nevada are, apparently, exceptions. In each of those States the area, exclusive of mountain ranges, which are not and can not for many years become inhabitable, is less than the area of the new State of Dakota.

Dakota is one vast fertile plain, capable in all its parts of producing in unlimited amount the cereals which support human life. It can and will be made no doubt one continued series of farms. Its people are and always will be largely an agricultural people, with her business and manufacturing interests based upon the pursuits of agriculture. Why should the policy, the universal policy of the Government be departed from in this instance and those people be coerced by Congress into accepting boundaries for their State which they have so clearly demonstrated are distasteful to and not desired by them?

If the people select such areas and boundaries as will constitute a strong and substantial State and by so doing do not interfere with any governmental policy of the United States, why should they not be permitted such selection? They are the ones who are in interest. The carving out of this great Territory the new State of South Dakota leaves ample territory to support a Territorial government and for the formation of another great and powerful State in the process of time.

But it is said these people have not made this selection. Certainly individual statements count for but little. Organized expressions disclose popular will. Upon almost any subject that may be mentioned individuals may and do differ, but when a community through its organized voice speaks its will it should be regarded. Now it appears, and is uncontradicted, that as early as 1871 the Legislature of the Territory asked Congress to divide the Territory on the parallel of latitude which has been agreed upon by them in creating the new State. That petition has been followed by others from every legislative assembly, composed of delegates from all portions of the Territory, from that day to the present. It appears that not one word of remonstrance has been heard. Two constitutional conventions have been provided for by legislative enactments for South Dakota alone, one following the other at the succeeding session. Down to the very last opportunity as late as the session of their Legislature in 1885, there was presented to Congress a memorial passed unanimously in both houses praying for the same line of division.

Necessarily, through so many years of effort, this must have been a subject of discussion. If this is not an expression of the people's will, Congress would have been advised of it in some orderly and authoritative manner. Individuals may have questioned the policy or propriety of such division, but, if so, they have not been in sufficient numerical strength to make themselves felt anywhere.

It is undisputed, also, that both political parties at every session of their Territorial conventions, where all the people of all the Territory were represented, have in every succeeding biennial year pronounced the same desire for division, and down to the last assemblages of either party resolutions to that effect were reported from their committees and adopted, as appears, without a single voice dissenting. And it further appears that twice have constitutions for South Dakota been adopted by an overwhelming majority. It appears, moreover, that this will of the people has been clearly manifested, by their Legislatures providing for a double set of government buildings, one for North and one for South Dakota.

Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been spent in providing for and in anticipation of the division which they have so earnestly prayed for and which they had every reason to believe would be vouchsafed them as of right. It is shown that fifteen separate enactments have been passed relating to such government buildings, wherein provisions have been made for each division to assume and pay the indebtedness incurred for such building; that such legislation is spread over a period of six years, and was enacted by three separate legislatures. If it were not the universal popular will that such division should be had, can it be conceived that those persons selected by the people, and the only ones selected by the people in their Territorial government, would, term after term, expend the people's money in making preparations for division? Clearly it was unnecessary to duplicate their penal and charitable institutions in so young a community except for the purpose of providing for this universally-demanded division.

But it is said objections are made by some of the people to division. No remonstrances have been presented to Congress. It will not, it can not, be contended that if any considerable number of Dakotians, much more, if a majority thereof, objected to the division as made that such objections would not have been presented before the two Houses of Congress in a most emphatic form.

On the contrary, with the exception of a few gentlemen who by their own acknowledgment were here in the interest of one locality, which interest was based upon some supposed benefit to accrue by the selection in the act of their town and locality for the seat of government, not one word has reached the ear of Congress or of any committee thereof from any source that the people are not in accord with the will as expressed through all their organized assemblages that have convened for the last fifteen years.

If the expression had been once or even twice made, it might be claimed that the opportunity to raise the issue and have it fairly tested was wanting, but when for so long a period and under every circumstance that will has been expressed in all the ways open to them except by popular vote, no one can reasonably doubt the desire of those people. A popular vote upon that question was had last fall and a clear majority gave expression in favor of division. We are invited by the authorized agents of the new State in the memorial which has been presented to put this question to a popular vote of all the people of the whole Territory, and to make the taking effect of the act of admission depend upon an affirative vote on that question.

But I submit that Congress ought not and would not sanction the admission of the whole Territory as one State. The people of a proposed State carved out of the territory of the United States ought to be permitted to select such area and boundaries as will assure a strong, substantial, permanent State. Beyond that Congress should itself determine how many States shall be carved out of a given region of country. The new State is large enough. If objection there be, it lies in its being too large. It appears that in selecting such area the precedents immediately surrounding their State under similar conditions have been very closely followed, and wisely so, in my opinion. It is axiomatic that a small State, with its government close to the people, can be and is governed better and with greater economy than a large State. Too large a State has been said to be dangerous to the American Union. Its independence of the fellowship of its sister States is too keenly felt. A great empire might feel itself capable of protecting its own interest as a sovereignty. It might feel no want of that mutual protection which is the guaranty and the safeguard of the American Union. In legislating upon this matter of the admission of a new State it is wise to remember that we are legislating for all time. If we err now, our mistake is likely to be impossible of correction. It can not be denied that either portion of this Territory, when divided upon the parallel of latitude proposed, will make two States eventually sufficient in area to constitute very powerful commonwealths.

No voice, Mr. Chairman, comes to us from that great Territory asking to be habilitated with statehood except from that portion which had framed its constitution and organized its State government. On the contrary, at several successive sessions of Congress, representatives, from both sections, in large numbers have visited the Capitol and have urged upon Congress the division of the Territory upon the forty-ninth parallel, or upon the seventh standard parallel, and the admission of the southern part as a State. In my opinion we have no power, and we should have no inclination, to force upon any people the formation of a State government. The people of the new State of South Dakota do desire to be at once clothed with the powers and privileges and charged with the duties and obligations of a State in the Union.

The people of the other portions of the Territory have asked that they be continued under a Territorial government. What right have we, or why ought we to so legislate as to thwart their wishes? They are the ones whose desires should be consulted, and so long, which is here apparent, as it is not detrimental to the general welfare of the nation they should be permitted to determine for themselves their own destiny. There are no reasons which can with equity be urged for the organization of such an immense area into one commonwealth, but many exist in favor of the small area. The proposed dividing line seems to me to be a natural one, and separates two compact symmetrical and homogeneous communities.

The lines of immigration and communication are all along the same parallels of latitude, and necessarily must always remain so. The great systems of railway communications have been constructed with a view to this division. Even the Christian denominations have in their preparations for the future prosecution of their labors for humanity had regard for the present division. This division seems to be demanded by all the circumstances and conditions surrounding those people, and by the welfare as well of the other States of the Union.

The able and exhaustive report upon this subject made by the honorable the Senate Committee on Territories to accompany Senate bill No. 967, in the Forty-ninth Congress, and laid upon the tables of the members of this House, embraces many features and covers many other points to which I may not recur because my time will not permit. I invite its careful perusal and consideration by the House. One other subject has been a matter of some discussion. It is and ever should be the policy of the Government to have the Territories organized into States and admitted into the Union as soon as the conditions therein will justify.

Chief-Justice Taney said:

A Territory is acquired to become a State, and not to be held as a colony and governed by Congress with absolute authority.

Territorial governments are organized as matters of necessity, because the people are too few in number and too scant in resources to maintain a State government. These governments are contrary to the spirit of our American Constitution. They are to be tolerated and continued only so long as that necessity exists.

The three millions of American people rebelled against the exercise of the same identical powers by Great Britain over them which the Government exercises over the Territories. They complained, and were by the world justified in complaining, that they were kept in a state of semi-vassalage. They had their governor appointed by a foreign tribunal; so have the Territories. They had their judges appointed by the same foreign tribunals; so have the Territories. They had their local legislatures, which enacted laws for them, subject to the revision of the same foreign agency, and so have the Territories. They were taxed without representation; so are the Territories. Laws were made for them by a tribunal in which they had no voice, and in which they could exercise no influence except such as one citizen may, by petition and argument, exercise over another; so have the Territories. They dared the force of the most powerful nation on the face of the earth to be rid of these evils. They were rid of them, and it never was contemplated that, in this day and generation, they should impose upon their fellow-citizens the same evils which had been imposed in those days by their fellow-citizens upon them. It will be a happy solution of many difficulties in legislation when all the outlying Territories may be populated, created into States, and admitted into the Union. The necessity for Territorial governments is unquestioned, but no effort should be made to constitute it an enduring evil anywhere. It is unjust to the new State to reject it. It is a self-imposed wrong upon the old States so keep her out, and to do so can not be defended on any ground.

Representative Grow said, in January, 1857, in reporting the enabling act for Oregon: "Gentlemen seem much averse to giving this authority, which is a mere matter of form, as the people of the Territory can meet in their assemblies and form a constitution and send it here as well without this authority as with it;" and Representative Jones of Tennessee said: "That is exactly my opinion."

Our own Seward, of honored memory, in the California case said (and it should be remembered that she came without an enabling act):

> Shall California be received? I answer yes. Let California come in. Every new State, whether she comes from the East or from the West, every new State coming from whatever part of the continent she may is always welcome. But California, that comes from the clime where the West dies away into the rising East; California, which bounds at once the empire and the continent; California, the youthful queen of the Pacific in her robes of freedom gorgeously inlaid with gold, is doubly welcome.

And so, Mr. Chairman, I say, welcome, thrice welcome South Dakota! She comes bearing in her arms the horn of plenty, promising abundance to her sister States West, South, and East. Her's is the heart of the great Northwest, that beats true to the music of liberty. She comes instructed in the correct countersign, "The Constitution and the Union," and this Congress, being on guard, can do no prouder, grander act than "pass her into the very heart of the citadel of the American Union."

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. In order that the iniquity of this Democratic Ephraim may be more fully uncovered, I yield ten minutes to my friend from Iowa [Mr. KERR].

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, I rise more particularly to controvert the views presented by one member of the committee on this side of the House. I think we ought not to discourage Democratic economy, and the Republican members of the committee certainly should not favor increasing the salaries of the officers connected with this House. When we are told that there are five doorkeepers at one door, four at another, two or three at another, and so on at the various stations around this Hall, it seems to me the principles of economy might eliminate a considerable portion of this number and leave us still perfectly safe in our deliberations.

But certainly there is no necessity for increasing salaries. The gentlemen whom we have at our doors appear to be a very satisfactory class of officers; the quality of their service seems to be very good, and the salaries now paid, having been sufficient to secure the services of competent men, it seems to me it would be an imputation on those gentlemen for any one to ask that their salaries be increased, on the theory that an increase of salary is necessary to secure competent officials.

I wish, also, to call attention to a remark made by the gentleman from Dakota [Mr. GIFFORD], in regard to one of the policies which was promised in the last Democratic platform and which has been entirely disregarded by the present Administration. In the national Democratic platform, as the record shows, there was a provision declaring that the people of the Territories should be governed by men selected from the body of the local community.

This provision has been entirely ignored, and those great Territories of the West are to-day governed almost entirely by officers selected from other portions of the country, the positions having been distributed so as to reward Democratic partisans in various States of the East. This is a direct violation of the pledge made on behalf of the Democratic Administration in the last national platform, and I desire to call attention to it in connection with that extraordinary bill which has been reported to the House providing for the admission into the Union of four States at once. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], who has brought in that bill, seems to be anxious to restore the old rule which prevailed in the practice of our Government for about half a century, that no State from the northern section of the country should be admitted into the Union unless at the same time, and in order to counterbalance its vote, a State from the southern section of the Union was admitted.

This bill is reported here with the knowledge that one of its main features—the admission of the whole State of Dakota—has been repudiated by a popular vote of that Territory, which declared in favor of division. In spite of that vote, in spite of the fact that South Dakota contains an area larger by one-half than the average of the States now in the Union, we are asked to vote for this omnibus bill, involving the old theory which prevailed in this country, or else we must keep South Dakota out of the Union until another administration. What is the purpose of this? That a Democratic administration may still have, for the reward of its party favorites, the disposal of the patronage of the great Territories of the West? This is what we may fairly infer from the policy pursued by the present Administration.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. They are afraid of the electoral vote.

Mr. KERR. Yes, I presume that is another consideration which enters into the case. The Territory of South Dakota would be entitled, according to the principles which were referred to by the gentleman from New York, to 3 votes in this body, and to 5 votes in the electoral college, which might determine the next Presidential election. Yet this omnibus bill is reported in order that the wish of the people may be restrained——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to bring into this discussion any reference to the Territorial question; but my friend from New York [Mr. BAKER], a member of the Committee on the Territories, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR], have seen fit to enter into a discussion of that question; hence I feel it my duty to state what I understand to be the position of this side of the House in regard to the admission of new Territories into the Union.

The gentleman from New York, as well as the gentleman from Iowa, seemed to be of opinion that this side of the House is endeavoring to keep out of the Union the Territory of Dakota for the sole reason that, if admitted into the Union as a State, she would vote the Republican ticket, and that we do not desire to admit any Republican Territory unless at the same time a Democratic Territory be admitted to counterbalance it. So far as regards the admission of Dakota into the Union, I want to call the attention of both sides of the House to the fact that the only party in this House or in the Territory of Dakota that is favoring the admission of Dakota into the Union at this time as a State is the Democratic party.

Gentlemen on the other side point to the fact there are five or six hundred thousand inhabitants in Dakota and ask, are not these inhabitants entitled to admission into the Union? They seem to think we are trying to keep them out. That is not the issue presented by gentlemen on the other side of the House. They are not anxious for the admission of Dakota into the Union as a State. They are opposing its admission into the Union. Their contention is for a division of Dakota into two parts and for the admission of the southern part into the Union as a State. All through their discussions and in the newspapers the Republican party and the Republicans especially in Dakota have taken the position that they desire Dakota to remain in a Territorial condition. They resist her admission into the Union as a whole, desiring that she should remain in a Territorial condition until she can be admitted as two States.

What is their claim for division based upon? Gentlemen say the people of Dakota desire a division. I say the people of Dakota do not, in my opinion, desire a division at this time. I am authorized to say that by the last expression of opinion of the people of that Territory. I am speaking of popular votes and not of Republican conventions.

There was a popular vote held in Dakota in November, 1887—that is, last November. In pursuance of an act of the Legislature of the Territory, the question was submitted to the people of Dakota as to whether they desired a division of the Territory or not. At the same time there was submitted the question of local option. The object was to draw out a large vote at that election. Great efforts were made by those favoring a division of the Territory to obtain a large vote and a large majority in favor of a division of the Territory. At that election there were cast 37,784 votes in favor of a division of the Territory, and 32,913 against the division of the Territory, making a majority in the whole Territory of 4,781 in favor of the division.

The official returns of that election are given in one of the reports submitted by the Committee on Territories to this House (Report 1025, page 23).

There were cast at that election about 70,000 votes in the aggregate. At the election for Delegate to Congress the year before there were polled an aggregate of 104,000 votes in the Territory. There were undoubtedly more votes in the Territory of Dakota in 1887, a year afterwards, than there were before at the election for Delegate to Congress. If we deduct from the number of votes the number voting for division in 1887 we find 67,000 were opposed to division of the Territory, or were so indifferent as to the result as not to turn out and cast their vote.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. It is not true. The theory is that those not voting were in favor of this majority proposition—that is, for the division of the Territory.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am speaking of the people of Dakota, who are said to be so much in favor of division. If they desired to divide the Territory they would not be so indifferent as not to come out when that was the question submitted to them for their vote. They would not be so indifferent as to remain at home. The presumption therefore is that those who remained at home were not in favor of the division of the Territory or were indifferent upon the subject.

Mr. WARNER. Will my friend permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes; I always yield to the genial gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. WARNER. Did it not appear before the Committee on Territories that the Republican and Democratic conventions which nominated Delegates to Congress passed resolutions in favor of the division of Dakota?

Mr. SPRINGER. The Democratic convention of 1886 passed a resolution in favor of submitting the question of division to a vote of the people.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. That is, they did not mean to stand up to it unless it went their way. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. If, therefore, we are to be guided as to the admission of Dakota by the wishes of the people themselves, a large majority of the people are evidently either indifferent to division or are opposed to it.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Now, will my friend pardon me for a moment? Does the gentleman pretend, as to those who remained away from the polls, that their remaining away would indicate their opposition to the questions presented?

Mr. SPRINGER. I have not stated that. I stated that the majority of the people of Dakota were either indifferent to the question presented or are opposed to the division of the Territory. To be more accurate, 32,000 voted against division and 34,000 were so indifferent about it as not to vote at all.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. And the gentleman holds, then, that although both parties had submitted the proposition to a convention and an election, that a majority of that election should not bind?

Mr. SPRINGER. A majority of those who voted, I have already said, did vote—a majority of 4,781—in favor of a division. I am quite aware of that, but the point I make——

Mr. STRUBLE. Permit me a moment in this connection.

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. STRUBLE. Upon the fact that both parties in the Territory had theretofore favored division, is it not fairer to assume that the people who staid away upon the report of both conventions did so presuming the proposition would be carried, and were therefore in favor of the proposition?

Mr. SPRINGER. No. Both parties did not favor division in 1886 or 1887. The Republicans generally favored division, but the Democrats generally opposed division. Hence we have no right to assume anything as to the opinion of the people, or to presume what they would have done except what is clear from their own action. What the people who did not go to the election would have done we can not say.

Mr. REED. But you draw a certain inference.

Mr. SPRINGER. Based on certain facts. I infer——

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Does the gentleman——

Mr. SPRINGER. Let me proceed for a moment. I infer that the people who did not go to the polls were indifferent as to the question of division, and hence that the majority of the people were either indifferent or opposed to division.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Although both parties resolved in favor of it in convention? Was it not a fair presumption that both parties were in favor of it after they had done that? And where a majority of the people voted on the proposition submitted, and carried it, is that not conclusive?

Mr. SPRINGER. The Republican party resolved in favor of division; the Democratic convention in 1886, as I understand it, resolved only in favor of submitting the question of division to a vote of the people. The Democratic party in the Territory was at that time divided on the question, and an agreement to submit the question to a popular vote was reached.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Well, even so—a majority of the people voted in favor of it.

Mr. SYMES. Is it not a fact that the Democratic candidate for Congress, who was against the division, and made his canvass for the Democratic nomination against the question of division, was defeated, and the Democratic candidate was nominated who advocated the division?

Mr. SPRINGER. Oh, yes; your side stocked the cards on us and defeated our candidate. [Laughter.]

Mr. SYMES. Does the gentleman think, then, that a few Republicans are running the Democratic party out there?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. We do not exactly understand the reference the gentleman has made to stocking the cards.

Mr. SPRINGER. The question of division in the Territory of Dakota is not so much of a partisan question there as it is outside of the Territory. There are many Democrats in the Territory who favor division, and many Republicans there who are opposed to it. It is not strictly a partisan question there. These questions are controlled in many instances by the localities in which gentlemen live. Many of the ablest and most pronounced Republicans in the Territory are opposed to division, and a few Democrats of some prominence are in favor of division.

Mr. SYMES. But let the gentleman answer this question: Did not the Territorial Democratic convention vote down with a whoop the man who was making his canvass for nomination against the division, and vote up with a whoop the man who advocated it, and did they not resolve for division in that platform?

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir; I do not so understand it. It is true that the candidate who favored division was nominated. But the convention adopted a resolution in favor of submitting to the people the question of division of the Territory. That is what was done.

Mr. SYMES. And the people carried it by 5,000 majority.

Mr. GEAR. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit me a moment? The gentleman stated that the division of Dakota was not as much a partisan question inside of the Territory as outside of it. Does the gentleman mean that it is a partisan question here?

Mr. SPRINGER. So it seems from what gentlemen on your side say, and the report of the Committee on Territories would seem to indicate that we were divided on that line.

Mr. GEAR. I only wanted to get the gentleman's opinion.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Let me ask the gentleman if that vote had gone the other way, and yet in the face of that vote we had opposed the admission of Dakota, would he have found any wisdom in that?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly not. But there is another feature to which I wish to call the attention of the committee. The gentlemen on the other side favor a proposition to divide the Territory of Dakota into two parts, and to create two governments where there is now but one. I understand that in all the operations of government in creating divisions of that character, you must consult both parties or both sides as to the new government you are to create. It was proposed in 1860 by certain gentlemen in the South that they would go off by themselves and set up an independent and a separate government. The North opposed that idea and insisted upon them remaining in the Union, taking the view that one part of the Union had no right to withdraw from the other and set up a separate and independent government for itself.

In one-half geographically of the Territory of Dakota the people, or certain counties, if you please, desire to withdraw from the Territory as a whole and set up a separate government for themselves. The question was submitted to the whole people of the Territory.

Mr. STRUBLE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. Has this principle ever been applied heretofore?

Mr. SPRINGER. In that election, as will be seen by the map which I hold before me, the whole of the people in the northern part of the Territory, the people who were to constitute North Dakota hereafter, voted (except as to two counties) against the division; and two tiers of counties on the south of the line also voted against division. The people in the counties in the Territory indicated in dark on this map voted for division. The other counties voted against it or not at all. Less than one-third of the area of the Territory voted for divison. In the proposed Territory of North Dakota there was a majority of 10,000 of the people who voted at that election against the proposition to set them off in a government by themselves. There were 15,000 in South Dakota in favor of a division of the Territory and for a separate government.

Now I ask in all fairness whether the people of North Dakota have not as much right to decide for themselves whether they will remain in a State or Territorial government with the whole of Dakota, as the people of South Dakota have to decide whether they want to secede from the Union and set up for themselves?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does the gentleman think honestly that that is on a parallel with the occurrences of 1861?

Mr. SPRINGER. When a portion of the people of any government desire to withdraw and set up for themselves I see a parallel to the occurrences of 1861. The people of South Dakota have no more right to demand a separate government than the people of the Southern States had to withdraw from the Union and be set off as a separate government by themselves. There is an overwhelming majority in North Dakota in opposition to the division of the Territory; and we owe just as much deference to the wishes of the people of Northern Dakota, who want to live in the whole of Dakota, as we do to the people of Southern Dakota, who want the Territory divided and to set up for themselves.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Was the question submitted to all these people to be tested by a popular vote?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes; and the people of South Dakota voted for a division but the people of North Dakota voted against it.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. What right has the gentleman from Illinois to assume that those who did not vote at all were against the division?

Mr SPRINGER. The majority were either against it, or indifferent to the result.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. We have heard it asserted for ten years that in the case of an election to this House we have no right to assume any such thing. When gentlemen have appeared here with a certificate based upon only a few hundred votes in some districts gentlemen have asserted the contrary. They said that those who staid at home were presumed to be in favor of the gentlemen who held the certificates. If the rule held good there it ought to hold good here.

Mr. SPRINGER. All that does not change the fact that the people of North Dakota had 10,000 majority against a division of the Territory and against being set off by themselves. And you have no right to regard the wishes of one section of the Territory and disregard the wishes of the other.

Mr. REED. How can you regard the wishes of both, if one wants a division and the other is opposed to it?

Mr. SPRINGER. In that case the better course is to maintain the status quo.

Mr. REED. The status quo can not be maintained. This is merely a territorial division, temporary in its nature, and understood to be such.

Mr. SPRINGER. The Republican party made the present boundaries of Dakota, and now they are dissatisfied with their own work, as they are with many other things they have done, when the results are presented to their cooler judgment. The status quo will be maintained whether you are dissatisfied with your work or not.

Mr. SYMES. But no more dissatisfied than with the fact that the people did not go to the polls and did not vote for division, because they were given to understand by Cleveland office-holders that the Territory must come in as a whole or remain in a territorial condition—the most accursed form of government there is—for the next ten years.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. That will not hold good longer than the next 4th of March.

Mr. SYMES. Some people are idiotic enough to think Cleveland will be re-elected. Reasonable men, however, have a different opinion.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman will change his mind in November next. He will then find he was very much mistaken about that, as he was mistaken about it four years ago. He will find that Cleveland will be elected and Dakota will not be divided.

Mr. SYMES. It will not be divided until the Republican party does it the year after next.

Mr. SPRINGER. Gentlemen say that the area of the Territory entitles it to be divided. The question of population is only temporary. In a short time the people that are moving westward will have settled up all our great Territories and there will be no longer any waste or desert places there, except in mountain regions. The people are moving to the West, and in a few years Montana, Washington, Idaho, Wyoming, Utah, Arizona, New Mexico, and I hope Oklahoma, will be settled with a vast and teeming population. Therefore, as I have said, the question of population is only of temporary concern; but the question of area will remain forever.

Now, if you propose to divide Dakota because she has 149,000 square miles, you must also divide Montana, which has only 3,000 square miles less than Dakota. And if it is to be your policy to make hereafter no larger political divisions than South Dakota would be, with an area of 77,000 square miles, then I call your attention to the fact that in the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona there is an aggregate of 245,000 square miles, which would make three States of 81,000 square miles, each larger by 4,000 or 5,000 square miles than South or North Dakota would be. So, if you are to enter upon the policy of not admitting States that have an area of more than 77,000 square miles, as in the case of South Dakota, you must carry out that policy with reference to Montana, which is Democratic, and which should be divided into two States, and with reference to Arizona and New Mexico, which are Democratic, and which would make three States, and also with reference to Utah and Idaho, which would make three States.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. I want to ask you one. [Laughter.] I want to ask you whether you propose to carry out that policy and to apply your rule of division to Democratic as well as to Republican Territories.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. We never jump a stile until we get to it. Now, let me ask my friend a question. If this vote had gone just as it did and South Dakota had been reliably Democratic, so as to send two Democratic Senators to the Senate of the United States, would you have opposed its admission? Look up now and answer. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I would. [Great laughter.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. He does not even blush! [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. I knew that he would be equal to the occasion. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Now, I will put a question to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] and to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], who can answer almost any conundrum that may be propounded. If both North and South Dakota had Democratic majorities, would you be in favor of the division of the Territory?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Yes, sir, I would [laughter]; and I have so asserted heretofore; but the fact is my way and not yours.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then will you be in favor of dividing Montana?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Whenever a like condition of things is presented I will be consistent.

Mr. SPRINGER. Ah! But you can make the conditions by legislation.

Mr. BUCHANAN. No, you can not. You must have the population.

Mr. BAKER. Have we not agreed unanimously in the Committee on Territories in favor of bills for the admission of Montana and Washington at their express request?

Mr. STRUBLE. And have there been any requests from them for a division?

Mr. SYMES. And are they not represented on this floor by Democratic delegates?

Mr. SPRINGER. But I am speaking of the future and of our future policy. Gentlemen seem to think that this is a matter which rests entirely with the Territories. I deny it.

Mr. REED. You assert it when it comes to dividing them, but deny it when it comes to uniting them. Why do you not stick to one theory or the other?

Mr. SPRINGER. I have never said——

Mr. STRUBLE. Should not Congress consult the wishes of the people of the Territory?

Mr. SPRINGER. That depends upon whether the wishes of the people of the Territory are in accordance with sound public policy or not.

Mr. STRUBLE. Oh, it does!

Mr. SPRINGER. It does, very much indeed. I will ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE] this question: If the people of Florida desired to have that State divided into two States, would you consent to that? Answer me that question! Look me in the face! Do not blush! [Laughter.]

Mr. STRUBLE. I will do so, and I will keep on looking right at you. [Laughter.] I say, first, that Florida is a State now, and therefore there is no parallel. I say, next, that whenever any large Territory like Dakota wishes to be divided, and it appears to be for the interest of the country and the interest of her people that she should be, I will be in favor of it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Oh, yes; I put in the same "if" in my answer; whenever it is for the good of the country I am for it also. But the gentleman knows very well that if it were Florida, a sovereign State of the Union, that desired to be divided into two parts, he would oppose it; and why? Because, he would say, that would give the present State of Florida four United States Senators.

Mr. STRUBLE. There is no parallel between the two cases.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The trouble with my friend is that when he is asked——

Mr. SYMES. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me for an inquiry?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. SYMES. I understand the gentleman from Illinois claims to be an humble follower of that great oracle of the Democracy, Stephen A. Douglas, and I believe the gentleman was in favor of the "squatter-sovereignty" doctrine of that eminent Democrat. Oh, shade of Douglas! what becomes of your influence when your followers get up here and deny to the people of a great Territory the right to have a voice on a question like this?

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to have time to answer some of these questions.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I wish to ask whether we can have unanimous consent now to vote on the South Dakota bill?

Mr. SPRINGER. I would be very glad to accommodate the gentleman; and I would also like an opportunity to answer some of these questions.

Mr. Chairman, the truth is that the Republicans are opposed to the admission of Dakota into the Union, notwithstanding she has a population of over 500,000, and would make a grand State if admitted, as the people of the Territory desire she should be, as one State.

Several MEMBERS. That is not what she desires.

Mr. SPRINGER. But gentlemen representing the Republican party insist upon outraging the feelings of the people of North Dakota, insist on violating their express wishes, and propose to regard only the wishes of the people of South Dakota.

Now, I have been advised—I want to give you, my friends, a little bit of private information which has come to me—I have been advised by gentlemen living in the northern part of Dakota that if we will in the first place admit into the Union as a State South Dakota, and afterward North Dakota, North Dakota will be Democratic, and thus there will be an offset for the Republicanism of South Dakota.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Why do you not do it then?

Mr. SPRINGER. To all such seductive suggestions I have turned a deaf ear. [Derisive laughter on the Republican side.] I am not here playing upon the chess-board of politics for the sake of making a Democratic State or a Republican State. My friends here on the Republican side can see nothing in this question but a Republican State of South Dakota and a Republican State of North Dakota, with two United States Senators from each. That is as far as their political horizon extends; there is where they rest all their hopes in this matter. But were the people of Dakota allowed to express their wishes there would be a majority ranging up into the tens of thousands in favor of their coming into the Union as one State. I believe it is the interest of the people of Dakota to come in as one State.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. They do not think so.

Mr. SPRINGER. A majority of the people of that Territory do think so; yet gentlemen here on the other side resist, for partisan purposes, all importunities on the part of the people of Dakota to come here as one State.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. We are ready for a vote on that question; let us vote on admitting Dakota as one State.

Mr. SPRINGER. For the sake of getting four Senators where there should be only two, gentlemen would outrage the voice of that people and keep them out of the Union.

Now, gentlemen say that Dakota should be admitted into the Union because of her population. According to the last census, according to the best estimate, the population of Dakota is over 500,000; say it is 600,000. If gentlemen will look at the census of 1880 they will find the average population of the States of this Union is 1,300,000. And there are thirty States in the Union——

Mr. BAKER, of New York. What was the population when those States were admitted into the Union.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am talking of to-day. The gentleman asks me to go back to the past; I wish to get him up to the present. [Laughter and applause.] I say, Mr. Chairman, there are thirty States in this Union to-day which have an average of over a million of population. The gentleman is trying to bring a Territory into this Union as a State with an aggregate population of only about one-third of the average population of the existing States.

Mr. REED. What was the population of those States when admitted?

Mr. SPRINGER. The population of some of the States was very small when they were admitted into the Union. Gentlemen on the other side of the House have never got beyond the time when Illinois was admitted into the Union with 34,000 population and Dakota was organized with six or seven thousand people. [Laughter and applause.] In the mean while they do not seem to realize that this is a great and growing country; that we had then but few States, while we now have thirty-eight States with a population of 60,000,000, and growing at the rate of 1,000,000 every year. [Great applause.] I look more to the future of our country than to mere partisan views. [Applause and laughter.] I look upon our Territories as future States, as great States when admitted into the Union; and no little rotten boroughs like Nevada with only 62,000 inhabitants, should ever be admitted as States into the Union.

A MEMBER. Full fledged.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes; as my friend says, full fledged. [Laughter and applause.] I have great hopes of the future of this Union. I am in favor of the admission of every Territory into the Union as a State whenever it shall have the requisite population. I will do everything in my power in that direction. I expect to devote the remainder of my political life as a Representative in this House to aiding these Territories in getting into the Union as sovereign States. Dakota will come into the Union at the proper time and in the proper way; and I tell you gentlemen on the other side that you will then be in favor of it.

A MEMBER. And Utah, too.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, at the proper time and in good shape.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have but a few words to add to what I have already said. Gentlemen do not seem to realize the fact that what are called the waste places of the West, the arid plains, are now being rapidly settled by farming communities. I make the assertion that every acre of arid land from the base of the Rocky Mountains to the one hundredth parallel of latitude will be reclaimed and devoted to agriculture, and that it will produce the necessaries which go to the support of mankind with less of human effort than were required to subdue the forests of Ohio and Pennsylvania. [Applause.] It will not be many years—twenty-five years from this time—until you will find there will be a dense agricultural population clear across the plains to the foot of the Rocky Mountains, on the plains of New Mexico and Arizona and Southern California. You will find all these places, once supposed to be desert and worthless, reclaimed and occupied by a population of hundreds of thousands of industrious, rich, and happy people. [Applause.]

The future of this country, Mr. Chairman, can hardly be imagined. It is to-day only in its infancy. The great possibilities of these Territories do not seem to be realized by gentlemen on the other side. At the proper time I wish to see them come into the Union as great States to take their part with the other States of the Union in legislating for the whole people in Congress, and to take their part in the election of President of the United States. I want them to assume and exercise all the powers, responsibilities, and perform all the duties of the original States, and upon an equality with them. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I have but a word to say in the time remaining to me. I do not think our Democratic brethren treat my friend from Illinois fairly. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Oh, yes, they do; I am not complaining.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. When there is a duty to perform about which they hesitate, they are very apt to devolve it upon my honorable friend. [Renewed laughter.] Now I want to defend him.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not need it.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I asked him if the question of the division of Dakota had been by the resolution of the two political parties submitted to a direct vote of the people of that Territory, and a clear majority of 5,000 had voted for the division, and South Dakota had been reliably Democratic, and my friend knew that on her admission into the Union as a State two Democratic Senators would be elected to the United States Senate, thus securing for the Democratic party the control of that body, would he vote to exclude her? And, further, I asked him if he could say yes to that question without blushing.

Now, Mr. Chairman, he did say "yes," and I want to say in his defense that he did blush. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Oh, no; not any more than you did when you said the other thing.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I had no occasion to blush.

I want to say, touching the statements made by him in reference to Dakota, the question of division and whether she, South Dakota, should be admitted to the Union, was submitted to the people by Democratic approval as well as Republican desire; and by what may be regarded as an overwhelming majority the people voted to divide the Territory; and when they knocked at this door for admission to the sisterhood of States the question is, not, "have you the requisite qualifications and elements of a State?" but the question by my friend upon the other side is "what will be the political complexion of the Senators and Representatives you will send to the National Congress?"

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman does himself a gross injustice when he asserts that he would oppose the admission of South Dakota, situated as she is and approved as she is upon the vote taken, if she asked admission here, being at the same time reliably Democratic. I know he would not, though he may have a present impression that he would.

Mr. SPRINGER. I know I would.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. You would?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Well, if that is so, you are greatly misunderstood on both sides of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. That frequently happens. I am not unaccustomed to being misunderstood.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. There would be, in the first place, no possible excuse for my friend to do so. There would not stand in your way any reason for opposing it; and least of all any political reason. I do not say such conditions would not influence my action in some measure, and I feel satisfied they would influence the course of the honorable gentleman. The gentleman hopes the time will come when we can rise above such considerations.

The gentleman says politics has nothing to do with it, and yet every Federal official in Dakota worked assiduously from the rising of the sun to the going down thereof on the day of the election to secure votes against the division of the Territory and against Southern Dakota applying for admission into the Union.

There, Mr. Chairman, is a great State on the threshold of the Union, a Territory with larger population than Illinois and all the States formed out of the Northwest Territory had at the time they were severally admitted into the Union, waiting to come in, and having as good and high claims to admission as had either of the States mentioned. The question is purely a political one.

I agree in the shuffling of the political cards that you hold the advantage and we can not help ourselves. You are so situated that you can spurn Dakota. I do not know how long that condition will maintain.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Until next November. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman permit me a moment?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Has not the admission of all the new States for years past been recognized by consent of all parties as a political question?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Undoubtedly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And is not this the first time that any statesman has ever risen above party considerations in such a matter? [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. It is probably the first time that any gentleman has asserted that he was able absolutely to rise above it. No gentleman does rise above it. We all may vary a little from the direct line, prompted by political association. But my friend does himself great injustice in asserting that no trade of politics controls him in his actions.

Mr. GUENTHER. But everybody laughed when he said that.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Undoubtedly, everybody laughed.

My Democratic friends hold the coign of vantage against us, since they can keep the young State out of the Union and we are powerless to prevent them from so doing. But when they assert there is a presumption that thirty or twenty or ten thousand voters who staid away from the polls would have opposed the division of the Territory or the admission of South Dakota as a State they place themselves in an awkward position as contrasted with their attitude in regard to elections in the South.

When my friend from Mississippi said they had occasionally to fire a cannon in some districts to announce to the colored voters that election day was approaching, there lurked somewhere in our make-up a suspicion that there was something wrong in such districts when the vote returned was so small. But honorable gentlemen stood up and said, "You are mistaken. If those people had been opposed to the election of any one of us they would have been at the polls to cast their ballots against us. They remained away because they were satisfied."

Here all the people of Dakota, speaking through their conventions, said: "Submit this to a vote of the people who are to be affected." The question was submitted and an overwhelming majority voted for the admission. We have presented a bill to carry out the wishes of those people; but unfortunately they do not wear the badge of modern Democracy. Gentlemen, your politics may keep Dakota out of the Union. Your deliberate, patriotic judgment never will be that your action is just on other grounds.

I want to say one thing touching this bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations. It has been prepared with a desire to meet the public interest fairly. The only point at which our friends on the other side have stumbled is when they have been placed face to face with the proposition to uphold the ladder on which they climbed into power. Having climbed up, they desire to remain. Realizing that a man may be compelled to climb down the same ladder on which he climbed up, they very deliberately kick the ladder from under them and say, "Here we are to stay."

The bill has been carefully and honestly prepared with a desire to meet the wants of the Government economically administered. The only deflection from that right line is in the case I have adverted to. The cause of that deflection is palpably observable. There they are in the same position of my friend from Illinois when he stands face to face with Southern Dakota claiming admission to the Union, but not wearing the badge of modern Democracy.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield me five minutes more?

Mr. FORNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPRINGER. My friend from Ohio seems to think that his side of the House alone is actuated by non-partisan and patriotic motives in this matter, and that on this side of the House we are simply seeking for an advantage in a political sense; and that if the new States were to be Democratic we would be willing to admit the Territory as two States.

The contrary is true. Suppose—and in this supposition I am not indulging in the improbable—suppose that the next Congress shall be returned with a large majority of Democrats in this body and in the Senate of the United States, and that Mr. Cleveland shall be re-elected—a matter easy to suppose because it is sure to happen. What in that case might happen under the policy these gentlemen have advocated? It might occur to mere partisans on this side of the House that such a condition furnished us an opportunity to perpetuate our political ascendency indefinitely in this country. How could it be done? By carving out of the Territories fifteen or twenty new States, any one of which would be as large as Pennsylvania and three times as large as Massachusetts.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Can not that be done to-day as in the case of Texas, which under the compact is entitled to be divided into four States?

Mr. SPRINGER. I know that with the consent of Texas four other States may be carved out of that State. It is simply a matter of legislative discretion. Texas is now, I understand, opposed to any division of her territory. But if there should be a change of sentiment in Texas, and it should be announced some day that Texas had decided to demand such a division, the gentleman over there would be stricken with terror, more appalling than if threatened with a cyclone.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Rather a blizzard.

Mr. SPRINGER. It would have the same effect upon them. But suppose we should conceive the idea when in power in both branches of Congress and with a Democratic President that the time had come when we should perpetuate the ascendency of our party by bringing fifteen or twenty more States into the Union and thus adding thirty or forty new Senators to the body at the other end of the Capitol, would you not think that a little partisan? Yet it would be justified by the course the gentlemen on the other side are now pursuing.

I say to you, I say to your friends in Dakota and all over the country, that the safety of the Republican party in the future lies in preserving the existing political divisions. If you ever break down the barriers and insist upon bringing a dozen or twenty new States into the Union, you will—

> But teach
> Bloody instructions, which, being taught, return
> To plague the inventor—

As did the division of old Virginia into Virginia and West Virginia.

It is your party which will have to bear the consequences of that political blunder. For my own part, I am opposed to such divisions now and hereafter, and you may yet come and implore my assistance to aid in preventing such policies governing in the future. I offer my services now, and I will aid you then as I am doing now. I want to maintain the existing divisions in the Territories and in the States to maintain the autonomy of all, believing that their boundaries are wisely made, and that if allowed to remain as they are they will serve the best interests of the whole people in the future and for all time to come. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TOOLE. Mr. Chairman, I expect to be unavoidably absent from the House for some time and avail myself of this opportunity to submit some observations respecting the mineral lands of the United States, and which are only applicable to the bill under consideration in so far as they may show the propriety of increasing the salaries of the land officers, who are proposed to be charged with new duties and new responsibilities by the following amendment which I have proposed to the public-land bill:

That in order to determine what lands may lawfully be selected, certified, or patented under grants made by Congress to each and every of the several land-grant railroads of the United States, and to which patent has not heretofore issued, such railroad company or corporation shall, by its agent thereto authorized in writing, file with the register and receiver of the land office in which such land is situated an affidavit that the land claimed or selected and each legal subdivision thereof is non-mineral in character as contemplated by the grant, and that the affiant has made a personal inspection of said land; and thereupon the register and receiver of the land office in which said land is situated shall cause to be published in a newspaper of general circulation, published nearest the land so claimed or selected, for four successive weeks, a notice that such affidavit has been filed, and at any time within thirty days thereafter any citizen of the State or Territory within which said land is situated may deny the allegation of non-mineral in said affidavit upon oath; and thereupon the same proceedings shall be had and obtain as in other contested cases, including the right of appeal by either party, but the burden of proving the non-mineral character of the land shall be upon the railroad company; and in all such contests it shall be sufficient to reject the claim or selection of any railroad company if it appears from the proof that the land contains lodes of mineral-bearing matter, which does not pass by the grant, whether it has been worked or not, or whether it will pay or not to work at the time of the contest. As between the railroad company and the Government any and all land that bears mineral which does not pass by the grant, or gold in placer form in such appreciable quantities as to render it in any sense valuable so as to be likely to be sought out for its mineral qualities, shall be considered within the exception made by Congress, and shall be considered mineral lands.

There is a wide-spread, well-founded, and impending danger of the mineral lands of the United States falling into the hands of the several land-grant railroads of this country, and in my opinion the only certain and speedy remedy against that which rises to the dignity of a national calamity is embodied in the foregoing amendment and rests only with Congress. Without stopping to inquire into or question the propriety of granting subsidies in one form or another to aid in the construction of railroads, it will be conceded that whenever public lands have been granted for such purposes the settled, fixed, and determined policy of this Government as expressed in every grant and all of its legislation has been to reserve the mineral lands.

It was designed that such should be open to development and exploration by the citizens of this country, and to that end the most liberal laws have been enacted by Congress. To secure this, Congress has provided for the acquisition of two kinds of title, one by purchase and patent, the other a possessory title which can be kept alive and perfect by the occupant doing the necessary representation work annually upon his claim, thus giving to the man with money and the prospector without money the same opportunity to avail themselves of the beneficent provisions of the law. In the Western States and Territories thousands of individuals have sought to avail themselves of this law and have until lately felt secure in their possessory titles, but are suddenly aroused to a realization of the fact that they are about to be despoiled of their properties by the rapacity and greed of these land-grant railroads. Of course it requires the most flagrant violations of law and in some instances the most unscrupulous resort to perjury to accomplish this outrage, but it has been and is being done constantly. I am led to make these observations from facts that are notoriously known to exist in Montana, Idaho, Arizona, and California.

Lately the people of Montana, the greatest mineral producer of any of the States and Territories, seeing the notorious and flagrant frauds which were then being practiced upon the United States and upon bona fide mining claimants by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company in the matter of railroad selections, in procuring the certification to it, as agricultural, lands which are mineral in character, comprising well-known and valuable mines, became alarmed at such audacity, and in a convention held for the purpose of devising ways and means to bring the matter to the attention of Congress, adopted the following preamble and resolutions:

Whereas in the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, on the Pacific coast, by the northern route," section 3 reads as follows:

"SEC. 3. And it is further enacted that there be, and hereby is, granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, its successors and assigns, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of said railroad and telegraph line to the Pacific coast, and to secure the safe and speedy transportation of mails, troops, munitions of war, and public stores, over the route of said line of railway, every alternate section of public land, not mineral, designated by odd numbers, to the number of twenty alternate sections per mile, on each side of said railroad line, as said company may adopt, through the Territories of the United States, and ten alternate sections per mile on each side of said railroad whenever it passes through any State, and whenever on the line thereof the United States have full title, not reserved, sold, granted, or otherwise appropriated, and free from pre-emption, or other claims or rights, at the time the line of said railroad is definitely fixed and a plat thereof filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office; and whenever, prior to said time, any of the said sections, or parts of sections, shall have been granted, sold, reserved, occupied by homestead settlers, or pre-emption, or otherwise disposed of, other lands shall be selected by said company in lieu thereof, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, in alternate sections, and designated by odd numbers, not more than 10 miles beyond the limits of said alternate sections: Provided, That if said route shall be found upon the line of any other railroad route, to aid in the construction of which lands have been heretofore granted by the United States, as far as the routes are upon the same general line, the amount of land heretofore granted shall be deducted from the amount granted by this act: Provided further, That the railroad company receiving the previous grant of land may assign their interest to said Northern Pacific Railroad Company, or may consolidate, confederate, and associate with said company upon the terms named in the first section of this act: Provided further, That all mineral lands be, and the same are hereby, excluded from the operations of this act, and in lieu thereof a like quantity of unoccupied and unappropriated agricultural lands, in odd-numbered sections, nearest to the line of said road, may be selected as above provided: And provided further, That the word 'mineral,' when it occurs in this act, shall not be held to include iron or coal: And provided further, That no money shall be drawn from the Treasury of the United States to aid in the construction of the said Northern Pacific Railroad;" and

Whereas the Territory of Montana, in so far as the same is included within the limits of said grant, is composed almost exclusively of mineral lands, which have been, and are now being, explored, located, and improved under the mining laws of the United States; and

Whereas the said railroad company has heretofore made, and is still continuing to make, selections of lands within this Territory under said section 3, and are in such selections including large tracts of land which are notoriously mineral, and in many cases were actually being worked as mining claims at the time of such selection; and

Whereas the said railroad company has been enabled to make such selections and procure certificates from the local land offices in the respective land districts by virtue of reports made on the character of the lands selected by incompetent or misdirected individuals, who have, in the presence of open and notorious facts to the contrary, apparent on the ground, certified mining claims, being actually worked at the time, to local land offices as non-mineral lands; and

Whereas under instructions from a former Secretary of the Interior or Commissioner of the General Land Office surveys of public lands have been made in the Territory of Montana without any reference to their character as being mineral or non-mineral lands, and that under such instructions a large portion of the mineral lands of this Territory have been returned either as mountainous timber land, without any reference whatever to their mineral character, or in some other classification which does not in any manner, directly or indirectly refer to the mineral character of the land; and

Whereas it is a manifest fact that but a small fraction of the mineral claims located and worked under the laws of the United States have been surveyed, except as included in general township surveys, and that no survey of mineral lands, as such, occurs until an application for a patent is made by the owner or locator of a mining claim; and

Whereas a report submitted to the surveyor-general in pursuance of instructions would present and have presented fragmentary, false, and unreliable information as to the character of the lands reported upon; and

Whereas under these reports the local land office has been deceived, imposed upon, and misled as to the character of the lands designated and selected by said Northern Pacific Railroad Company; and

Whereas it has come to our knowledge that the agents and servants of the said Northern Pacific Railroad Company, authorized and directed to examine the land prior to the designation and selection by the company, have reported to said company land as non-mineral land, when, in truth and in fact, both placer and quartz mining have been, in many instances, in active progress on the land reported upon at the time of the examination; and

Whereas under the laws of the United States homestead and pre-emption and all other claimants seeking titles to lands under the general laws of the United States relating to non-mineral lands within the Territory of Montana are required, under pains and penalties of perjury, at the time of making application, to make an affidavit and submit proofs to the register and receiver of the local land office, setting forth clearly the non-mineral character of the land for which an agricultural patent is sought; and

Whereas we are informed and believe that the said Northern Pacific Railroad Company is not now, nor has it ever been, required to make any showing whatever as to the non-mineral character of the land which it designates and selects, further than the gratuitous oath by the land commissioner of said railroad company to the effect that the land designated and selected is the character of land contemplated by section 3 of the aforesaid act of Congress, to which said railroad company is entitled; and

Whereas it is a well-known fact that said land commissioner has made such statements, under oath, to the register and receiver of the Helena land office, with reference to vast quantities of land which were, at the time of making and swearing to such statement, openly, notoriously, and universally known throughout the Territory of Montana to be mineral lands, and upon which said land mining claims had been located, and were, at the time of such statement by said land commissioner, being actually worked with profit as mining claims; and

Whereas in our opinion it is not only the interest of the people of the Territory of Montana but the inherent right of all the citizens of the United States to have the mineral lands of the public domain left free from clouds of private ownership for full, free, and unlimited exploration by any and all citizens under the laws of the United States relating to mineral lands; and

Whereas in our opinion the laws of the United States, and the rules and regulations prescribed by the Department of the Interior, governing the selection of land by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, are palpably defective, and that the preservation of the mineral lands of the public domain within the land grant of the said railroad company requires immediate action on the part of Congress and the Interior Department in the enactment of such laws, rules, and regulations as will distinctly define mineral lands, as referred to in section 3 of said act aforesaid, and prescribe such forms for said railroad company to comply with, in the designation and selection of their lands, as may prevent the acquisition of title by said company to mineral lands in the public domain; and

Whereas we are informed by the Interior Department that patents may be issued to the lands already selected and designated by said railroad company before any action can be taken by Congress in the premises, unless proofs are presented and filed with the Secretary of the Interior setting forth the mineral character of the lands heretofore selected and designated by said railroad company; and

Whereas under and by virtue of the certificate of the local land office the said Northern Pacific Railroad Company claims title to said lands without the formality of proof or the necessity of procuring a patent, and has heretofore paid taxes upon the lands selected, and otherwise asserted rights of ownership, thus at least creating a cloud upon the title to all the mineral lands included within their grant, which have been selected and designated by them, and upon the other hand they have made no effort whatever to perfect their title to those lands within the Territory of Montana which are well known to be agricultural in their character.

THE RESOLUTIONS.

Now, therefore, we, the citizens of Montana Territory, in convention assembled, do hereby resolve that we view with alarm and regard as an impending public calamity the threatened acquisition of title by the said Northern Pacific Railroad Company of the mineral lands of the United States included within the limits of the grant made to said railroad company; and

Be it further resolved, That a central committee, consisting of five persons, to be known as the "citizens' executive committee," be, by the president of this convention, appointed, with full power and authority from this convention to appoint such subcommittees in the various counties and mining districts of the Territory as they may deem necessary; that such central committee be further empowered to employ such professional or other skilled assistance as they may deem necessary to execute fully and effectively the powers hereby delegated; and that such committee be further empowered, and it is hereby directed, to prepare and forward to the Department of the Interior, with the least possible delay, in such form as they may deem most efficient, setting forth the mineral character of the lands heretofore designated and selected by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company in the Territory of Montana, and likewise of all other lands included within the land grant to said railroad company, with a protest, in such form as to them may seem most efficient, against the issuance of patent or the delivery of other evidence of title to said Northern Pacific Railroad Company to any and all mineral lands in said Territory; and

Further, The said "citizens' executive committee" is directed and empowered to present to the President of the United States, to our Delegate in Congress, the Secretary of the Interior, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the chairmen of the respective committees on Territories in the Senate and House of Representatives, a memorial embodying these resolutions, together with a statement of such facts as they may deem relevant and material, and a draught of such law as in their opinion would prove most effective in the premises, if passed by Congress, concluding with a prayer for such legislative and executive action as in the opinion of the Government would most effectively conduce to a fair and just allotment to the said Northern Pacific Railroad Company of lands to which they are entitled within the terms of the grant aforesaid, while at the same time preserving to the citizens of the United States all the mineral lands within the Territory of Montana; and

Be it further resolved, That the president of this convention appoint, and he is hereby authorized and directed to appoint, a committee of three persons, to be designated and known as the "finance committee," which said finance committee shall have power, and it is hereby authorized, to appoint subcommittees in the various counties and mining districts of the Territory, and to make such collections of money, directly or through such subcommittees, from time to time as may be necessary to carry out and execute the purposes of this convention; and said finance committee is hereby directed to keep accurate books of account, showing the sum of money collected from time to time and from what source, and to disburse the same upon the order of the chairman of the executive committee, taking his receipt for such money so paid, which said receipt shall state the purpose for which the money has been or is to be expended; and the said finance committee is further directed to deliver to the president of this convention a report of all moneys received and disbursed by said committee, which said report shall be filed at least once in each month, or whenever called for by the president of the convention; and

Be it further resolved, That the chairman of said executive committee be, and he is hereby, directed to report on the first day of each and every month to the chairman of the finance committee all moneys received and disbursed by him, and to file, when practicable, vouchers for such expenditures, which said vouchers so filed with the chairman of the finance committee shall be by him transmitted, with his report, to the president of the convention; and

Be it further resolved, That the president of this convention be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to fill any vacancy which may at any time occur by death, resignation, or otherwise, either in the executive or finance committee, and to call at any time he may think proper on the chairman of either of the committees for a report as to any matter coming within the purview of their respective duties; and

Be it further resolved, That when this convention adjourns it shall adjourn subject to the call of its president.

No question has agitated the people of Montana more since its organization as a Territory than this bold attempt to secure a monopoly of the unpatented mineral lands. It is not a question of mere local importance; it rises to the character and dignity of national consideration. It affects directly the production of our precious metals. Aside from being a fraud upon the Government, the possession by the railroad company withdraws these lands from development and exploration by the citizen and holds them for speculative purposes. Hundreds of affidavits have lately been filed in the Interior Department by trustworthy citizens of Montana, men of the highest character, showing the shameful operations of this company respecting the mineral lands of Montana. I submit the following as fair samples of hundreds of affidavits showing that mineral lands have been certified to that company as agricultural lands:

TERRITORY OF MONTANA, County of Deer Lodge, ss:

I. N. Fox, James B. McMasten, E. P. Mills, James Cunn, William Hufreich, H. B. Ross, R. S. Kelley, William M. Thompson, David C. Irvine, H. B. Davis, Addison Smith, John Bulenberg, and R. T. Harris, being severally duly sworn, each for himself says: That he is a citizen of the United States and a resident of the town of Deer Lodge in the above-named county and Territory; that he is acquainted with the lands in townships Nos. 5 and 6 north of range No. 8 west, Montana meridian; that to his certain knowledge there were about one hundred mines and mining locations now situated in said townships; that said mines and locations are scattered through sections 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9 in township 5 north, range 8 west, and sections 19, 20, 21, 22, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, and 34 in township 6 north, range 8 west in said township.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 25th day of February, 1888.

LUCIEN W. WOOLFOLK,
Notary Public.

Accompanying a large number of these affidavits was the following letter from Hon. R. S. Kelley, United States marshal for Montana:

DEER LODGE, MONT., March 13, 1888.

DEAR SIR: At the suggestion of prominent citizens of Deer Lodge County who believe you to be the proper person to present to the Interior Department the proofs of the mineral character of the lands in this county which have been certified to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company as agricultural and timber lands, I take the liberty of sending you such proofs relating to the mountainous district between Deer Lodge and Butte City, known as the Cariboo, Cottonwood, and Orofino districts, and ask that such action be taken by you as may seem best to prevent this very rich and extensive mineral land from falling into the hands of the railroad corporation, who are making extraordinary efforts to secure it, in violation of the spirit of their land grant.

The tracing of a map, prepared by Henry Davis, esq., United States mineral surveyor, herewith inclosed, made from actual surveys completed within the month of February last, does not show all the mineral locations in these districts, as it is impossible, on account of the high altitude and the great depth of snow, to take them all in. Enough, however, has been given to show the positive mineral character of all the mountainous country between this place and Butte City.

In this connection it might be proper to state that some of the richest quartz deposits in Deer Lodge County are in this district, and very many of the mines have been worked continuously for the past two years, and are deemed of great value for their mineral deposits.

The affidavits herewith inclosed you will recognize as being made by our most worthy citizens, who are perfectly familiar with the country embraced in the above-named districts, and who are now engaged in mining and developing the same. Montana is nothing without her mines; with them, and an unclouded title, she is the richest Territory in the world. It is our duty to the present generation and to our posterity to save this vast mineral region from falling into the hands of a soulless corporation. It would be criminal on the part of Congress, after such facts are presented, to fail to pass a law which will prevent the acquisition of the mineral lands of Montana by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. Please acknowledge receipt of inclosed papers, and make such suggestions in the premises as you may deem fit.

Very respectfully yours,

R. S. KELLEY.

Hon. J. K. TOOLE, Washington, D. C.

The following is one of the number of affidavits recently received by T. G. Merrill about the Montana mineral lands. It bears the signature of A. W. Tanner and was subscribed and sworn to before Charles H. C. Coble:

Albert W. Tanner, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he is a resident at Red Bluff, Madison County, Territory of Montana; that he owns and possesses in township 3 south, range 1 east, a two-story stone house 32 by 44 feet, on the ground which is my residence at this time. This house was built in the year 1867. Two hundred and fifty feet east of my house is a lode claim owned by R. H. Foster, who has a tunnel 170 feet to a shaft where he is taking out ore at this date. West of my house 340 feet is the tunnel and lode claim of J. L. Miniss, which has been located for several years, and a large amount of ore has been and is being taken out at this present time. L. B. Olds and C. H. Peck located a quartz vein about 120 feet west of my house and located my house inside of their lines, and notified me through their attorney, H. N. Blake, not to occupy, possess, or make any improvements on the same.

I gave L. B. Olds $135 and C. H. Peck $132.50 as a compromise to save trouble and acquire their rights. (My house was built in 1868, many years before Olds & Peck's location was made.) Now, said H. N. Blake, who is attorney for the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, says he has bought this same section 7, township 3 south, range 1 east, and claims it as agricultural ground, and asks of me to pay him $300 for a quit-claim deed to the ground my house is on. There are to my certain knowledge seven mineral locations (and the town of Red Bluff) on this same section 7, which are claimed valuable; that township 3 south, range 1 east, township 3 south, range 2 east, township 4 south, range 1 east, township 4 south, range 2 east, embracing 92,160 acres, and that in said four townships there is not to exceed 2,000 acres of agricultural ground, leaving 90,000 acres rolling, mountainous mineral lands, and are so considered. I also own and possess in township 3 south, range 2 east, surveyed placer mineral lands in sections 18, 17, 20, 22, 29, 28, 33, and 34. There are several other mineral locations in said townships, and it is in main mineral lands.

The following is from the Helena Independent:

MINERAL LANDS—ANOTHER LETTER SHOWING HOW THE RAILWAY HAS TAKEN STEPS TO GET THE PROPERTY OF THE HONEST TOILER.

T. C. Merrill has just received the following among other letters and proofs regarding the mineral lands from J. J. Lown, of Red Bluff, Mont.:

I wish to give you a brief history of section 7, township 3 south, range 1 east, in which the town of Red Bluff is situated. There are locations made of two quartz mines on three sides of this town, north, east and west. Miners are at work on these mines now, improving and developing the same, and have been for years. On the mines located in this section where the town of Red Bluff is, there has been thousands of dollars expended in their development, and at the present time R. H. Foster, James Muncies, Gannis & Co., and many more are at work on these quartz mines and have been for years. Some of these mines are located in town and the hills back of town are nearly covered with locations. Many of these mines look very flattering and the owners are delighted and pleased with the prospect already obtained and value them very much.

Of all these mines located and situated in section 7, not one is patented or surveyed, and this very section Judge Henry N. Blake has bought and holds a deed from the Northern Pacific Railroad and the same is recorded in the Madison County recorder's office. The Northern Pacific had an expert here some two or three years ago, and he could not help seeing the location and development of the mines in this section. He could not help seeing the miners daily toiling and working, thinking all the time they were developing their own mines and property. But without the least warning their mines are sold beneath their very feet. They find they have no mines nor no homes after many years of toil and hardship that no one but a miner and prospector knows before their mines are developed enough to place a value on them. All these hardships must be endured and the bravest and most courageous of our citizens go forth and prospect in these rough and ragged mountains across the steep and rocky cañons. The hardships and privations they endure are a strain on the strongest constitutions.

After many hard struggles he is rewarded by a rich find, and sets himself at work to develop his discovery, and before he has time (being a poor man) to do the necessary $500 worth of work, and nearly as much more to pay the other expenses for a patent, the Northern Pacific Railroad Company takes his mine from him. Now all this has been done by the prospector and the Northern Pacific Railroad Company in this very section.

Judge Blake told me himself that he was looking after the interest of the Northern Pacific in this county. He furthermore told me he would "show them who owns the ground where the town is when I get ready." These were his words to me.

We the undersigned residents of Red Bluff, do sanction Mr. J. J. Lown's letter: Thomas J. McKee, Amber J. Arnold, A. W. Tanner, R. H. Foster, J. M. Bellise, G. W. Pope, Charles Holdman, H. U. Foster, E. B. Jackson, William Reese, John F. Haskins, Henry Henselbecker, Aaron Flynn, Henry Matheson, Jacob H. May, George F. Badgett, Daniel O'Shea, John M. Bayliss, W. P. Grannis, William R. Reed, John C. Kelleher, O. Laswell.

The lands described in the foregoing affidavits are lands which have been certified to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company as agricultural, and for which they are now asking patents from the United States. Is it surprising, then, that the people under whose eyes these outrages are being perpetrated should feel the greatest concern about this matter? Every day new proofs and affidavits, showing the extent to which these frauds are being perpetrated, are being filed in the Interior Department, and every day brings petitions from the people asking Congress for relief. The latest is as follows:

To his Excellency the President of the United States and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress assembled:

Your petitioners most respectfully submit that they are all citizens of the United States, or have declared their intention to become such, and are all residents of the Territory of Montana.

That they are all interested in the protection and development of the mineral resources of said Territory.

That the Northern Pacific Railroad Company claim nearly all the odd-numbered sections of the surveyed portion of the mineral lands of said Territory bearing gold, silver, lead, or copper, and has already caused the same to be certified to itself for patent by the United States land officers in said Territory.

That said certification has been based upon certain plats made by the deputy United States surveyors, and now on file in the respective United States land offices in said Territory, showing these lands so certified to be non-mineral in their character; which said plats are erroneous, in that they designate large quantities of mineral land as agricultural, mountainous, and mountainous timber lands.

That under the present acts of Congress and the various decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States construing such acts, there is little, if any, hope of correcting the existing errors and of preventing said railroad company from acquiring title to these lands.

That only within a few years has quartz mining proved to be a paying industry in Montana, and therefore the lands bearing the precious metals are to a large extent undeveloped.

That millions of dollars are now invested and being invested in the development of such resources, the benefit of which will inure to the said railroad company, if it is permitted to acquire title to the lands already certified to and to which it is not entitled.

That unless relief is granted, said railroad company will soon acquire the absolute title to nearly one-half of the mineral land of this Territory.

That the acquirement of title to these lands by the said railroad company would not only work irreparable injury to the industries of the Territory of Montana, and materially retard its progress, but would deprive all citizens of the United States of the right given them by the statutes to locate and appropriate our mineral lands, and would create one of the most colossal monopolies that has ever existed.

Now, therefore, we most respectfully and earnestly pray that such legislation be had as will preserve the mineral lands of the Territory of Montana, bearing the precious metals, to the citizens of the United States, and prevent the Northern Pacific Railroad Company from acquiring any lands to which it is not clearly entitled under its grant.

Information is abundant and from other sources quite as reliable to show that the most stringent legislation is demanded to preserve our mineral as a heritage to the people. It is true that the Interior Department is using every effort possible to protect the Government and the citizen against fraud and imposition under a provision of law authorizing the Commissioner of the Land Office, with the advice of the Secretary of the Interior, to make regulations to carry out the general laws, but it is doubted whether ample authority exists. In order to show you to what extent these frauds have obtained in other localities, and the great perplexities and difficulties that have arisen out of a proper solution of the question, I submit the following letters from the honorable Commissioner of the Land Office:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, April 22, 1886.

SIR: I inclose a draft of a proposed circular designed to extend the operation of the circular of September 23, 1880, a copy of which I inclose, with the preceding circular of April 27, 1880. The circular itself fully sets out, I think, the necessity for its issue, but it is necessary to add that the frauds upon the United States and upon bona fide mining claimants permitted by the present regulations are notorious and flagrant, particularly in the matter of railroad selections. As evidence that the evils under consideration are not recent or exaggerated, but have long been an embarrassment to this office, I refer to pages 32-42 of the General Land Office Report for 1872, a copy of which I inclose.

In a case now before me patents issued in April, 1885, to the Central Pacific Railroad Company for large tracts of land in a township which, according to information since received, is filled with mineral and mining claims. Only scattered portions are shown to be mineral by the surveyor-general's return, made in 1871. The railroad company in making its selections carefully avoided every one of the tracts so designated, probably because a contrary course would precipitate a hearing before the local officers, that would bring the well-known mineral character of the land to the attention of the Department. It is alleged that the land so patented contains mines 400 feet deep. In a case recently brought to your attention forty-two mines are said to be in active operation upon two sections selected by the same company, one at least having been worked since 1855.

To ask the Government to rest its case upon evidence found to be so untrustworthy is like asking it to dispose of all the lands in California upon knowledge of their character acquired before 1849, ignoring all subsequent discoveries and developments. Where patents have erroneously issued upon such returns, the Government is bound to recover by expensive proceedings in the courts the title wrongfully parted with, in order to fulfill its obligations to mineral claimants relying upon their possessory titles under section 2322 Revised Statutes. Such a suit I had occasion to recommend by my letter of the 17th ultimo, in case of the Lowell Hill Placer Mine.

The provision of the proposed circular which requires an official examination of the land is intended to be applied in well-known mineral regions, such as the recognized "mineral belt" of California, in which the natural presumption is against the non-mineral character of the land. It is merely an application of the circular of September 22, 1882, to agricultural claims and is necessary because the interests of the Government would not be sufficiently protected by publication alone. I am informed that the railroad companies are securing patents to large tracts of mineral lands under compromises with the owners of mining claims, by which the company deeds to the miners the lands covered by their claim, reserving to itself the remainder. By this means the miners secure the legal title at an expense much less than the cost of obtaining mineral patents, but the Government is defrauded of its fees and the price of the land under the mining laws, $2.50 and $5 per acre.

I think that ample authority for the proposed regulations is found in section 2478, Revised Statutes. Certainly if the power of the Department to demand publication not required by statute is conceded to have been rightfully exercised in the issue of the circular of September 23, 1880, it is competent for the Department to extend that demand to all the cases affected by the proposed circular, the present discrimination being shown to be based upon unreliable evidence. For requiring an official determination of the character of the land at the expense of the claimant a precedent exists in the circular of September 22, 1882, now in force.

The whole object of the proposed circular is to permit the United States to dispose of their lands, not upon information acquired twenty or thirty years ago, which, although it may have been correct at the time, is not so now, not upon information which the public officers know to be contrary to the facts, but upon the report of sworn agents, made at the time of the negotiations for sale. The present practice is one which no business man would employ in his private affairs, and I recommend that it be properly reformed.

Very respectfully,

WM. A. J. SPARKS, Commissioner.

Hon. L. Q. C. LAMAR,
Secretary of the Interior.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, June 25, 1887.

SIR: In the matter of the application, dated the 2d ultimo, of Henry Beard, esq., attorney for the Central Pacific Railroad Company, asking the direction of the Department as to certain lands in the Sacramento land district, California, selected by said company, I have the honor to submit the following report in compliance with your letter of the 13th ultimo.

Said company made selections under act of July 1, 1862, and act amendatory thereof, approved July 2, 1864, as follows:

List 9, August 27, 1885.
List 10, October 30, 1885.
List 13, February 15, 1886.
List 14, March 10, 1886.
List 15, April 7, 1886.
List 16, May 10, 1886.
List 17, June 12, 1886.
List 18, August 13, 1886.
List 19, September 9, 1886.
List 20, October 11, 1886.
List 21, November 5, 1886.
List 22, December 8, 1886.
List 23, December 8, 1886.
List 24, December 21, 1886.

Aggregating 222,844.57 acres.

From these lists a list of 194,050.14 acres, designated as clear list No. 50, was made up and, on March 19, 1887, referred for examination to the mineral division; and on April 6, 1887, the register and receiver at Sacramento were instructed as follows:

"The affidavits submitted as to the non-mineral character of the lands described in the inclosed list, 194,050.14 acres, being a part of the lands embraced in selection lists 9, 10, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, and 24, by the Central Pacific Railroad Company, is not satisfactory.

"Affidavits substantially as required in agricultural cases generally in your district (form 4-062) must be furnished.

"See letter N to your office of September 20, 1872, relating to the matter of non-mineral affidavits thereafter to be required.

"The affidavits here required of the company may be made by any duly authorized agent, but proof of his appointment must be filed in each case.

"Notify the company hereof and promptly forward any evidence submitted." (See Exhibits A and AA.)

It is the requirement in this letter that Mr. Beard complains of. He charges that the procedure is "unusual, unauthorized, and impracticable."

The propriety of this requirement will be shown by a brief review of the reasons which controlled the action of this office and the Department in 1871, and the causes which led up to the present practice under which the requirement complained of was made.

On the 24th of November, 1871, the honorable Secretary of the Interior, upon report made by this office and a request for authority to withdraw from disposal as agricultural lands certain townships and parts of townships in the mineral region, which had been surveyed and returned as agricultural lands, but which were believed to be mineral in character, authorized this office to make the necessary withdrawal, and to instruct the local officers not to permit any of the tracts which may be withdrawn to be entered as agricultural land, unless the non-mineral character of the same should first be fully and clearly established by competent testimony. Under this authority from the Department withdrawals were made of a large number of townships in December, 1871, and in January, 1872, and later. (See General Land Office circular of June 17, 1872, marked Exhibit B, setting out in full the reason for such withdrawals.)

On the 20th of September, 1872, the register and receiver at Sacramento were instructed not to allow any entry under the homestead, pre-emption, or other agricultural land law of Congress, until the applicant for patent had filed a non-mineral affidavit of the form transmitted, and fully describing the tract sought to be entered. (See Exhibit C.) This general requirement has never been recalled.

On the 16th of April, 1880, this office, in a report to the honorable Secretary, reviewed at considerable length the reasons for these withdrawals and the effect of requiring evidence as to the character of land in the manner indicated therein, and in this report the Commissioner recommended that the "policy and practice of throwing the burden of proof upon agricultural claimants be reversed; that the applicant for such entry be required to make the non-mineral affidavit required as aforesaid, and that this be deemed sufficient in the absence of the alleged mineral character of his claim," etc., and recommended also that the withdrawals theretofore made be revoked. (See Exhibit D.) By letter of 22d of April, 1880, the honorable Secretary approved this recommendation, and thereupon this office issued circular dated April 27, 1880, revoking the withdrawals referred to and directing that when any party applies to enter any tract under any of the laws relating to agricultural lands he will be required to make the usual non-mineral affidavit which, in the absence of any allegation that the land is mineral, will be deemed sufficient, etc. (See Exhibit E.)

By circular of September 23, 1880, where application is made to enter or select as agricultural land, under any act of Congress other than the pre-emption or homestead acts, lands returned as mineral by the surveyor-general, applicant is required at date of final proof, location, or selection to publish for thirty days a notice describing the land applied for, etc. This circular likewise requires, after publication of notice and where no affidavits alleging the mineral character of the land have been filed, the filing of a proper non-mineral affidavit. (See Exhibit F.)

Since the making of those regulations experience has demonstrated the vital importance of requiring the filing of the usual non-mineral affidavit in all cases where patents are sought under the agricultural-land laws for lands situated in the mineral regions, although such lands may have been returned by the surveyor-general as agricultural in character.

The frequency with which this office is called upon to aid in restoring to the public domain mineral lands patented to railroad companies and the many protests received against pending selections of lands in the States and Territories where the United States mining laws are in operation urge the necessity of a careful examination of every tract, although returned by the surveyor-general as agricultural, and the requirement of evidence of the non-mineral character, in strict accordance with the law and departmental regulations.

The honorable Secretary of the Interior in his letter of January 31, 1881 (see Exhibit G), addressed to this office, concerning certain examination made by Special Agent Goucher, of lands in California, expressed the opinion that "if the land contains lodes of mineral-bearing matter, then it is mineral land, whether it has been worked or not, or whether it will pay to work or not at this time. As between the railroad company and the Government, I think any and all land that bears mineral or gold in placer form in such appreciable quantities as to render it in any sense valuable, so as to be likely to be sought out for its mineral qualities, is within the spirit of the exception made by Congress and should be considered mineral land. As between the settler and Government a more liberal policy may be adopted; that is, to determine whether the land is more valuable for mining than agricultural and other purposes of settlement and use in the first instance, and if it is so found it may properly go to the settler. * * * But it can hardly be supposed that in making a donation to the railroad company of public land the Government intended to adopt the same liberal policy as toward the settler. At all events, mineral land is reserved, and whether the land is or is not mineral ought not to be left to the report of the surveyor-general, but should be determined as any other question of fact."

I also inclose copy of appointment by the Central Pacific Railroad Company of an agent "to take and subscribe any and all non-mineral affidavits," dated April 15, 1887, which paper, with the non-mineral affidavits therein referred to (form 4062), were filed in this office in response to call made in office letter of March 7, 1887, and without objection.

It would appear, therefore, that in certain cases only is it "impracticable" to comply with the requirements.

In my letter to you of the 22d of April, 1886, inclosing the draught of a proposed circular, I endeavored to point out the notorious and flagrant frauds which have been practiced upon the United States and upon bona fide mining claimants, particularly in the matter of railroad selections, in taking up and entering as agricultural lands, which are really mineral in character, comprising well known and valuable mines. Experience has shown that the returns of the surveyor-general, in a great number of cases are so indefinite or erroneous as to be of very little value for the purpose of determining the character of the land; and these additional regulations were prepared with a view to prevent a continuation of the fraudulent practices mentioned. (See Exhibits H and K.)

I also inclose copy of my letter of February 28, 1887, to the register and receiver at Los Angeles, Cal., (Exhibit L), in the matter of the motion of Mr. Henry Beard for a reconsideration of my decision of December 23, 1886, requiring non-mineral affidavits as to certain lands selected by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company in lists 21, 30, 31, and 34. This letter sets out more fully than said decision of December 23 the reason for this requirement, and why a compliance therewith is not only proper but practicable.

The requirement of non-mineral affidavits in cases of selections by the State of lands returned as agricultural has also been incorporated into the circular prescribing regulations for making school indemnity selections in lieu of mineral lands in sections 16 and 36, in the State of Colorado, approved by the Department May 2 last. The fourth section of this circular expressly requires that "In all cases the selected tracts must be covered by non-mineral affidavits made by the selecting agent of the State," etc. (See Exhibit M.)

Although the requirement complained of may not have been strictly enforced heretofore in cases of railroad selections, yet I can conceive of no reason why the usual non-mineral affidavit required of settlers and other claimants under laws providing for the disposal of agricultural lands, in the States and Territories where the United States mining laws are operative, should not also be required in cases of railroad selections therein.

Although the general withdrawals made in 1871-'72, etc., were subsequently revoked, yet the great safeguard—the requirement that claimants shall file the usual non-mineral affidavit—was retained.

Experience has demonstrated the great importance of this requirement, and public policy, in my opinion, demands its strict enforcement in cases of railroad selections. Certainly a more liberal policy in this respect was never intended in dealing with railroad selections than has been adopted in cases of individual settlers and other claimants.

Regarding the statements of Mr. Beard that, referring to the lands in question, seven-eighths of the land is situated on the mountain divide, on the east slope of the Sierra Nevadas, regions in which there are no mineral lands, I submit the following table:

The 194,050.14 acres embraced in clear list No. 50 cover portions of 36 townships.

In 12 of the 36 townships portions were returned as mineral by the surveyor-general.

In 12 of the 36 townships all the lands were withdrawn as mineral, being situate in the mineral belt.

In 15 of the 36 townships the segregation plats in this office show mining claims.

Number of mining claims shown in these 15 townships, 142.

In one township, 17 north, 11 east, which was returned by the Surveyor-General as agricultural, there are twenty-six mining claims, many of which have been patented. In this township the company has selected 3,869.16 acres.

Of the thirty-six townships, twenty-four contain tracts which have at one time or another been held or reserved by this office as mineral, and more than half of the lands in clear list 50 are situate in these twenty-four townships.

The above table shows only the facts disclosed by the records of this office and does not show mining claims held and worked under the local laws, but not reported to this office, of which there are no doubt many.

The selections made include tracts adjoining mining claims and lots made by segregation of mining claims.

It appears that instead of the greater portion being in "regions in which there are no mineral lands," 109,233.31 acres of the 194,660.14 acres are in a mineral region.

Touching the regulations of 1867 and 1879, referred to by Mr. Beard (page 4 of petition), it is held by this office that the said circular of April 27 and September 23, 1880, and the mining circular of October 31, 1881, supersede all prior circular instructions in the matter.

This apparent conflict of circular instruction accounts for the few cases referred to as having heretofore been passed without requiring the "usual non-mineral affidavit."

For a time following the revocation of the withdrawals by said circular of April 27, 1880, railroad selections for lands not returned as mineral were not referred to the mineral division, but passed to patent under the proofs required by the regulations of 1867 and 1879 from the railroad division in which they were received and filed. Such cases, however, now go to the mineral division, where the non-mineral affidavit (form 4-062) is required in all alike.

I inclose copies of the various letters, circulars, etc., referred to above as Exhibits A, AA, B, C, D, E, F, G, H, K, L, and M.

Concluding, I have the honor to state that two cases involving the same question as that here reported upon are now before you on appeal from the action of this office in requiring similar non-mineral affidavits, namely: Appeal by the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, case of selection lists 1, 2, and 3 Prescott, Ariz., land district, forwarded March 18, 1887, and appeal by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, case of selection lists 21, 30, 31, and 34, Los Angeles, Cal., land district, forwarded March 29, 1887.

Very respectfully,

W. A. J. SPARKS,
Commissioner.

Hon. L. Q. C. LAMAR,
Secretary of the Interior.

And now, sir, as confirmatory of all that has been said respecting the danger of mineral lands falling into the hands of the railroads, and to place fairly before the country the position assumed by the railroad company, I present the letter of Mr. Thomas F. Oakes, vice-president and general manager of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company:

MR. OAKES SPEAKS—THE NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD AND MONTANA MINERAL LANDS.

[St. Paul Globe.]

To the Editor of the Globe:

An article which appeared in your paper of Saturday, under the head of "Robbing the Territories," conveys an erroneous impression to readers as to the action of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company in the matter of mineral lands lying within its grant in Montana. You speak of the "rapacity of the railroads" and intimate that this company is asserting title to lands which do not rightfully belong to it. Will you permit me to state the facts as they are? The company has a grant extending through Montana from east to west, for the entire length of the Territory. Lands known to contain minerals are exempted by the granting act from the operation of the grant. Mark the phraseology:

"Lands known to contain minerals," not lands supposed to contain minerals, or lands which may at some time in the future be found to contain minerals. The grant is not to be suspended indefinitely waiting for miners and prospectors to make explorations, but when the Government surveys are made such of the sections included in the granting act as at that time are not known to contain mineral are patented to the company. That settles the matter so far as title to those sections is concerned, and no future discovery of minerals invalidates the title. This is not only law but equity and common sense. Montana has been searched for the precious metals for more than a quarter of a century. The Northern Pacific was built through the Territory five years ago.

The Government surveys progress very slowly, and as fast as they are made it is only fair that the railroad company should receive title to the lands Congress enacted that it should have, in order that it may sell them and that the settlement of the country may not be longer retarded.

Minerals may possibly be found on any section of the Northern Pacific grant on the entire mountain district traversed by the road in the Territory, a belt of country 300 miles long. It would be manifestly unjust to the company, and highly detrimental to the interests of the Territory, if the whole grant for that distance would be withheld from sale and settlement for many years, perchance for another quarter of a century, until every remote chance and possibility of gold, silver, or copper being found upon it is determined in the negative. Yet this is the position your article appears to assume.

I desire to say in conclusion that the Northern Pacific Company is not seeking title to a single acre of land in Montana that does not lawfully belong to it; that it is guilty of no "rapacity" in act or intent, but, on the contrary, is patient and long-suffering, waiting year after year for the Government to make surveys which it agreed to make long ago, so that it can obtain the land which Congress said it should have as soon as its road was completed.

Yours truly,

T. F. OAKES,
Vice-President and General Manager.

ST. PAUL, March 5, 1888.

It is boldly asserted here that only lands "known to contain minerals" are excepted from the grant. It is a settled rule of construction that whatever is included in the exception is excluded from the grant, and hence it becomes necessary to see what the exception is.

"Provided further that all mineral lands ('not known to contain mineral' as claimed) be, and the same are hereby, excluded from the operation of this act," etc., "and provided further that the word 'mineral' where it occurs in this act shall not be held to include iron or coal." If the position of the railroad company could be maintained, the result would follow that in the States and Territories through which a land-grant road passes all the land within the limits of the grant would pass to the company which was not actually developed and worked as a mining claim. The proposition is astounding, and its enforcement would be a crime against the citizen which no subsequent remedial legislation could ever paliate or excuse. It was intended that mineral lands should be reserved. The difficulty is that Congress having failed to define what constitutes "mineral land," as contemplated by the statute, the question is left largely to the discretion of the courts or the land officers, as the case may be. To carry out this intention I insist that it is the duty of Congress to define what shall constitute mineral land, within the meaning of the statute, as between the Government and the railroad company. In no other way can there ever be a rule of decision which will be uniform in its operation in the mining States and Territories whereby the Government and the citizen will be protected against the fraud and imposition of these powerful companies.

While it is true that additional requirements are made by which it must be shown that the claim contains "valuable mineral deposits" before the Government will dispose of any of its mineral lands, so reserved, yet as against the railroad, a deposit of any of the precious minerals except iron and coal deprives it of any status as a claimant.

Any other rule would fritter away the reservations in the grant, destroy the utility of the act of 1872, and utterly subvert the policy of the Government in dealing out mining claims in small portions, by means of which vast contributions will be made to the wealth of the citizen, instead of compelling him at all future times upon discovering and developing valuable mineral deposits upon these odd sections of land to capitulate at a disadvantage with a stupendous corporation, and finally purchase upon such terms and subject to such conditions and amenable to such servitudes as it might see proper to impose.

It was never intended that all of the great mineral wealth of this country falling within the limits of land grants, which was undiscovered at the time the grant attached, should be given away to railroad companies, who would be permitted to stifle the development of our mineral resources by withholding the lands from the prospector and compelling the citizen to purchase at a sum far in excess of the Government price.

Being thus reserved by all of its legislation, they should be kept for all time, a continuous field for the prospector and the miner, who will be stimulated in the pursuits of his labor. It was never intended that the occupants of these lands should be subject to the caprice of such corporations and deprived of his possessions, because, forsooth, at some moment in its development it would not pay, at present prices and under present conditions, the actual cost of extracting the precious minerals from it.

It will not be presumed that Congress intended to unduly circumscribe the rights of the miner in a mining country in the realization of his reasonable expectations, but on the contrary afford to him every reasonable facility in the pursuit of so expensive and hazardous an occupation.

This comports more with the duty of Government, is more in keeping with its legislation upon the subject, and should not be allowed to be frittered away by judicial construction in the very heart of its richest mineral belt.

The following letter from Mr. Thomas G. Merrill, chairman of the Montana Mineral Land Association, is of interest in this connection. It is as follows:

MONTANA MINERAL LAND ASSOCIATION,
Helena, Mont., March 29, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 16th ultimo was received and contents noted, and on the 3d instant we sent you an official copy of the preamble and resolutions adopted by the mineral land convention, which met in Helena February 7, 1888.

Inclosed please find petitions to Congress in relation to the mineral lands of Montana, which we hope you will have read to the House. We also inclose Vice-President Oakes's letter to the St. Paul Globe, which you may not have seen.

You will see by this letter that the Northern Pacific Railroad Company claim all the odd sections of our mountainous mineral lands, and consider their title perfect as soon as these lands are surveyed, only excepting known mineral lands (which simply means mining claims), known to the grantor, which is the Government, and you know the only mines or mining claims known to the Government are those patented or surveyed for a patent by a United States deputy mineral surveyor.

This would give to this railroad company more than nine-tenths of all the discovered and recorded gold and silver mining claims on the odd sections within the limits of their grant, and forever withdraw about one-half of all our mineral land from further prospecting and exploration by our prospectors and miners, and will stop to a large extent prospecting on the even sections, as the corners are obliterated and the section lines in most cases are not marked so that the prospector could tell whether he was on an even or an odd section, and the hundreds of thousands of dollars which have been expended on the unpatented or unsurveyed mining claims in the odd-numbered sections will be lost to their owners if these mines become the property of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. Permit us also to call your attention to the fact that the wording on which Mr. Oakes lays so much stress, "lands known to contain mineral," does not occur in the act granting these lands. You will at once see the absurdity of most of his other statements, as to the injury to the territory if these lands are not given to the railroad company, and the justice, equity, and common sense to this patient, long-suffering company that they should not be compelled to wait any longer for these lands that were never granted to them.

We will only say as to the statement that these mountains have been prospected for twenty-five years; that there were discovered and recorded in the county records of Lewis and Clarke County, during the last year, eight hundred and twenty-six mining claims bearing gold, silver, lead, or copper, which is three hundred more than were ever discovered in any previous year, and yet Lewis and Clarke County has been as well prospected as any county in the Territory in former years.

We have already sent to the Secretary of the Interior a large number of affidavits as to the mineral character of the mountainous lands of Montana, and we propose to have affidavits by competent persons showing that all our mountainous lands are mineral. Will send you to-day blue prints of the counties in which there are mountainous mineral lands within the land grant, showing the lands certified to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company for patent, which is almost one-half of the entire amount surveyed, and much of this land you will certainly know is mineral land, and should be classed as such.

The decisions of the higher courts, based on the present acts of Congress, are that mineral lands are mines or mining claims with ore which carries the precious or useful metals in paying quantities, which gives the foundation to the claim of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, and thus the only relief we have is an act of Congress either setting aside the mountainous mineral districts of Montana, where gold, silver, copper, or lead are found as mineral lands, and compelling the Northern Pacific Railroad Company in these lands to make at least the same non-mineral proof as a private citizen is compelled to make if he desires to locate a homestead. We inclose you a copy of the reservation of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company in the deeds from them, and we ask you to see if this clause, except as to iron and coal, can not be placed in all patents hereafter issued to them. If this can be done it will secure the mineral lands to our people. Please send us the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Very respectfully, yours,

THOMAS G. MERRILL, Chairman.
JOHN S. HARRIS, Secretary.

Hon. J. K. TOOLE, M. C., Washington, D. C.

I am not one of those who would disturb these corporations in the enjoyment of a single right which is theirs under the law, but as a representative of the most extensive and richest mineral district of this country, I am here to insist and see to it if I can that nothing shall pass by these grants except such as was intended by Congress. And to prevent this and the serious consequences which will surely ensue requires speedy action upon the part of Congress. It is high time that the law with its beak and claw should take hold of these corporations, creatures of its own unholy creation, and give them such a vigorous shaking as will compel them to let go that which is not their own.

The amendment proposed by me imposes no hardships or unnecessary burdens on them. It is in keeping with the spirit and intention of the grants, and if adopted will afford ample facilities for an honest and fair certification of all lands falling within the limits of railroad grants to the companies entitled to the same, and preserve to the people of this country the right to prospect for and develop the hidden wealth of this land unrestrained and unfettered by corporate control and dictation.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FORNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BLOUNT, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the bill (S. 1851) to provide for an international marine conference for securing greater safety for life and property at sea, and had directed him to report the same to the House with the recommendation that it do pass with certain amendments; also, that they had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9377) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and had come to no resolution thereon.

INTERNATIONAL MARINE CONFERENCE.

Mr. BELMONT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question upon the Senate bill which has just been reported from the Committee of the Whole, being the bill (S. 1851) to provide for an international marine conference for securing greater safety for life and property at sea.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole were adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BELMONT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INVALID PENSIONS.

Mr. GAY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a privileged report.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (H. R. 5445) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreemet to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 4, and 5, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$16,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

M. A. FORAN,
EDWARD J. GAY,
JOHN D. LONG,
Managers on the part of the House.
WILLIAM B. ALLISON,
HENRY L. DAWES,
A. P. GORMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The conferees on the part of the House submitted the following statement:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5445) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, submit the following written statement:

The effect of the action recommended in the accompanying report will, if it is ratified by the two Houses, pass the bill as it was amended by the Senate, except that the amount for stationery and other necessary expenses for the pension agencies will be $16,000 instead of $18,000, as proposed by a Senate amendment.

The bill as agreed upon in conference appropriates $81,758,000.

M. A. FORAN,
EDWARD J. GAY,
JOHN D. LONG,
Managers on the part of the House.

THOMAS W. LORD.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill which I send to the desk, and that it be now put upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint First Lieut. Thomas W. Lord, United States Army, retired, a captain on the retired-list of the Army, with the retired pay of that grade from the date of such appointment.

The report (by Mr. STEELE) is as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, having carefully considered House bill No. 409, report it back with the recomendation that it be favorably considered.

Lieutenant Lord entered the service a mere boy early in the war and served faithfully upon the active-list either in the volunteer or regular service for over twenty-five years. He was severely wounded at Chancellorsville in 1863, which resulted in the loss of his left leg and injury to his right foot, and was brevetted for gallantry at said battle. He was appointed a lieutenant, Forty-third Veteran Reserve Corps, in 1863, which regiment was consolidated with the Twentieth United States Infantry in 1869, and Lieutenant Lord was retained in the service as a first lieutenant and as regimental quartermaster until August 25, 1887, when he was placed upon the retired-list. Had he been allowed to remain in the service six days more a vacancy would have occurred and Lord entitled to promotion as captain; but had he remained, under the ruling of the President, Mr. Lord would not have been promoted, because of his being recommended for retirement some years ago on account of the loss of his leg in battle.

Now, while your committee agree with the President that officers who, on account of wounds or disabilities incurred in the service, had better be placed upon the retired-list, it thinks that where officers have performed gallant and meritorious service, and have been retained in active service for over twenty years, and have performed said service efficiently, as several of Lieutenant Lord's superior officers say of him, "with unusual efficiency," they should not be retired upon the eve of a merited promotion.

There are before your committee many letters from officers of distinction commending Lieutenant Lord for his bravery, efficiency, integrity, and sobriety.

In view of all the foregoing facts, your committee urge favorable action on the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BURROWS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN CURTIN KENT.

Mr. BELMONT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk. I do not think there will be any opposition to it.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas John Curtin Kent, a naturalized citizen of the United States, has been convicted of complicity with one Dr. Gallinger in an alleged dynamite plot in England, and is now suffering a term of imprisonment therefor in Milbank penitentiary in London; and

Whereas it is reported by the United States consul-general in London that the conviction of the said Curtin Kent was contrary to the charge of the judge who presided at the trial, and is believed to have been obtained on insufficient or improperly considered evidence; and

Whereas it appears that the fact of the American citizenship of the said Curtin Kent was not made known at the trial of his case, and therefore proper representation could not be made on his behalf:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire into the facts of the case of the said Curtin Kent and to report thereon to the House.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. BELMONT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The hour of 5 o'clock p. m. having arrived, the House adjourned until 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

By Mr. BINGHAM: A bill (H. R. 10136) for the relief of Thomas Sinclair & Son—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. T. M. BROWNE: A bill (H. R. 10137) for the relief of Francis A. Field—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of the Blackwell's Durham Co-operative Company and other firms, of Durham, N. C., and elsewhere, favoring the repeal of all licenses and restrictions on the sale of tobacco, and that the tax be reduced to 2 cents per pound on manufactured tobacco—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of employés of the Government Printing Office, for relief—to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. HOUK: Petition of heir of Richard Hayworth, of Jefferson County, Tennessee, for reference of his claim to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. MORROW: Resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, Cal., in favor of action by Congress asserting the policy of maintaining the independence of the islands of the Pacific not already dominated by European powers—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. CHARLES O'NEILL: Memorial of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, Pa., favoring the bill to incorporate the Nicaragua Canal—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. ROGERS: Petition of numerous citizens of Franklin County, Arkansas, relating to the amendment of the interstate-commerce law—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. G. M. THOMAS: Petition of John S. May, with affidavits to be filed with bill No. 10130, for his relief—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. A. C. THOMPSON: Petition of 77 citizens of the Eleventh district of Ohio, for prohibition in the District of Columbia—to the Select Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

By Mr. J. R. WHITING: Petition of Nelson Fisher, late private Company G, First Regiment Michigan Volunteers, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, petition of citizens of Inland, of Ionia and Kent Counties, and of Ingham County, Michigan, in favor of pure food—to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. WHITTHORNE: Petition of Rachael Ewing, of Williamson County, Tennessee, for reference of her claim to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WILKINSON: Petition of J. Sambola, J. J. Reuss, and others, for the restoration of the duty on macaroni and vermicelli—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The following petitions in favor of House bill 9716, for the better protection of free labor from convict labor, were received and severally referred to the Committee on Labor:

By Mr. C. H. ALLEN: Of Knights of Labor of Baldwinville, Mass.

By Mr. BOWEN: Of B. F. Sharpe and others, citizens of Virginia.

By Mr. T. M. BROWNE: Of Local Assembly No. 3243, Knights of Labor, of Connersville, Ind.

By Mr. LONG: Of Thomas Lynch and 15 others, citizens of Brockton, Mass.

By Mr. STEPHENSON: Of Local Assembly No. 9006, Knights of Labor, of Stevens Point, Wis.—to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. VANCE: Of workmen of New Britain, Conn.

The following petition for the repeal or modification of the internal-revenue tax of $25 levied on druggists was received and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means:

By Mr. KEAN: Of William Gale, of Westfield, N. J.

The following petition for the proper protection of the Yellowstone National Park, as proposed in Senate bill 283, was received and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands:

By Mr. GROSVENOR: Of L. M. Jewett and others, of Ohio—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The following petitions for the more effectual protection of agriculture, by the means of certain import duties, were received and severally referred to the Committee on Ways and Means:

By Mr. GOFF: Of W. H. Ramsey and others, of Doddridge County, West Virginia.

By Mr. GROUT: Of Abel Slayton and 25 others, citizens of Felchville, Vt.

By Mr. JACKSON: Of 33 farmers of Washington County, Pennsylvania.

The following petitions, praying for the enactment of a law providing temporary aid for common schools, to be disbursed on the basis of illiteracy, were severally referred to the Committee on Education:

By Mr. CLARDY: Of 98 citizens of St. Louis County, Missouri.

By Mr. S. I. HOPKINS (by request): Of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and Woman Suffrage Association.

The following petition for an increase of compensation of fourth-class postmasters was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads:

By Mr. CLARDY: Of George W. Mahn and 80 others, citizens of Hazel Run, Mo.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 25, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 9345) making appropriations for the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT PATERSON, N. J.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1978) for the erection of a public building at Paterson, N. J., which were in lines 9 and 22, to reduce the amount of the appropriation from $125,000 to $80,000.

Mr. WALTHALL. On behalf of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], who is absent, I move that the Senate non-concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives, and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. SPOONER, Mr. QUAY, and Mr. VEST were appointed.

Mr. MCPHERSON subsequently said: I desire to ask for a reconsideration of the vote by which the Senate non-concurred in the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1978) for the erection of a public building in Paterson, N. J., and ordered a conference thereon. I desire to have the Senate concur in the House amendments.

Mr. WALTHALL. I made the motion for a committee of conference on behalf of the Senator from New Jersey in his absence.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I understand that, but it was a mistake on my part.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The action of the Senate refusing to concur in the amendments made to the bill by the House of Representatives will be reconsidered, if there be no objection; and the Senator from New Jersey now moves that the Senate concur in the amendments made to the bill by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented the petition of S. L. Banks, of Wheatland, Iowa, praying for the passage of an act granting him a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHERMAN presented four memorials of Local Assemblies, Nos. 6825, 303, 3435, and 4857, of the Knights of Labor, in the State of Ohio, remonstrating against the granting of civil pensions; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VEST presented a petition of the faculty of Washington University at St. Louis, Mo., praying for the passage of a bill establishing a bureau of harbors and water ways; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DANIEL presented the petition of Thomas William Lion, at the National Soldiers' Home, Wisconsin, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of W. A. Wilson and other citizens of Christiansburgh and other places in Virginia, and a petition of E. B. Spencer and other citizens of Virginia, praying for the repeal of that portion of the internal-revenue law classing druggists as liquor dealers, etc.; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PASCO presented the petition of R. Sumner and others, sureties on the bond of R. J. Marshall, late postmaster at Fort Dade, Fla., praying to be reimbursed for money paid by them as such sureties; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented certain petitions of tobacco manufacturers of Key West, Fla., praying for the imposition of increased duties on imported stripped and stemmed tobacco; which were referrrd to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that bill (S. 2549) for the relief of Belle R. Clements, Order of Business 1262, reported adversely on the 8th of May, 1888, by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK], may be recommitted, together with the report of the Committee on Pensions, and I desire to present in this connection an additional petition from Mrs. Mary I. Clements, and additional evidence, and trust that they may be referred to the committee, and that there will be full, fair, and favorable consideration of the additional evidence and facts.

Mr. PADDOCK. I am very glad that the Senator has made that proposition. It is one I should have made myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions, with the additional evidence introduced by the Senator from Missouri.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 8722) granting a pension to Jessie M. Barthauer;
A bill (H. R. 7857) to increase the pension of Henry L. Potter;
A bill (H. R. 8400) for the relief of Lydia Burridge;
A bill (H. R. 8174) granting a pension to Ellen Sexton; and
A bill (H. R. 8884) granting a pension to Emily McClure.

Mr. DANIEL, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1291) for the erection of a public building at the city of Staunton, Va., reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1365) for the erection of a public building for the use of the custom-house and post-office at Newport News, in the district of Yorktown, Virginia, and making an appropriation therefor, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2774) authorizing the Richmond and Danville Railroad Company to lay tracks, etc., in the District of Columbia, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1631) to incorporate the Washington and Sandy Spring Narrow-Gauge Railroad and Street Railway Company, reported it with amendments.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5870) to amend the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia for the protection of girls and for the punishment of the crime of rape, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of W. H. Rader, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. TURPIE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 600) increasing the pension of Mary Minor Hoxey;
A bill (H. R. 6973) for the relief of Enoch Weathers;
A bill (H. R. 6577) granting a pension to Abigail Sullivan;
A bill (H. R. 7944) granting a pension to Ann V. Ferguson; and
A bill (H. R. 8159) granting a pension to Jane Brown Dunn.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2986) to incorporate the American Historical Association, reported it without amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I ask leave of the Senate to state that yesterday the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], from the Committee on Claims, reported back the bill (S. 353) for the relief of William T. Crump, proposing to give the beneficiary $5,000 for certain services alleged to have been rendered by him. I was not in the Senate at the time, and I desire to give notice that a minority of the Committee on Claims are opposed to the passage of the bill and may at some future time present their views to the Senate to be considered with the majority report.

Mr. HOAR. I understood that some members of the committee were opposed to the bill, but I was not aware that they desired to make a written minority report. If they do, I think my report had better be withdrawn so that the two can be in one document. It is much more convenient to the Senate to have them together.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I prefer that that course should be taken.

Mr. HOAR. Very well. I will have my report withdrawn, unless it has gone to the Printer, so that a withdrawal would be too late.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the report submitted by him upon the bill indicated may be withdrawn.

Mr. HOAR. I will ascertain before doing that whether the report has been printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The matter will be passed over for the present.

Mr. HOAR subsequently moved to reconsider the order for the printing of the report, and the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. FARWELL. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 537) to provide for the confinement of inebriates in the Government Hospital for the Insane, to report it favorably without amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent that the bill reported by my friend from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL], providing for the confinement of inebriates at St. Elizabeth's for the time being, may be now considered. The bill was considered at the last session on a favorable report and passed unanimously by the Senate, and I think it extremely desirable that it should reach the House of Representatives as early as possible. As it is precisely the same measure that the Senate has once favorably and without division passed upon, I ask unanimous consent that it be now considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been this day reported, the Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed now to consider the same. Is there objection?

Mr. HOAR. Let the bill be read at length for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The bill was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOAR. I think the bill had better lie over. It presents a very important constitutional question as it stands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 860) for the relief of Alfred Head, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 3020) for the relief of John H. Claus; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DAVIS introduced a bill (S. 3021) granting a pension to Carrie V. Miller; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, introduced a bill (S. 3022) granting a pension to G. L. Banks; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3023) granting a pension to Elijah M. Kinzey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3024) granting a pension to Lewis H. Linville; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GULLOM introduced a bill (S. 3025) to provide for the reconstruction of the Government dam at the Rock Island Arsenal, and for the immediate construction of a temporary dam to furnish water-power for said arsenal; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DANIEL introduced a bill (S. 3026) to amend an act entitled "An act to make persons charged with crimes and offenses competent witnesses in the United States and Territorial courts," approved March 16, 1878; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REGISTER OF LABOR.

Mr. TURPIE introduced a bill (S. 3027) to provide for the making, publication, and distribution of the "Register of Labor" therein named; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. TURPIE. I ask leave at this time to explain briefly the provisions of the bill as now offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. TURPIE. It is herein provided that the Commissioner of Labor shall be authorized and directed to make out a list of the names of persons of excellence in their vicinity in any line of skilled labor or mechanism actually engaged in the manual work of their respective callings, and that such list be distributed generally, as therein provided, the object being to give to the persons whose names appear therein and to the entire list as representatives of very large classes of our fellow-citizens that prestige indescribable, yet very effective, which is imparted to any object either connected with or related to the General Government, the constituted authorities in the administration of public affairs.

The bill does not deal in detail with the methods. The successful administration of a Department, and especially a new one, must depend much more upon management than upon legislation.

It is made the duty of the Commissioner of Labor to publish this list. We must confide in some one for that purpose, if the policy be adopted. We have confided in him as to much greater powers than those provided for in the bill now offered. One of the sections of the bill reported by the Committee on Education and Labor and passed the other day by the Senate directs that officer to procure information concerning and to make a report relating to the effect upon prices, wages, and productions of that class of new creations called trusts, and combinations of capital and labor. I do not conceive of duties any more difficult or delicate than those imposed by the section in the bill already passed by the Senate. Certainly they are much more arduous, much more laborious, much more responsible than any of the labors imposed upon him by the provisions of the bill now offered.

This bill is a modification of an amendment which I had the honor to offer the other day to the bill reported by the honorable Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] as chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor. I took the liberty, as the amendment could only appear in print as a portion of my remarks, to modify it before it was printed, to obviate some objections made then upon the occasion of its first presentation.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] was of the opinion that the amendment then offered made no limitation as to the publication, and that millions might be published. Under the present bill the number is limited to a number equal to that of the Army and Navy Registers, and the same provision is made with respect to the size and contents.

These provisions thus submitted are reasonable. They will commend themselves as such to any Senators who may have the slightest inclination to favor legislation of this character.

The honorable Senator from New Hampshire made very earnest opposition to the adoption of the amendment on the ground that its adoption might endanger the passage of the Department of Labor bill, or, at least, retard it—perhaps defeat it altogether. That objection is certainly obviated by making the subject-matter, as in the present bill, one of an independent measure.

Allow me to say in passing that the honorable Senator from New Hampshire labored under a grave misapprehension in supposing that this amendment was by me offered as a facetious amendment to the Department of Labor bill. It may only be the very keen sense of humor of the honorable Senator which could detect anything like facetiousness in the amendment as first offered, in the bill now proposed, or in any of the remarks made in support of either. Give me leave, however, to prevent all possible misconstruction in future, to say that the measure now offered is a serious proposition, and that it very nearly relates to a subject-matter of very serious gravity and of most important concern.

It was not my intention the other day to cast any ridicule whatever upon the Army and Navy Registers, as was then intimated upon this floor, but only to contrast sharply the well-known, established, and long-accustomed usage of this Government in the recognition which it has given to the arts of destruction in the various bureaus and departments of the War and Navy, with the recognition, late, tardy, even now seemingly reluctant, bestowed upon the arts of construction, the useful arts of peace, the practice of which has been so glorious and beneficent upon the civic life and growth of the Republic.

In publishing the Army and Navy Registers, however, we only copy others. I believe every Government in the world issues a similar publication. In passing this bill providing for the publication of the Labor Register we shall act without precedent and without example. I do not think there is any other Government in the world which makes such a publication, or anything like it; nor do I think there is any other Government in the world which makes the pretense, a very lofty pretension, eternally emphasized, forever emblazoned in gigantic italics, that this is a Government of, for, and by the people. If it be such, why may we not do somewhat more for the people, even of this kind, than that which is required or directed by the policy of other nations?

This, indeed, may be considered a very little thing. It may lead to something greater. It may be considered so insignificant as not to justify a second mention here in this presence. I admit that I may have been guilty of that solecism. Even though it be a trifle, we must remember trifles may be done with a grace which shall make them large.

I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on Education and Labor, and I trust it will have a favorable and early consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

RELIGION AND SCHOOLS.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 86) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States respecting establishments of religion and free public schools; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask that the joint resolution may be read at length and lie on the table.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be, and hereby is, proposed to the States, to become valid when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, as provided in the Constitution:

"ARTICLE —.

"SECTION 1. No State shall ever make or maintain any law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

"SEC. 2. Each State in this Union shall establish and maintain a system of free public schools adequate for the education of all the children living therein between the ages of six and sixteen years, inclusive, in the common branches of knowledge, and in virtue, morality, and the principles of the Christian religion. But no money raised by taxation imposed by law, or any money or other property or credit belonging to any municipal organization or to any State or to the United States, shall ever be appropriated, applied, or given to the use or purposes of any school, institution, corporation, or person whereby instruction or training shall be given in the doctrines, tenets, belief, ceremonials, or observances peculiar to any sect, denomination, organization, or society being or claiming to be religious in its character; nor shall such peculiar doctrines, tenets, belief, ceremonials, or observances be taught or inculcated in the free public schools.

"SEC. 3. To the end that each State, the United States, and all the people thereof, may have and preserve governments republican in form and in substance, the United States shall guaranty to every State and to the people of every State and of the United States the support and maintenance of such a system of free public schools as is herein provided.

"SEC. 4. Congress shall enforce this article by legislation when necessary."

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. HOAR submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Post-Office appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CALL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FARWELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2615) to authorize the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to acquire and use real estate for railway purposes in the District of Columbia; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Post-Office appropriation bill, relating to Central and South American mail facilities; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, relating to the Congo Commission; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, relating to the Congo agent and consular-general; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BERRY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ROCK ISLAND ARSENAL DAM.

Mr. CULLOM submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the Senate as soon as practicable, whatever information may be in possession of the War Department in relation to the destruction of the Government dam at the Rock Island Arsenal by the recent floods in the Mississippi River, and as to the damages resulting therefrom, and the effect of the destruction of said dam upon the operations of the arsenal and the factories and saw-mills at Moline and Rock Island; and also to submit to the Senate without delay an estimate of the amount necessary for the reconstruction of said dam, and for the immediate construction of a temporary dam which will restore the water-power and log harbor, and which can be used as a coffer-dam when the permanent dam is reconstructed.

STATE BONDS HELD BY THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and am led to do it by seeing the Indian appropriation bill reported with a pretty heavy amount of appropriations for interest on trust-fund stocks, many of which are, I have understood, the stocks of States that do not pay the interest. I think it desirable that the Committee on Indian Affairs should make inquiry into that subject, and see how the matter stands. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be, and it hereby is, instructed to examine into the condition of the bonds of any and every State held by the United States or under its authority, either in trust or otherwise, and to report the respective amounts of such bonds of each State, and if overdue how long overdue, and the amount of arrears of interest thereon, and also whether there is now any legal method of enforcing payment thereof, and if not, whether any such method can be devised, and to report by bill or otherwise.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5445) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1851) providing for an international marine conference to secure greater safety for life and property at sea, with an amendment in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 409) for the relief of Thomas W. Lord; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 1948) to authorize the Fort Smith and Choctaw Bridge Company to construct a bridge across the Poteau River, in the Choctaw Nation, Near Fort Smith, Ark.

HETTIE K. PAINTER.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PADDOCK. I ask unanimous consent to make a conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to submit a conference report.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection, but I supposed the morning business was through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The conference report submitted by the Senator from Nebraska will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3839) granting a pension to Hettie K. Painter, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House concur in the Senate amendment to the said bill.

ALGERNON S. PADDOCK,
C. K. DAVIS,
D. TURPIE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
J. L. CHIPMAN,
C. FRENCH,
E. N. MORRILL,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the report explained. It is impossible to understand it by the mere reading.

Mr. PADDOCK. It is a pension case——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests to the Senator from Nebraska that the conference report can not be submitted without the papers, which do not appear in the hands of the clerks.

Mr. PADDOCK. I supposed the papers were on the Secretary's desk. That being the case, I withdraw the report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then the report should not be made here until the papers come over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report is not in order, and is withdrawn.

CUSTOMS AND OTHER DEFICIENCIES.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 9788.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am willing to yield, this being an appropriation bill, but I give notice that after the bill is disposed of I shall again submit my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9788) making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for expenses of collecting the revenue from customs for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the bill be read for amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. For amendment. The amendments of the Committee on Appropriations will be acted on as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to defray the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, in addition to the amount heretofore appropriated, the sum of $450,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended by, or under the direction of, the Secretary of the Treasury, who is authorized to cause to be paid therefrom the full compensation which the employés in the customs-revenue service would have been entitled to receive had no order been made reducing their compensation in consequence of an estimated deficiency in the appropriation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the bill is being read for amendment, I should like to have the Senator from Iowa explain, before the reading proceeds further, how it happens that $450,000 are wanted to pay employés compensation which would be due but for some order. I think the Senate would be glad to know what the facts about that are.

Mr. BECK. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to explain why the committee struck out the next paragraph.

Mr. ALLISON. The appropriation for the payment of the expenses of collecting the customs revenue is a permanent appropriation of five and a half million dollars, payable semi-annually; that is, one-half the appropriation is available at the beginning of each half year.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Under a standing law?

Mr. ALLISON. It is under a standing law. It is under section 3687 of the Revised Statutes. That appropriation at its present amount was originally made in 1871. For many years it has been found insufficient to pay the necessary employés in collecting the customs revenue. The Secretary in his last annual report called attention to this and to the necessity of increasing this appropriation.

Section 3687 is as follows:

SEC. 3687. There is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,750,000 for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs for each half year, in addition to such sums as may be received from fines, penalties, and forfeitures connected with the customs, and from fees paid into the Treasury by customs officers, and from storage, cartage, drayage, labor, and services.

That appropriation has been found in the last two or three years to be less than is necessary for the payment of those who are engaged in collecting the customs revenue.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator if he has the figures to show how much the deficiency has been for the last two or three or four years, per year?

Mr. ALLISON. Last year it was $233,000 in round numbers. This year the Secretary states that it will be $450,000. One reason why the deficiency is growing larger is found in the fact that the fees contemplated in that section of the Revised Statutes have been gradually repealed. I think the entire amount of the fees for the current fiscal year is less than $200,000. By various acts that have been passed from time to time we have gradually removed the fees that collectors of customs were formerly accustomed to receive.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator if there is not some report from the Secretary of the Treasury which shows specifically the diminution of these sources of revenue and the causes therefor, and, as it is supposed, of the increase of the expenses under another head, so as to require an increase of the standing appropriation?

Mr. ALLISON. There is a full statement found in House of Representatives report, No. 2024, made at this session, and also in the last annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, an extract from which I have before me. The Secretary in his annual report states:

By changes in the statutes since that date—

That is since 1871—

By changes in the statutes since that date the first two accounts have greatly fallen off, while the last one has responded to the increase of business, and the exhibit for the fiscal year 1887 is as follows:

From fines, penalties, and forfeitures	$160,205.41
From fees of customs officers	144,817.53
From storage, cartage, etc	748,014.92
Total	1,053,037.86

That sum, of course, was added to the $5,500,000 provided in the statutes. These items of fees, fines, penalties, etc., have been reduced so that they amount to only $1,053,637.86.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Reduced from non-collection or from changes in the law?

Mr. ALLISON. The amount from storage, cartage, etc., being one of the items, has been increased to $748,014.92 from $409,587.69. The fees of customs officers have been reduced by law, by various statutes, to $144,817.53, as against $585,887.69, a large reduction. Fines, penalties, and forfeitures, which in 1871 amounted to $952,579.86, are reduced to $160,205.41 in 1887.

I will say here that there are practically no revenues coming in now from fines, penalties, and forfeitures. Since the act of 1874, called the anti-moiety act, there has been a constant, gradual reduction of receipts from that source, there being now practically no fines, penalties, and forfeitures as compared with the old time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But how is that accounted for? Is it because the importers and smugglers have ceased their unlawful transactions, or because there is no stimulus to the officers of the United States to hunt them out and bring them to punishment?

Mr. ALLISON. It is the result of various causes. One section of the statute to which I have referred is repealed in our undervaluation law, whereby the burden of proof is put on the man who is charged with fraud. The law now requires that the jury shall specially find that the importer was guilty of fraud. Perhaps there will never be a conviction under such a law. These fines have been gradually reduced, so that it is necessary I think that the sum here provided should be appropriated in addition to the amount now available for the purpose of collecting the customs revenues.

The Secretary of the Treasury on the 1st of April, or perhaps about the last of March, issued an order reducing the pay of a large number of employés at the various custom-houses 40 per cent., in order to keep the expenditure within the appropriation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does not the Secretary of the Treasury advise the continuance of the old mode of appropriating for the collection of the revenue—a gross appropriation for the whole service?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. My own impression is that the idea of itemizing the appropriation for this particular branch of the service, or indeed any branch of the service, and fixing specific salaries and so on, is all wrong. I think the Committee on Appropriations would relieve themselves from a great deal of trouble and relieve the Department of a great deal of expense in keeping the various accounts of itemized appropriations, if instead of that system they would report general appropriations, and those to a great extent of a permanent character.

Mr. ALLISON. The House of Representatives in this bill propos to repeal section 3687 of the Revised Statutes, which makes a permanent appropriation for collecting the customs revenue.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is precisely what I wished to call attention to.

Mr. ALLISON. We recommend, and I think for substantial reasons, that this ought not to be done.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is right.

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Appropriations, after investigating this subject, recommend the striking out of lines 16 to 26 inclusive, for the reason that we think this change, if made at all, should be made before this section of the Revised Statutes is repealed, so that we shall not be left without the necessary means to collect the revenue. If we repeal the section of the Revised Statutes making this permanent appropriation without at the same time providing an appropriation for collecting the revenue, it will rest then with the House of Representatives or with the Senate to stop the collection of the revenue by withholding the necessary appropriations. Therefore the committee recommend that these lines be stricken out.

Mr. McPHERSON. May I ask the Senator from Iowa a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. I ask if the Treasury Department has furnished the Committee on Appropriations an itemized statement as to the particular objects to which the appropriation is applied; or has the Committee on Appropriations not appropriated heretofore what the Department asked for?

Mr. ALLISON. For this particular service, for the collection of the customs revenue, there is provided a permanent appropriation, originally made at the present amount in 1871. We do not appropriate for collecting the customs in the annual appropriation bills; but there is a gross sum appropriated in bulk permanently. That sum has been found inadequate to pay for the necessary service in making these collections.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if he can tell us what would be the statistical comparison from year to year in respect of the amount of fees, fines, penalties, and forfeitures; the fees of customs officers, the fees for storage, cartage, etc., from 1871 when that law of permanent appropriation was established down to this time? Is there anything which will enable the Senate or any member of it to see how the practical operation of this law has worked from year to year?

The Secretary of the Treasury in his last report only compares the year 1870-'71 with the year 1886-'87, showing a reduction of receipts from these sources of fines, penalties, and forfeitures, fees of customs officers, storage, cartage, etc., of $895,017.38. That compares two different years that are sixteen years apart. Now, how was it during that period, or for the last six or eight or ten years? Is there anything to show that this diminution in the collection of fines, penalties, forfeitures, fees, etc., has arisen from the legislation of Congress putting questions between the United States and the importers and informers, etc., in a different attitude from what they were before, and thus leaving us to infer that it was the legislation which has produced this diminution, or is it some want of administration? That is what I should like to find out.

Mr. ALLISON. I have not before me at this moment a statistical table showing the amounts received annually from fines, penalties, and forfeitures, but I venture to state from my general knowledge of the subject that it will appear—and if any Senator will send for the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1876, 1877, and 1878, for illustration, which would be ten years ago—it will be found that the receipts from fines, penalties, and forfeitures fell down immediately after the legislation of 1874. I do not believe that under any administration any considerable sum will be realized from fines, penalties, and forfeitures until we change our customs laws.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator one other question?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask when we first began to make this appropriation additional to the permanent appropriation, and by what amount? What year did we begin to have these special deficiency bills for this purpose, and how much in each year have we appropriated thereby?

Mr. ALLISON. I have not the data to answer fully on that subject for each particular year. We have appropriated for a number of years small sums. Last year I know the appropriation was in round numbers $235,000. Not only these receipts from fines, penalties, and forfeitures have been falling off, but the fees of customs officers have been decreased since the legislation of 1883 respecting the fees and charges made on our vessels. Up to that time the collectors and surveyors of the small ports received fees from charges upon vessels, tonnage, etc., but by the act of 1883, or perhaps 1884, all these fees were repealed, so that the fees of customs officers have been largely reduced from year to year since that time.

The Secretary of the Treasury submitted a table, which is in the report of the House committee, beginning with the year 1884, showing the cost of the collection of revenue from customs, or rather the percentage of the cost as compared with the amount collected, showing a constant diminution of that percentage for the last few years. For 1887 it was 3.12 per cent., and for 1888 it is put at 2.98 per cent., even with this additional appropriation of $450,000. I did not anticipate that there would be required a detailed statement of these appropriations for this period. I can have it made up if the Senator desires to have entire accuracy in regard to this bill, and furnish later in the day a detailed statement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to see just how the amount is made up.

Mr. ALLISON. From a general knowledge of this subject, I am satisfied that these amounts have been constantly diminishing, while the expenses of collecting the revenue have been constantly increasing in amount.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Can the Senator at the same time put into his statement the total amount of increase of customs business? Naturally, with such an increase, if the force was not raised before, there might be expected to be an increase in the number of persons employed. Can he put into that statement figures showing the whole number of persons employed in the revenue service of every kind for the last ten years, year by year, so that we may see whether the force employed has kept pace with, or fallen behind, or outstretched the supposed increase of business?

Mr. ALLISON. I am afraid all that can not be obtained within a very short time. I ask that the bill may be considered as respects the other items at this time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well; let us pass over this point for the time being.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will proceed.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to have a general statement as to the causes of the increase in the cost of the collection of the revenue over any previous time, if such be the fact. If the cost of collection is in excess of what it has heretofore been, it might be the subject of inquiry; but I understand from the Senator from Iowa that the Secretary of the Treasury states that the cost is less now than it has been heretofore by percentages. Therefore I can see no reason for going into a list of the number of employés, etc. If the revenues are collected at a less cost than formerly, it ought to be satisfactory to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think, with great respect to my friend from Delaware, that that answer would precisely meet the whole of the case. If the revenues of the United States for the last year should have suddenly increased by, for illustration, $50,000,000, supposing the expenditures to have been $5,000,000 for collection and the expenses had risen by $1,000,000 when there were $50,000,000 more coming in, the percentage of cost would be less than it was before; but that would not prove at all that there was no extravagance in the administration of 1874—of course there has been none during this Administration; we all understand that; but as to the administration of 1874 it would not prove at all that they had not been extravagant in employing too many persons. The percentage argument, therefore, would be fallacious.

Mr. ALLISON. I am satisfied that for the last ten or twelve years there has been a constant increase in the amount of revenue, and therefore a constant diminution of the percentage of the cost of collecting it, because during all this time substantially the same force has been engaged. So I do not think that the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware will meet the suggestion made by the Senator from Vermont.

But I want to say another thing to the Senator from Delaware, that a permanent appropriation for the collection of our revenue from customs has existed for more than fifty years, and taking the amount collected since 1861 there has been a most marked diminution. Under the tariff of 1857 and under the tariff of 1846 it cost $4,000,000 per annum to collect the revenue, in round numbers, running along the same appropriation from year to year during all that period of time. However, I will furnish the Senator from Vermont and the Senate a full statement of the receipts from fines, penalties, and forfeitures, etc., and also a full statement of the cost from year to year since 1874, as I understand the Senator desires.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will proceed. The Chair understands the Senator from Iowa to ask that the reading be resumed at section 2.

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir; at line 16 of section 1.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment there proposed will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Committee on Appropriations report an amendment in section 1, to strike out the clause from line 16 to line 26, inclusive, as follows:

That section 3687 of the Revised Statutes, appropriating, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,750,000 for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs for each half year in addition to such sums as may be received from fines, penalties, and forfeitures connected with the customs, and from fees paid into the Treasury by customs officers, and from storage, cartage, drayage, labor, and services, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, to take effect from and after June 30, 1889.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] withdraws his objection to the consideration of the first section if the committee will furnish the detailed statement he called for in the nature of a report. We shall do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will proceed.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, at the end of section 3, to add to the bill:

Senate:

For contingent expenses for fiscal year 1888, namely: For postage stamps for the office of the Secretary of the Senate, $25.

For expenses of maintaining and equipping horses and mail-wagons for carrying the mails, $1,000.

For materials for folding, $2,000.

For folding speeches and pamphlets, at a rate not exceeding $1 per thousand, $4,000.

For fuel, oil, and cotton waste, and advertising for heating apparatus, $3,500.

For furniture and repairs of furniture, $3,000.

For miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor, $6,000.

For miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor, for fiscal year 1887, $920.37.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to add:

House of Representatives:

For contingent expenses for fiscal year 1888, namely: For materials for folding, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CULLOM. Pending that motion I ask the Senator to yield to me for a motion. I desire to move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield for that purpose?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] moves that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 409) for the relief of Thomas W. Lord was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. DANIEL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

INTERNATIONAL MARINE CONFERENCE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1851) providing for an international marine conference to secure greater safety for life and property at sea.

On motion of Mr. FRYE, it was

Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the said bill, and ask a conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. EDMUNDS, Mr. FRYE, and Mr. MORGAN.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After four hours and twenty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, May 28, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 25, 1888.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m., and was called to order by Mr. ROGERS, as Speaker pro tempore, who directed the reading of the following:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, May 25, 1888.

Hon. JOHN H. ROGERS, of Arkansas, is hereby designated to preside as Speaker pro tempore at the session of to-day.

JOHN G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

JOHN B. CLARK, Jr.,
Clerk of House of Representatives.

Prayer was offered by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

JUDICIAL EXPENSES IN UTAH.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimates of deficiencies in the appropriations for expenses of the United States courts and of Territorial courts in Utah; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

WAR CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House letters from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting copies of findings of fact in the cases of the following named claimants against the United States: W. M. Hawkins, Louisa Schrader, Harriet Jones, administratrix; Abner Lewis, James W. Allen, administrator, and Joshua Baker; which were severally referred to the Committee on War Claims.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted, as follows:

To Mr. SAWYER, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. DOUGHERTY, for one week, on account of important business.

BRIDGE ACROSS TENNESSEE RIVER.

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Speaker, yesterday morning, during my absence in the Committee on Elections, the bill (H. R. 7783) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River at or near Knoxville, Tenn., was laid before the House with certain amendments of the Senate, which were non-concurred in. As those amendments were merely formal, I move to reconsider the vote by which they were non-concurred in. I desire to have the amendments concurred in.

Mr. FORNEY. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered, but the call for the regular order prevents action upon that motion now. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. I have a privileged report.

Mr. FORNEY. Of course I do not desire to interfere with privileged reports.

IMPROVEMENT OF MOUTH OF BRAZOS RIVER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report sent to the desk by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEWART] will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors, having duly considered the bill referred to it entitled "A bill for the improvement of the mouth of Brazos River, in Texas," report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it lie on the table; and in lieu thereof they report a substitute, which accompanies this report, and recommend the passage of the substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On what ground does the gentleman from Texas claim that this is a privileged report?

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. It is a report from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, which has the right to report at any time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair this is not a privileged report.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas. I ask that, at any rate, the report be accepted. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] has given way for it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order has been demanded.

ELIZA WRIGHT OWEN.

Mr. HERMANN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. In the early part of yesterday's session, during my absence, the bill (S. 42) granting a pension to Eliza Wright Owen, which was returned from the Senate with a request for a conference as to certain House amendments, was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I now wish to inquire whether that was the proper course under the rules; whether a conference should not have been granted, as a matter of course, in accordance with the request of the Senate?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill took its regular course. If the gentleman had been present, he might have asked for a conference; but in his absence the bill was referred, in accordance with the usual parliamentary course.

Mr. HERMANN. Well, Mr. Speaker, if it be now in order, and if there be no objection, I will now ask, inasmuch as I was not present yesterday morning——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No request for unanimous consent is now in order, the regular order having been demanded. The regular order is the call of committees.

FILING OF REPORTS.

Mr. LANHAM. I ask unanimous consent that the call of committees for reports be dispensed with, and that gentlemen having reports to make may file them with the Clerk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the call of committees for reports will be dispensed with, and leave will be granted that reports of a private nature (this being Friday) may be filed with the Clerk for reference to the appropriate Calendars. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back adversely bills of the following titles; which were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 78) granting a pension to La Fayette Franklin; and

A bill (H. R. 8473) for the relief of Tarrell W. Young.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. THOMPSON, of California, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 2126) to pension Winemah Riddell; and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA AND SAMUEL STRONG.

Mr. GROUT, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back favorably the bill (S. 26) to arbitrate and settle the question at issue between the District of Columbia and Samuel Strong; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ALLARD & CROZIER.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10029) for the relief of Allard & Crozier; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

OBSTRUCTION TO NAVIGATION BROAD CREEK, DELAWARE.

Mr. PHELAN, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2123) to authorize the removal of an obstruction to the navigation of Broad Creek, in the State of Delaware; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LANHAM. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering business on the Private Calendar.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope that motion will not prevail. The contest to-day is between private business and the legislative appropriation bill. If this motion be voted down we can proceed with the appropriation bill.

Mr. LANHAM. This question is not debatable, I believe.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not wish to debate it further. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

The motion of Mr. LANHAM was rejected, there being—ayes 34, noes 58.

Mr. FORNEY. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I understand that under our rules we have a second morning hour, which has for some time past been persistently ignored. I would like to know whether it is not necessary to dispense with that before the motion of the gentleman from Alabama can be entertained.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no second hour on Friday.

The motion of Mr. FORNEY was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. BLOUNT in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9377) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. Of the time remaining for general debate the gentleman from Ohio has seven minutes and the gentleman from Alabama fifteen.

Mr. FORNEY. We do not wish any further debate, and I now ask that the bill be read by paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first paragraph of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full compensation for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, for the objects hereinafter expressed, namely.

Mr. NELSON. I make the point of order against so much of the clause contained in the fifth line of the paragraph just read as is expressed in the words "in full compensation." I make the point of order on the ground that it changes existing law.

There are several items of appropriation in this bill, as I understand, that lessen the salaries paid to public officials by existing law; and the result of the adoption of the words to which I have called attention would fix the compensation of these officials at a different rate than that provided by the existing law wherever the salary is cut down by this bill. The words to which I have referred, therefore, I think should be stricken out, and against them I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be that the point of order to which the gentleman refers would be applicable to certain paragraphs of the bill as they are reached, where the changes to which he refers in salary are made. When such paragraphs are reached the gentleman can interpose the point of order, and the Chair will rule upon it.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to say a word in this connection. It is due to this House to say that the effect of the point of order, if sustained, would be to involve the Government probably in a great number of lawsuits, to the extent perhaps of two hundred or more, and involve seventy-odd thousand dollars. If the gentleman from Minnesota takes the responsibility in that connection, I do not know that I have any reason to complain of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has made no ruling as yet upon the point of order submitted.

Mr. RANDALL. It is the existing law to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has stated that it may be as the paragraphs of the bill are reached the point of order would be applicable to them where salaries are changed.

The Clerk read as follows:

For mileage of Senators, $33,000.

For compensation of the officers, clerks, messengers, and others in the service of the Senate, $370,308.80, namely.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of inquiring whether in this paragraph the item of appropriation is included for the compensation of clerks to Senators?

Mr. FORNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Then we are not to have the farce of last year repeated?

Mr. FORNEY. The gentleman can move to strike it out if he so desires.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of secretary: For Secretary of the Senate, $5,000, including compensation as disbursing officer of the contingent fund of the Senate, and for compensation as disbursing officer of salaries of Senators, $250; hire of horse and wagon for the Secretary's office, $700, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. TAULBEE. I desire to inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill whether or not the amount appropriated here for hire of horse and wagon for the Secretary's office, $700, "or so much thereof as may be necessary," is in the customary form. I believe in the appropriation bills generally the words "or so much thereof as may be necessary" for this item have not been heretofore used. If the committee have assurances that the amount appropriated in the bill is sufficient for the service, I think the proviso is proper; otherwise it is not proper, for the reason that it might impair the service, unless the officer will agree to do the work for the amount in gross. The item as embodied here will require an itemized account.

Mr. FORNEY. The bill makes provision, as the gentleman will observe, for the expenses of the Senate for the approaching short session. The committee are satisfied that the amount appropriated will be sufficient after conference with this officer.

Mr. RANDALL. And heretofore no vouchers have been presented for this service.

Mr. TAULBEE. I only desired to know the facts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Document-room: For superintendent of the document-room (Amzi Smith), $3,000; two assistants in document-room, at $1,440 each; one clerk to superintendent of document-room, $1,440; one page in document-room, $960; in all, $8,220.

Mr. TAULBEE. I would like to inquire the object of the committee in inserting the name of the official in charge of the document-room at this point?

Mr. FORNEY. The Senate insist upon it, and have for seven or eight years past. He is an old and trusted employé, whose services they consider indispensable. If stricken out here it will be inserted in the Senate and insisted upon as an amendment to the bill.

Mr. TAULBEE. I move to strike it out, and I desire to make a few observations in that connection.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman can make the point of order upon it.

Mr. TAULBEE. I do make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is now too late to interpose the point of order.

Mr. TAULBEE. I have, of course, the utmost respect for the opinion of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman had engaged in a colloquy with the gentleman from Alabama before submitting the question of order.

Mr. TAULBEE. I thought I had simply inquired the object of the provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order is too late; but, unless there be objection, will hear the gentleman briefly upon it. The only object of the Chair is to facilitate the consideration of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to going back.

Mr. TAULBEE. Then I move to strike out the name of the official, and in that connection desire to offer these brief observations.

I do not regard the services of any man as indispensable for the proper execution of any public office in this country. I do not think that we ought in this case or in any other case to fasten upon the service of the country any one particular man, for the reason that he might, after the passage of the bill, for instance, prove incompetent by sickness or from any other cause, and that would certainly embarrass the disbursing officer of this fund. I do not understand that the services of any man are indispensable to the execution of the duties of any particular office. I do not believe there is any man in this country who is alone competent to discharge the functions of any public office under our system.

This is a system of favoritism which has been carried on both in the Senate and in the House of Representatives for a number of years. I think it is time we were dispensing with such foolishness, if I may be indulged in that expression. I do not wish to be unparliamentary in my language in regard to the committee or disrespectful to them; but I think every man ought to stand on an equal footing in the matter of office-holding in this country. I believe this is a system of civil-service reform which goes beyond any theory which has been advocated by the most sanguine adherent of that system; and I think we ought to quit this way of doing things and strike this name out of this bill. If the officer who has control of this appointment sees proper to retain this man I have nothing to say; but I think it ought to be left optional with the heads of Departments and bureaus who are held responsible for the duties of their officers to select their own appointees.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Kentucky may be entirely right as to what is the proper rule in this matter. Nevertheless the Senate has always claimed the absolute right to resist the least interference with the manner of payment, the amount of payment, and the number of employés in that body. It is idle to strike this out for it will be inserted by the Senate, as has been the case for years, as stated by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY].

Mr. TAULBEE. May I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAULBEE. Has the gentleman from Pennsylvania any assurance that the present Senate insists on the retention of this name in the appropriation bill?

Mr. RANDALL. I have. The Senate is composed mostly of the same members, and so far as I know will take the same course in the future as in the past. I know their character for sufferance—I say that with all respect to the Senate.

Mr. TAULBEE. I believe, even if it is true that the Senate will insist on this, the House should not assume the responsibility in anticipation of the action of the Senate with reference to a matter so flagrant as this, in contradiction to every theory which the gentleman from Pennsylvania would dare to advocate on this floor or before the country.

The question being taken on Mr. TAULBEE'S amendment, the Chairman stated that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. TAULBEE. I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 10, noes 49.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Capitol police:

For one captain, $1,600; three lieutenants, $1,200; twenty-two privates, $1,100 each; and eight watchmen, at $900 each; in all, $36,600, one half to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate and the other half to be disbursed by the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Mr. TAULBEE. I wish to inquire if the present salaries of the watchmen of the Capitol police are fixed by law?

Mr. RANDALL. In reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, I will say that all salaries of employés connected with the House and Senate are fixed by the appropriation act.

Mr. TAULBEE. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move to amend this section by striking out in line 21, "$900" and inserting "$1,000."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph under the heading "House of Representatives."

For mileage, $110,624.

Mr. TAULBEE. I move to amend by inserting, after the word "dollars," in line 11, the words "or so much thereof as may be necessary for actual necessary traveling expenses."

Mr. FORNEY. I make the point of order that there is no law providing for the proposition in this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Office of the Clerk: For Clerk of the House of Representatives, including compensation as disbursing officer of the contingent fund, $5,000; and for hire of horses and wagons and cartage for the use of Clerk's office, $700, or so much thereof as may be necessary; for Chief Clerk, Journal Clerk, and two reading clerks, at $3,600 each, and for the journal clerk for preparing Digest of the Rules, $1,000 per annum; tally clerk, $3,000; for printing and bill clerk, and disbursing clerk, at $2,500 each; for file clerk, and enrolling clerk, at $2,250 each; for assistant disbursing clerk, assistant enrolling clerk, resolution and petition clerk, newspaper clerk, index clerk, superintendent of document-room, and librarian, at $2,000 each; for distributing clerk, stationery clerk, and two assistant librarians, at $1,800 each; for one book-keeper and seven clerks, including three clerks to index private claims, at $1,600 each; for document clerk and locksmith, at $1,440 each; two messengers in the House library, at $1,314 each; one telegraph operator, one assistant to the file clerk, and two laborers in Clerk's document-room, at $900 each; one page, one laborer in bath-room, and four laborers, at $720 each; one assistant journal clerk, at $6 per day during the session, $726; one assistant index clerk, during the session and three months after its close, two hundred and eleven days, at $6 per day, $1,266; one messenger-boy in chief clerk's room, $300; in all, $83,320.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 21 insert the following: "Messenger to the Speaker, $1,000."

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. In speaking to this amendment I desire to say just a word. This relates to the pay of the messenger who attends uniformly at the Speaker's room. The messenger there at present is merely a laborer who is detailed to that service, and, unlike other messengers, has other duties to perform. It is customary to make a small appropriation each year in the deficiency bill to supplement the laborer's pay of this messenger. But the Speaker believes that his messenger ought to be put upon a proper footing. He desires to have this messenger specially assigned to his room. The amount stated in my amendment is the proper and usual pay of messengers. Of course where the service is necessary this ought to be provided for as it is in every other instance.

Mr. FORNEY. We have allowed for thirty-two messengers, and given the Speaker a clerk at $1,600. We do not think any provision ought to be made for any additional messenger.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. That list does not include a messenger for the Speaker's room. If the gentleman has allowed for too many messengers in this bill, he ought to cut the number down. This is not one of those thirty-two messengers.

Mr. FORNEY. We think that thirty-two messengers are sufficient.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. If the gentleman has given too many laborers or too many messengers, let him cut the number down, but he should not cut off from the Speaker's room a messenger who is necessary for the transaction of our business. There can be no reason why we should not provide for this messenger, unless it be that he is a messenger for the Speaker's room or for some other reason that I can not imagine.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Chairman, I am entirely in accord with the sentiments expressed by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE]. I find in the Departments of this Government this state of facts existing: That persons are found working at desks alongside of each other, performing precisely the same work, some of them being paid $1,600 a year and others as low as $900, some of them even less than that; and the prevailing rule seems to be that those who get the most pay do the least work. Now, none of us believe that that is right. I believe that in the public service, as in private employments, individuals ought to be paid in accordance with the kind and amount of the work which they perform, and I know of no better way to impress the Departments of the Government with the sentiments of Congress in that respect than by conforming to it ourselves. I find that in the service of this House there are persons who are carried on the pay-rolls as laborers and are assigned to duty as messengers. Now, if it be a fact that the duty of a messenger is more onerous than the duty of a laborer and that a messenger is entitled to greater compensation than a laborer, then I see no reason why a person should be borne on the rolls as a laborer and assigned to duty as a messenger.

If, on the other hand, the duties of a messenger are not so difficult as those of a laborer, or that they are not entitled to more pay, then certainly we ought to reduce the compensation of the messengers. Now, in this case, the messenger to the Speaker's room is carried on the rolls as a laborer, and if his services are not found to be necessary among the laborers, then I say we ought to reduce the number of laborers, and put him on the roll as a messenger and give him a messenger's pay. I think it is time for this House to set an example in this matter and to conform to what we all concede to be the proper rule for the Departments. I hope the amendment will be adopted, and also that another amendment will be adopted reducing the number of laborers by one.

Mr. HOLMAN. A single word, Mr. Chairman. Of course, the committee would respect the views of the Speaker of the House in regard to the number of persons necessary to be employed in connection with the discharge of the duties of his office; but I do not understand that the Speaker himself recommends this, else I take it for granted that it would have been inserted by the Committee on Appropriations. But, sir, I wish to call attention to the fact that at the very threshold of the appropriations for the House of Representatives we are beginning to increase the compensation and the number of employés. Already the bill contains an additional clerk for the Speaker. He now has two. Over the existing law for the current year there is an increase of one clerk at $1,600, and it is now proposed to add another clerk at $1,000. The suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE], that the laborer's roll be decreased by one, I predict will not be carried out.

The number of employés will not be reduced. I wish it could be, but I do not indulge that hope. This is simply a proposition to add another to the list of the employés of this House. I have no doubt that the House was surprised to hear the statement made a few days ago by a gentleman on the other side as to the number of persons employed at the several doors of this Chamber. That the number of employés of the House is beyond the wants of the public service is too obvious, and I do not believe that the Speaker of the House would desire to see the number increased.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the person in question is now borne upon the rolls as a laborer, and that this is simply a proposition to transfer him to the messengers' roll.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is not the proposition.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. That is the fact.

Mr. BURROWS. I understand that that is the case, and that this is merely a proposition to change this man from one roll to another.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] propose to reduce the number of laborers?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Of course it ought to be done if there are too many of them; but we are not at that part of the bill now.

Mr. HOLMAN. But does the gentleman propose to move that amendment?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I leave that to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY], who has charge of the bill. I will certainly vote for it if he thinks there are too many laborers. I have not looked into the subject myself.

Mr. BURROWS. This amendment simply proposes to change this messenger from the laborers' to the messengers' roll—and certainly the Speaker of this House ought to be provided with a regular messenger.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] says he does not think the Speaker desires this. Of course I would not offer an amendment of this kind without asking the Speaker if he did desire it, and when the amendment was sent to me by his private secretary I did ask him and he said that he did wish this change made.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, under the present arrangement every year when the deficiency bill comes up we pay this same "laborer" $300 extra for messenger work; so that it simply resolves itself into making two bites of one cherry. If you are going to have this man do messenger work the practical business way is to pay him as a messenger and put him on the roll of messengers.

Mr. RANDALL. In fact, this does not involve an increase of this man's pay. He has served for many years in the capacity of messenger under Speakers of both political parties. He is a valuable man, and I do not know that the committee object to giving him adequate compensation, whatever the House may think to be right. But if this is to be done and this position as messenger is to be made a permanent one, there ought to be a decrease in the number of laborers; and for one I would prefer to have it understood now that such a decrease shall be made.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Of course the bill ought to be made harmonious in that respect; I presume the committee will take care of that matter. As has been remarked, the effect of this amendment is simply to give this man the same amount of money that we have in fact been voting him annually heretofore.

Mr. PETERS. I understand that this man is now on the laborers' roll at the regular rate of laborers' compensation; but that we are in the habit of giving him in the annual deficiency bill the difference between a laborer's pay and that which he would receive as a messenger. If that is the case, why not provide for the compensation in this bill at $1,000, the amount which he is actually paid each year?

Mr. RANDALL. He now performs laborer's work in addition to serving as messenger. The effect of this proposition may be to relieve him from his duty as a laborer.

The amendment of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, was agreed to.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I ask that the aggregate sum named at the close of the paragraph be increased to conform to the amendment just adopted.

Mr. FORNEY. It is the business of the Clerk to make corrections of that kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The change suggested by the gentleman from Arkansas will be made.

The Clerk read as follows:

For Chaplain of the House, $900.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I move to amend the clause just read by striking out "$900" and inserting "$1,000." I do not think this proposition needs any discussion. Gentlemen of the House who know the circumstances in which our Chaplain is situated, and his disability, must realize the propriety of increasing the present salary of $900 to $1,000. I hope this increase will be granted without any hesitation.

Mr. SPRINGER. Make it $1,200.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. At the suggestion of the gentleman on the other side [Mr. SPRINGER] I modify my amendment so as to make the salary $1,200. I think that is what it ought to be, and it is the amount which I originally intended to propose.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think it ought to be $1,200.

Mr. CANNON. Why not make it $1,500?

A MEMBER. Why not $2,000?

Another MEMBER. Because we can get all the prayers we require for $1,200.

Mr. SPRINGER. The salary was fixed at $900 with the idea that Congress should always employ some clergyman having a congregation in this city. This is entirely a religious question, and I hope gentlemen will look at it in the light which becomes us. We have now the benefit of the services of a most able and excellent gentleman as Chaplain, one who is an honor to this House and to the profession which he has adopted. I hope the House will not hesitate to make the salary adequate to the position.

It is well known to members that during the last winter our present Chaplain suffered great affliction by reason of long sickness, which entailed upon him large and unexpected expenses. He is now quite advanced in years, and may not be able to be with us very much longer. I think we should feel it our duty to give him at least the compensation which is now proposed.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to say only a word. When my colleague [Mr. SPRINGER] undertakes to do something religious I do not think we should interpose any obstruction. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly not.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I am heartily in favor of this increase, both because I think it right in itself and also because of the high character of the gentleman who is now acting as our Chaplain. But I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois, who has been here longer than most of us, how it happens that this salary has thus far been only $900. There must have been some reason for it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I stated that the salary had been fixed at that amount in the expectation that we should employ as Chaplain some clergyman having a congregation in this city, this sum being merely an addition to his regular salary. The effect has been generally to compel the House to make a selection under that restriction. But our present Chaplain has no congregation here; he is entirely dependent upon his compensation from Congress and upon the lectures which he delivers in vacation.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Is it understood that we are to pay this increase because of the increased necessity for prayer?

Mr. SPRINGER. There is a great necessity for it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. An increased necessity?

Mr. SPRINGER. Gentlemen have no idea of the great power required to bring salvation to such a body as this.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I wish to inquire whether, if this increase be now agreed to, the salary will continue at the increased rate hereafter when there may be some other Chaplain.

Mr. FORNEY. I admit that we have a most excellent Chaplain; but the salary for this officer for the last twenty-five years has been $900.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have not got through with my statement. I am trying to find out whether this amendment if adopted will operate as a permanent increase of the Chaplain's salary——

Several MEMBERS. Of course.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Or will it only continue for the year to which the bill applies?

Mr. SPRINGER. It can be fixed every year.

Mr. STRUBLE. But never decreased.

Mr. GROSVENOR. My own expectation is that the next House of Representatives will not require as much praying as this.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then we will let you select your own Chaplain and pay him out of your own pockets. It will not require much to pay for the services he will render. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORNEY. This salary has been $900 for the last twenty-five years. Now, if we increase the salary you must bear in mind that the increase will apply to the short session which is coming. We give now $900 for the four months, and I think that is a good salary. This bill only provides for the short session—four months.

Mr. HOLMAN. Three months really.

Mr. FORNEY. And he gets over $200 a month. That we regard as fair compensation.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will be adopted, as I think it is a very proper one. It can not be expected that we can secure the services of a Chaplain of great ability for a compensation of $900 a year. Chaplains in ordinary churches do not get less than from $1,500 to $5,000 a year.

Mr. STRUBLE. Does the gentleman regard it as essential that the Chaplain of this House should be a man of very great ability?

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. It is just as proper that we should have a Chaplain of ability for the House of Representatives as for a church; probably more so. I do not see why we should not secure the services of a thoroughly able man.

Both sides will be better for having a sufficient appropriation for the purpose of securing the prayers of a competent person, and of course if they do not do any good they will not do any harm.

Mr. STRUBLE. I quite agree with the gentleman that it is proper to have a Chaplain; the only question, as I understand the gentleman's position, is whether the man who is to be employed for that service is to be able to make acceptable prayers.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. Well, it would certainly be better to have a man who was capable of doing so; and I think $900 is not sufficient to secure the services of a man of much ability to fill the position. Besides that, we should remember that if the Chaplain is to be here, as is usually the case during the session, four, or five, or six days in the week, that his duties in that connection will be as great in the aggregate as the duties of a preacher who attends church only once a week. I would be in favor of increasing the amount above the $1,200 proposed, but as that has been suggested I hope it will be adopted. The Chaplain that we have is most worthy of this advance, and needs it very much in consequence of his recent sickness.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. In answer to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. STRUBLE] I desire to say that I had a good deal to do with schools in my day, and my experience has shown that it always takes a higher order of ability to deal with an immature mind than is usually supposed. Applying that rule to this House, I think it is necessary that the Chaplain should be a man of considerable ability. [Laughter.]

Mr. STRUBLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out something, for the purpose of saying a word. [Laughter.]

I have no intention or desire of being understood as opposing a proper compensation to be paid to the Chaplain of the House; and I will concede what my friend from Indiana says, and agree with him, that the present gentleman who is officiating as Chaplain is in a condition to be entitled to our sympathy. I sympathize with him most deeply and appreciate his ability as Chaplain of the House. He is not only a man of intelligence, ability, and great learning, but a man of very great eloquence, and a man who is concise and of great brevity in his prayers. [Laughter.] I use the term to indicate conciseness of expression. He is conscientious in the discharge of his duty, and if I were called upon to vote personally for the benefit of the Chaplain of the House I would feel like voting an increase to this gentleman of from $1,200 to $1,500. But while he is the present occupant of that position, it is not unreasonable to suppose that the time will come when there will be a change, and possibly a man of less ability and better able to get along with a lower salary will be appointed.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. And with a different religion.

Mr. STRUBLE. I do not say that. I do not think it is a matter that has any bearing upon this question; but I think it is well to continue the old rule for the present.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I know that all gentlemen in this House appreciate the qualities of the present Chaplain, and if we were not legislating on a great appropriation bill and at the very threshold of the bill, but were permitted to do what our own feelings would prompt, as a matter of favoritism, there would be little question that the proposition to increase this salary would meet with favor. But I know that a gentleman of the high character of the Chaplain of the House would not consent that members of this body should forget their duties to the country in the way of granting this increase as a matter of favoritism to him, and I do not believe that the constituency of my friend from Illinois would consent that at the very threshold of this great bill, carrying almost all the salaries of the Government, this departure should be made which will lay the foundation for a wide increase of all the salaries covered by the bill.

This salary has remained at the present rate for more than twenty-five years. It has always been satisfactory, and the office has always been filled by gentlemen of high standing and character. I hope that the House will not begin here at the threshold of this bill, according to the feelings of gentlemen and their sympathies, to increase a salary which is now high enough. The salaries of the employés of this House are all far beyond the average salaries paid in this country at the present time. Besides that, this appropriation is but for three months. Three hundred dollars a month is a pretty high salary, as carried by this bill, and yet it is proposed to increase it. As the appropriation stands in the bill the Chaplain will receive $10 a day for every day he renders any service to the House. I hope the increase, then, will not be made, but I do hope that if the committee determine to increase this salary or any other, it will provide that the increase shall be confined to the time during which the office shall be held by the present incumbent.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to say just one word in reply to my friend from Indiana. I am willing to take the responsibility before my constituents of voting the sum of money that is necessary for a proper salary to the Chaplain. I know the council of Jacksonville, Ill., if they wanted a chaplain, would be willing to pay him the necessary salary.

Mr. STRUBLE. Is that a Democratic town?

Mr. SPRINGER. No; it is largely Republican.

Mr. TAULBEE. Could you get a competent chaplain for that money?

Mr. SPRINGER. They would be willing, I feel assured, to pay for the services of a man so competent as this gentleman a salary on which he could live. There is no danger of setting a wrong precedent. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that what relates to this office can not relate to any other. There is no other blind man led here every morning to perform his duties. It is an exceptional case. There never will be another, and I hope this will not be made a precedent. It will not be, and gentlemen need not be so afraid of increasing the salaries paid by this Government. The increase of $300 will not hurt you, and it will be a great benefit to him.

Mr. DOCKERY. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. I understood the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] to say that this salary has been fixed at $900 for the last half a century.

Mr. RANDALL. It was so fixed in 1871; and it was always the same before that year, so far as we know.

Mr. DOCKERY. And this is a proposition to increase the salary?

Mr. SPRINGER. The reason is that hitherto we have been employing clergymen who had charges in this city, and the salary we voted was in addition to the compensation the clergyman received as the pastor of his church. But in this instance we have selected a man who had no other duty.

Mr. OATES. Then do you put this proposed increase of salary on the ground of mere charity?

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir; I hold it is the duty of this House to provide itself with a Chaplain. The clergyman selected, although not participating in the deliberations of the House, must be here every day to perform the duty for which he is appointed. And if we require the service of a Chaplain we should pay him for that service. He must be here all the time. He can not go off on a lecturing tour; he can not visit his home in Illinois; he must be here; and for that reason he ought to be properly paid.

Mr. OATES. If it is a mere charity, let us put our hands in our own pockets and make up this amount.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is not a mere charity. There are many gentlemen in this city who would like to have this place at half the salary. We wanted a man of ability; we got him, and we are willing to pay him.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to make this remark, that the Chaplain has never appeared before the Committee on Appropriations by letter or in person to ask an increase of salary.

Mr. SPRINGER. He has never asked me either to propose this increase. He is too modest to do so. I rest his case on his merits.

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROGERS. We have too much disorder.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's point of order is well taken. The Chair asks gentlemen to aid in preserving order.

Mr. FORNEY. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] asked if the salary of the Chaplain had not been $900 for the last fifty years. I will state to the gentleman that the appropriation act for 1871 fixed the salary of the Chaplain of the House at $900; and I presume that was the salary for a number of years prior to that. I may remark also that this is a salary given in a certain sense for a period of four months. There is a law which permits the Chaplain to draw the whole amount of his salary after four months' service.

Mr. KERR. I dislike to make any objection to this proposed increase of salary, because I know the great worth of the gentleman who is our Chaplain. He has been known for nearly half a century as one of the most worthy men in this country. But I do not think the service he has to perform is such as to require a compensation more than has been hitherto allowed.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has shown a commendable interest in the Chaplain. I suppose he is a resident of that gentleman's district, and I do not wonder at his interest in his behalf. But we can not have chaplains from all of our districts, and I am a little surprised that the gentleman from Illinois, with all his professions with regard for economy, should go so far as to press this claim simply because the gentleman who is our Chaplain is a former constituent of his, a former resident of his district.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I offered this amendment without reference to the gentleman from Illinois. I had no conversation with him or with anybody else in regard to it. But when I saw in this bill that the Chaplain was only receiving a salary of $900 I was very much astonished. I do not think it is creditable to this House to give to the Chaplain such a salary. When gentlemen desire to practice economy with an overflowing Treasury, the surplus in which threatens to imperil the business interests of the country, I think the place to begin is not with the salary of the blind Chaplain. I think it ought to be $1,200. The Speaker's messenger is paid $1,000, and there are messengers in all the Departments of the Government getting from $1,000 to $1,500, and certainly I think $1,200 is not too much to pay our Chaplain.

Mr. KERR. Has there been any proposition to return to the principles of economy in regard to any of the offices? Has not the tendency been rather in the other direction?

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. That does not make any difference. The argument is all the more against the gentleman. If we have not heretofore begun to practice economy that is no reason why we should begin here and now. This gentleman lives in a distant State; he receives no mileage; he is required to be here day after day; and I say it is a wrong, a hardship, an injustice, to ask him, in view of his services, to receive a less sum than $1,200. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR, and there were—ayes 72, noes 72.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint to act as tellers the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY].

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 81, noes 82.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I move to strike out the words "nine hundred" and insert "eleven hundred."

The question was taken on the amendment, and the Chairman declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 27, noes 65.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint to act as tellers the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY].

The tellers took their places, but before the count was completed,

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR said: Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw the point of no quorum and move that the amount be made $1,000. That was my original motion.

The CHAIRMAN. What motion does the gentleman make?

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I modify my motion so as to strike out "nine hundred" and insert "one thousand."

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR, and the Chairman declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 47, noes 70.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order having been made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint to act as tellers the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY].

The committee divided, but before the count was completed Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR withdrew the point of no quorum.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Clerk: For Clerk of the House of Representatives, including compensation as disbursing officer of the contingent fund, $5,000; and for hire of horses and wagons and cartage for the use of the Clerk's office, $700, or so much thereof as may be necessary; for Chief Clerk, Journal Clerk, and two reading clerks, at $3,600 each, and for the Journal clerk for preparing Digest of the Rules, $1,000 per annum; tally clerk, $3,000; for printing and bill clerk, and disbursing clerk, at $2,500 each; for file clerk and enrolling clerk, at $2,250 each; for assistant disbursing clerk, assistant enrolling clerk, resolution and petition clerk, newspaper clerk, index clerk, superintendent of document-room, and librarian, at $2,000 each; for distributing clerk, stationery clerk, and two assistant librarians, at $1,800 each; for one book-keeper and seven clerks, including three clerks to index private claims, at $1,600 each; for document clerk and locksmith, at $1,440 each; two messengers in the House library, at $1,314 each; one telegraph operator, one assistant to the file clerk, and two laborers in Clerk's document-room, at $900 each; one page, one laborer in the bath-room, and four laborers, at $720 each; one assistant Journal clerk, at $6——

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend on page 10, line 5, by striking out "for the Journal Clerk," and inserting "for a clerk to be designated by the Speaker."

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] has an amendment which comes in before that, and which I would like to have taken in connection with the prior paragraph.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I send up an amendment which I desire to offer.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 25, page 10, and in lines 1 and 2, page 11, strike out the words "at six dollars per day during the session, seven hundred and twenty-six dollars," and insert in lieu thereof the words "at eighteen hundred dollars."

Mr. HOLMAN. If that is subject to the point of order, I wish to reserve the point.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I am as much opposed as the most economical member of this House to tolerating an increase of salary in any case where the purpose or the effect is to give additional pay for work which can be properly done at the compensation heretofore provided in appropriation bills of this character, and I would not have offered the amendment were it not that it seems to be conceded that the amount paid the assistant Journal clerk is entirely out of proportion to the work and responsibility which attaches to the position.

In the Forty-third Congress the salary of this official was $3,000. In that Congress 5,050 bills were introduced and 711 reports made thereon; in all, 5,761. In the Forty-seventh Congress 8,055 bills were introduced and 2,044 reports were submitted; in all, 10,099. In the Forty-eighth Congress the bills increased to 8,637 and reports 2,692, in all 11,329. In the Forty-ninth Congress 11,510 bills were introduced and reports were made upon 4,181 of said bills; in all, 15,691. It will therefore be observed that the keeping of the Journal in the Forty-ninth Congress involved three times the labor that was required in the Forty-third Congress. In this Congress we have already introduced 10,066 bills, and the reports some days ago numbered 2,217.

I mention these facts to show the increase of the work connected with the Journal, and the absolute necessity of employing a clerk of the highest capability. I have just consulted with the distinguished chairman of the committee, and also with the gentleman [Mr. FORNEY] who has charge of the bill, and I feel authorized to say that they fully recognize the inadequacy of this official's compensation. After the bill now being considered was reported to the House, General Clark, our efficient clerk, addressed a letter to the committee, a paragraph of which I will read:

The bill recently reported from your committee provides for an assistant Journal Clerk, to be paid at a rate which, in my opinion, is entirely inadequate to the character and amount of work performed.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I still reserve my point of order.

Mr. ROGERS obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. WHEELER.

Mr. WHEELER. I thank the gentleman from Arkansas for his courtesy in giving me time to explain the necessity for the amendment.

The Clerk of the House, with the experience of three Congresses as Clerk and double that number as a Member, gives his views upon this subject very clearly. In his letter to the Appropriation Committee he says:

I take this method of suggesting that the time has come when the rapid increase of the public business requires a higher rate of compensation than that provided in the bill.

If General Clark is right in this, and I believe the Committee on Appropriations do not question his opinion on this subject, it seems that now is the time to rectify what really appears to have been an inadvertence in the preparation of the bill. I will read further from the letter. General Clark says:

The position is one of great responsibility and labor, requiring the utmost accuracy and detail, and many hours of writing, a great deal of which must necessarily be performed after the adjournment of the House.

The Journal often reaches from forty to sixty pages of manuscript, nearly all of which is prepared by the assistant Journal clerk, the time of the Journal Clerk being constantly required upon the floor of the House.

This work has to be done by one man. It is a character of work which admits of no delay, and must be done with the most scrupulous accuracy.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. If this salary should not be increased, is there any danger that the gentleman who now occupies the position will resign? [Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER. In reply to my friend who makes this inquiry I would state that I am informed that the gentleman who now performs the duty of assistant Journal clerk has been induced to remain by assurances that all proper efforts would be made to secure the permanent salary which is embodied in the pending amendment. We are credibly informed that the pay as appropriated by the bill as it now stands will not retain in our service that experience and capability the person intrusted with this important duty should possess.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina. I can bring a man here who will be glad to do the work for the present pay.

Mr. WHEELER. I will bet that the man my friend refers to can not do it. [Laughter.] We can get plenty of men who will come here and accept the position and go through the form, but I beg to assure the gentleman from North Carolina that although his friend may be a most excellent and capable gentleman he might fall far short of compassing the work which attaches to this position.

The letter which I hold in my hand gives us some information on this point. In speaking further on the duties of the assistant Journal clerk, it says:

The duties require not only the exercise of intelligence, but also experience on the part of the clerk, and unless an increase is made the probability is that frequent changes will have to be made, to the great detriment of the public service.

It has also been urged with some force that this position should be provided with a fixed salary, as the incumbent is required to do considerable work after Congress adjourns, which is not the case, so far as I can learn, with others, who, like the assistant Journal clerk, are on the session's roll.

I can not do better than to read General Clark's words. He says:

After the adjournment of Congress much time is required in putting in order the large amount of business incident to the closing days of the session, such as verifying the reports of conference committees, reading and correcting proof, preparing the points of order for insertion at the end of the printed Journal, preparing the manuscript Journal for the binding, etc.

We must keep the Journal of the House in capable and experienced hands. There must be no doubt or question to the verity of the proceedings as recorded in the Journal of the House; a mistake, particularly at the close of the session, might become a matter of most serious consequence. Intelligence and capability are indispensable, and experience should be added when attainable.

I do not care to give this matter any more extended discussion.

Mr. HOLMAN. I still reserve my point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, as we are likely to be flooded with amendments touching the compensation of House employés, I wish to speak generally on that point now. I know how difficult it is to resist the applications of those who are daily associated with us in the public employ. I experience this perhaps as much as any other member of the House, for I can say truthfully that I have been the recipient of as much courtesy from officers here as can possibly have been the case with any other member, and I feel the obligation on my part thus created. But I think in matters of this kind we ought not to be governed by friendship or sentiment.

Now, I wish to state the fact that the cost of the service of the employés in the English House of Commons is but one-half what this House pays its employés.

A MEMBER. "Cheap foreign labor!"

Mr. RANDALL. In other words, while the amount paid by the House of Commons of Great Britain is $240,000, we pay for similar service $510,000; yet the membership of the House of Commons is double in numbers that of this House. I only mention this under a supposition that perhaps "Jeffersonian simplicity" may have some lodgment in the minds of members as contrasted with the demands of royalty.

Mr. SPRINGER. Jefferson was opposed to royalty, and it was through his efforts, with those of others, that we separated from Great Britain. And I hope we shall never get back to British standards in questions of government.

Mr. RANDALL. As to the matter immediately under consideration, the committee read and carefully considered the letter of the Clerk of the House, and were rather disposed to adopt some equalization between the salary of the Journal Clerk and the compensation of his assistant. The Journal Clerk's compensation is $4,600—within $400 of what a member of this House receives. That includes, of course, $1,000 for the preparation of the digest. The young man who is now acting as assistant Journal clerk receives upon an average, $1,100 annually. I believe if the committee had felt called upon to make a change some of us, at least, would have agreed to raise the salary of the assistant and reduce that of the Journal Clerk. I do not believe we should increase the aggregate now paid for the work in connection with the Journal. Five thousand six hundred dollars or $5,700 is a very large amount of money to be paid for journalizing the proceedings of this House. The work of the assistant Journal clerk, I am free to say, is about as arduous, though it may not be so responsible, as that of the Journal Clerk. The latter officer, if I understand correctly, does that portion of the service which is open to our observation here in the House, while the assistant Journal clerk, after the daily adjournment, makes up the Journal in the form to be read the next morning. I do not hesitate to say that, in my judgment, this young man who is acting as assistant Journal clerk receives too little pay, while I believe the compensation of the Journal Clerk, including its different forms of payment, is too large.

If I should be allowed to move an amendment to the amendment to reduce the Journal Clerk what we increase the other, I believe it would meet the justice of the case and be fair play all round.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to present the point of order I have raised. I do it under the third clause of Rule XXI of the House. It is not pretended, Mr. Chairman, this employé is provided for by any general law. The employment is provided for on an appropriation bill, and has been since the office was created. So there is no law on the subject except the law of the appropriation bill, the law of the current year. In view of that fact I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the language of the third clause of the twenty-first rule:

3. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

I think the Chair has uniformly held the terms "except for public works and objects already in progress"—that those terms have no relation to the employés of the House. So the whole objection turns on the first clause of this paragraph:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law.

If there is any law it is the law of the current year. There can not be any other law. There is no other law. It seems to me to be impossible to rule this expenditure is authorized by law, inasmuch as the only law in force makes a different provision for compensating this employé of the House. The proposition is so clear it is not necessary to discuss it, and it seems to me that a mere statement of the question is sufficient.

Mr. WHEELER. I hardly think it is necessary to make any reply to the position taken upon the point of order by my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]. There is no law fixing the salary of assistant Journal clerk. The authority for his appointment, and the authority for appropriations to pay his salary come to us by virtue of the constitutional provision in reference to the House of Representatives, and that necessarily involves the right on the part of the House to employ such clerical force as Congress in its wisdom may find necessary for its proper organization and the efficient conduct of its business.

I understand that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] relies upon section 3 of Rule XXI, which I will read:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriation for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

The amendment is not obnoxious to the first part of the rule I have read. The law does not provide any salary for this official, and if an amendment is not in order fixing a salary, then with equal force the section in the bill sought to be amended would also be subject to a point of order, because it is just as much a violation of the rule to report a bill for an expenditure not previously authorized by law as it is to lodge an amendment for such an expenditure. This shows that section 3 does not at all apply to this class of cases.

The language which follows sustains this view. It clearly indicates that the first part of the clause refers to public works and for expenditures of that character. But the gentleman says that the appropriation bill which provided the salaries of the officers for this current year is the law, and that there can not be any other law in this matter, and therefore he insists that to change the amount from that appropriated for this current year would be a change of existing law. Suppose we had failed to pass an appropriation bill for this current year, then, according to the position assumed there would be no law authorizing any appropriations whatever for assistant Journal clerk, and therefore we could be inhibited from making any appropriation for this purpose.

It seems to me this shows that the amendment should be allowed and the point of order overruled.

Mr. TARSNEY. Mr. Chairman, at the Forty-ninth Congress this same question was raised. It was then contended by members on the floor of the House that amendments of this kind were not in order, because they changed existing law.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am not claiming they change existing law, but that it is provided by law.

Mr. TARSNEY. Then we provide, if we are in favor of it, that it shall continue as the law until the expiration of the appropriation bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. The current bill is the law in this case.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to address myself for a short time to the point of order which has been raised. By an examination of the statutes it will be found that many of the officers and employés of the House are provided for in appropriation bills passed in years since 1879. In 1879 I believe there were five messengers provided for, but since that time the number has grown from five to twenty-three, and they have all been provided for in appropriation bills, and if this point of order has never been raised before it seems to me the precedent is against the construction of the rule asked for.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not know what we can be governed by unless it be the current law making the appropriation.

Mr. TARSNEY. There is no other law.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. If the Chair please, there is no other law, except the existing appropriation act. That does not apply to the fiscal year commencing the 1st of July, 1888, and running to the 30th of June, 1889.

A MEMBER. Then there would be no law authorizing the appropriation.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. Then we would be in the position of having these officers here during this session of Congress provided for and paid under an appropriation bill, and no power in the House to provide for the payment of the same officers for the next year, no matter how imperative the necessity for such payment might be, unless we went to the trouble of passing a general law. The precedents are all against that construction. We are providing now for a period commencing on the 1st of July next and ending on the 1st of July, 1889. The proposed law at this time does not provide for the existence of these offices. It is intended simply to provide pay for offices already created. It is in the line of existing law. They are officers of the House, and we are providing for the salaries of these officers by this law. Therefore the point of order does not lie.

Mr. CANNON. Is it not true, Mr. Chairman, that the Constitution of the United States established the rule and regulations in this matter for the House of Representatives? There is no general law declaring how many employés there shall be, but as the necessity arises for the employment of these officers they are provided under the power granted in the Constitution.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. In answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Indiana I would say this: The point raised is not that we have not the power to create the office, but that we have not the power to provide for the increased pay for the next year in the present appropriation bill. I am contending that this office already exists by virtue of law. There is no question but that Congress has the power to provide for the office under its general legislative powers; but the question presented here is whether we can provide for the increased pay asked in this bill. It seems to me that we are providing for payments authorized by existing law, and that the point of order can not lie against the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The point made by the gentleman from Indiana is on a proposition to increase the salary of the assistant Journal clerk of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the Chair will permit an interruption, I hope the amendment will be read against which I have made the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a proposition to increase the salary of the assistant Journal clerk of the House of Representatives on an appropriation bill. The gentleman from Indiana insists that this proposition is in violation of the third clause of Rule XXI—that it changes existing law.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the Chair will pardon me, my point of order is that there is no law authorizing this expenditure, in the language of the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not want to make a ruling on the subject without being aware of the gentleman's exact point. Does the gentleman from Indiana not recognize the fact that there are duties devolving upon the assistant Journal clerk for which provision may be made in this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly they are provided by law; but this is simply an increase of compensation not authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. So the Chair understood, and was about to rule in regard to the point made by the gentleman.

If that be true, it necessarily comes under the subdivision 3 of Rule XXI, providing that no provision changing existing law shall be incorporated in any general appropriation bill, etc.

Mr. HOLMAN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would prefer to proceed without interruption for the present.

In the Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, and Forty-sixth Congresses time and again this question was raised and sustained, and it has been frequently so decided since. It has generally been held that where there was any general law fixing a salary, that that law governs in relation to this rule; that where there had been no salary fixed by law, other than in an appropriation bill, that the salary therein stated indicated the purpose of Congress as to what it should be, and that any effort to change it after it was once indicated by the House on an appropriation bill was in violation of the rule and subject to the objection here raised.

The Chair holds that the point of order is well taken; and the Clerk will continue to read.

Mr. COX. I move to strike out in line 5, page 10, the words "for the Journal Clerk for preparing the Digest to the Rules" and insert "for a clerk to be designated by the Speaker."

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve the point of order on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. That it is a change of the existing law.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the point of order is well taken. Let me say in this connection——

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to have the point of order decided.

Mr. COX. I will not take up much time.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not speak personally; but the gentleman will understand the importance of having these questions decided promptly and without debate as far as practicable.

Mr. COX. Let me state that this amendment does not raise the pay of the clerk provided for here, nor does it make a new office. It simply gives to the Speaker of the House the right to designate a clerk who shall make out the annual Digest. The Speaker evidently is the man of all others who is most competent to select the proper person for that duty; and if it be that the pay of the Journal Clerk is too much, which has been suggested for other reasons about which I make no comment one way or the other or complaint, for I have none to make, and make no point upon the salary, then this salary can be amended.

Mr. RANDALL. Let me interrupt the gentleman for a moment. The gentleman understands that the Journal Clerk is the best person to make this selection. He is certainly best fitted for the performance of that duty.

Mr. HOLMAN. And he has always performed it heretofore.

Mr. RANDALL. And satisfactorily.

Mr. COX. But nevertheless it can scarcely be doubted that the Speaker is the proper person to indicate the clerk to do this duty. The Speaker is most closely connected with these questions of order, and he should be permitted to select the person who is to journalize them.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask a ruling on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk will read.

Mr. COX. I did not understand the Chair to give any reason for sustaining the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not. It is not necessary. But the Chair will give a reason, that there is no authority of law for it, and under the rules of the House it is not in order—under Rule XXI—for it creates a new office.

Mr. COX. Very well.

Mr. CANNON. I move the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "operator," in line 21, on page 10, insert "$1,200;" so that it will read "one telegraph operator, $1,200."

Mr. HOLMAN. I will reserve the point of order upon this, as I wish to ask the question if that is to supply a mere omission?

Mr. CANNON. I will state to the gentleman what it is. The telegraph operator out here, the Department operator for the House, now gets $900 a year, while the Senate operator gets $1,200. This man has two or three times the amount of work to do that the Senate operator has. I have been requested by a number of parties to offer this amendment, and I believe it is a just and proper one.

Mr. FORNEY. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that $900 for three months' work during the next session is pretty good pay.

Mr. CANNON. Well, this is the salary for short session and long session, year in and year out. He can not get employment outside while thus engaged.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Indexing Journals of Congress: For clerk to prepare the general index to the Journals of Congress, under resolution of June 18, 1878, $2,500, and for the following assistants under his direction, to be appointed by the Committee on Rules, namely: Two at $1,200 each, four at $1,000 each, and two at $800 each; in all, $10,500.

Mr. TARSNEY. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] interrupted me when I was on the floor to offer an amendment to the preceding paragraph. I ask unanimous consent to go back and offer an amendment on page 10 so as to insert in line 4 the word "tally clerk."

The CHAIRMAN. That can only be done by unanimous consent. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to return to page 10, line 4, and offer the amendment which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 10, line 4, after the words "Journal Clerk," insert "tally clerk;" so that it will read:

"For Chief Clerk, Journal Clerk, tally clerk, and two reading clerks, at $3,000 each.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to returning to that paragraph?

Mr. RANDALL. That is part of the flood.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects.

Mr. TARSNEY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania does not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. RANDALL. I do not.

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. TARSNEY. I will state the reason why I offer the amendment. In the last appropriation bill the tally clerk of this House was provided for by the salary fixed in that bill. That was at the rate of $3,000, as I remember. Since that time, and during this Congress, additional work has been placed upon him. He is now required to make an index of all the Calendars of this House. There is not a harder-worked man than the man who sits at that desk, designated as the tally clerk. I simply ask in the spirit of equalization that he shall be placed on an equality with the others who sit at the desk with him. I thoroughly agree with my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that when a man accepts a position connected with the House at a fixed salary he should be bound to perform the duties which at the time of his acceptance pertained to that office.

Mr. RANDALL. I did not make that argument.

Mr. TARSNEY. But if in the course of the performance of his duties additional burdens are placed on his shoulders, then additional compensation commensurate with that additional service should be awarded him. It is in that spirit, and in that spirit only, that I offer this amendment in justice to a hard-worked officer of this House.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to repeat what I said once before: While I do not seek to lower the salaries of those officials at the desk, I do not want to raise them. I know their qualifications are of a peculiar character as regards some of them, and especially the reading clerks. But these officials are liberally paid. They are only on duty while the House is in session. When the House adjourns they can put on their hats and go hence; and when the final adjournment takes place they can pack their trunks and go home. There is no real merit, in my judgment, in the proposition at this time of year to demand an increase in those salaries for the short session.

Mr. TARSNEY. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, when are these indexes made? It is not while the House is in session. They are made when the gentleman from Pennsylvania and I are asleep, many of them.

Mr. PETERS. I want to call further attention to a fact which my friend from Michigan [Mr. TARSNEY] has already emphasized. Prior to the time that the tally clerk was required to index the Calendars of the House, it may be true, as stated, that after the adjournment of the House the tally clerk had nothing to do. But now that additional work is imposed upon him, and it is certainly no light task to index such a Calendar as we have now, and which, as I understand, is reprinted twice a week.

The indexing of the Calendar, especially after the middle of the first session, from that time on, and during the second session, is a laborious task, requiring a man of considerable ability to perform it properly. I know those who have been familiar with the Calendar during this session have realized the great convenience which the index to the Calendar has been to them as members of Congress and for the dispatch of business in this House. It seems to me that with this additional work placed on the tally clerk it is no more than right that his compensation should be increased.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand the point of order is pending.

Mr. TARSNEY. I did not know that any point of order had been raised.

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserved the point of order.

Mr. TARSNEY. What is the point of order? Is it that the amendment changes existing law?

Mr. HOLMAN. It is that the amendment makes an appropriation not authorized by law.

Mr. TARSNEY. During last session, when the legislative appropriation bill, or a bill of like character, was under consideration in this House, and the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] was in the chair, this same question was raised, and the Chair then ruled that the appropriation bill was not a general law within the meaning of the language of that rule. And neither is it.

I concede that where Congress has passed a law which is intended as a perpetual law, which stands until it is repealed, and which does not expire by its own limitation, that is a general law which can not, under the rule, be changed by an amendment in a bill like this. But, sir, we are here dealing with an existing condition of things, simply making an appropriation to pay expenses for what we have on hand, and who tells me that this is the "existing law?" This bill, if it passes, as it certainly will, does not become operative until the 1st day of July next. It does not change in the slightest degree the compensation that any employé of this House is receiving under the last appropriation bill that we passed.

This is a special law intended to apply only for twelve months, beginning on the 1st day of July and ending on the 30th day of June next. This is not a general law. This is not the "existing law" that is contemplated in the rule, and it was so held, and properly held, last year by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], sitting in the chair which you, sir, now occupy. Here is the ruling. I refer to page 2423 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

It seems that there is no general law fixing this salary, and it must be carried in the appropriation bill. Therefore it is not for the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House to fix it, and he will submit the question to the committee.

And he did submit it to the committee.

Now, I raise this point because if the ruling made by the Chair is to stand as the law of this House, then, sir, this House has no power, but the Committee on Appropriations possesses all the power that was delegated to the entire House of Representatives. The Committee on Appropriations, consisting of fifteen members, may go into their committee-room and there fix the salary of any employé of this House and bring their bill in here, and every Representative from every other part of the country has his lips sealed because under such a ruling he can not even offer an amendment to the edict of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. The action of the committee is regulated by law and by the rules of this House.

Mr. TARSNEY. The salaries are regulated only by the appropriation bills coming from the Appropriations Committee, and against such a usurpation of power I, for one, as a Representative, protest and say that it is not right. I say we should have the right to offer amendments to every section of the bill, whether we belong to one committee or another, and I say this with the utmost deference and respect for the gentlemen composing the Committee on Appropriations. I know that they have labored hard and labored earnestly, and exercised their best judgment in reference to this matter, but of course the doctrine of infallibility does not apply even to the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard for a moment on the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for a decision.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, the appropriation bills——

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for a decision on the point of order. The gentleman has already spoken.

Mr. PETERS. I have not spoken on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not care to have the debate protracted very much on the question of order.

Mr. PETERS. I think the Chair will bear me out that I do not occupy very much time in that way.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not reflecting upon the gentleman at all; the Chair will be glad to hear him.

Mr. PETERS. The position of tally clerk has been created by an appropriation bill and is recognized by the bill. This office, therefore, is in a different position from the one upon which the Chair ruled a few minutes ago. The difference is that additional duties have been placed upon this official. Now, certainly, it can not be contended that if this House sees fit, by custom or by law, to increase the duties of one of its officials, the House is still debarred under the rule from increasing the compensation of that official. I do not think that such was the intent or spirit of the rule, and therefore I do not think that this case comes within the ruling which the Chair made awhile ago upon the other case. That is the point to which I wish to direct the attention of the Chair.

Mr. TARSNEY. It is an entirely different question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to say that whatever embarrassment may have arisen in the matter of legislation upon appropriation bills, the House itself in the fixing of its rules is responsible for it. If there is anything unreasonable or tyrannical in the rules the fault lies not with the Chair, but with the House itself. This question is an old one. It has been ruled on time and again from the Forty-fourth Congress down to the present, and almost uniformly it has been held that this provision refers not only to legislation relating to the fixing of a salary generally, but also to such provisions contained in appropriation bills; that is, that the necessity of the service existing, and the appropriation bill having fixed the salary, that was an indication to the Committee on Appropriations and to the House of what the compensation should be; and that the Committee on Appropriations could not report a different provision, nor could any member offer such a provision by way of an amendment to the bill in the House.

The Committee on Appropriations, it is complained, have some extraordinary power. Certainly the Chair was misunderstood if such was assumed to be his opinion. In saying that the appropriation bill fixed salaries, the Chair did not refer to the bill under consideration, but to the appropriation bills of the preceding year which had become law. The Chair is quite aware that the gentleman from Illinois, as presiding officer during the last Congress, made a different ruling; but the Chair is also aware that that ruling was exceptional, the decision having been in general the other way. Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BURNES. For the purpose of addressing an inquiry to the gentleman having charge of this bill, I desire to submit a point of order upon the paragraph just read. I find there a provision for a clerk to prepare a general index to the Journals of Congress; and I find also provision for certain assistants—eight in number, I believe. It is provided, I observe, that these assistant clerks are to be appointed by the Committee on Rules. It has been suggested that this is a change of existing law, and, if so, I wish to ask the reason for the change. I have reserved a point of order in order that I may decide upon the explanation which may be made whether to press the point or not.

Mr. RANDALL. The main object on the part of the committee was to secure the completion of this work in four years, instead of allowing it to be extended over sixteen years under the provision already adopted. The official who was originally selected by the Committee on Rules stated, I believe, that with his present force it would take sixteen years to do this work. The original plan for the work was introduced in this House by Hon. Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, upon a resolution from the Committee on Rules; and the work has always been under the direction of that committee. That is the reason the selection of these clerks was left to the Committee on Rules. If there is any other committee more competent to supervise or direct this work than the Committee on Rules, it is desirable the change should be made; but it was the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations (I myself taking very little part in the matter, as my associates will recollect, because, being a member of the Committee on Rules, I felt some delicacy in regard to it); it was the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations that as the work had heretofore been done under the direction of the Committee on Rules, it would be best to continue in their hands the control of it in the future.

Mr. HOLMAN. My recollection is that in the appropriation bill for the present year, on account of there not being proper responsibility on the part of the persons employed, the provision placing the work under the direction of the Committee on Rules was omitted.

Mr. RANDALL. There has never been any legislation connected with this matter except to execute the original resolution by providing pay for those employed in this work. It has now taken eleven years to do the work of indexing the first twenty-five Congresses.

Mr. HOLMAN. We provided for a clerk and assistant, I believe.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. They were subject only to the Committee on Rules?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. And it was thought desirable that they should be under the direction of the Clerk of the House. Hence, as will be found, I think, upon examination, the provision which contemplated continuing those officers under the control of the Committee on Rules was omitted, and another was adopted which placed them under the direction of the Clerk of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not know that the Clerk of the House seeks to enlarge his power in this respect. I am not aware, however, that the Committee on Rules cares anything about the matter.

Mr. HOLMAN. The provision was not even suggested by the Clerk of the House; but it was thought desirable that there should be some responsible officer to have charge of the work.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, I do not see that anybody is more responsible than the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HOLMAN. But they are not always in session; that is the trouble.

Mr. FORNEY. The Speaker of the House is the head of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BURNES. While I am of opinion that this provision is subject to a point of order, I do not see that anything better can be done than to accept it under the circumstances. Therefore, so far as I am concerned, I shall not make the point.

Mr. RANDALL. I concede that the provision is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clerks and messengers to committees: For clerk to the Committee on Ways and Means, $3,000; assistant clerk, $1,600; messenger, $1,000; clerk to the Committee on Appropriations, $3,000; assistant clerk, $1,600; messenger, $1,000; clerk to Committee on Agriculture, clerk to the Committee on Claims, clerk to the Committee on Commerce, clerk to the Committee on the District of Columbia, clerk to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, clerk to the Committee on Indian Affairs, clerk to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, clerk to the Committee on the Judiciary, clerk to the Committee on Military Affairs, clerk to the Committee on Naval Affairs, clerk to the Committee on the Public Lands, clerk to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, clerk to the Committee on War Claims; clerk to continue Digest of Claims under resolution of the House adopted March —, 1888; clerk to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads; clerk to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and clerk to the Committee on Elections, at $2,000 each; assistant clerk to the Committee on War Claims, $1,200; in all $46,400.

Mr. LANHAM. I move to amend by inserting after the word "dollars," in line 1, page 13, these words:

Assistant clerk to the Committee on Claims, $1,200: Provided, That the pay heretofore allowed such assistant clerk for the session shall cease on June 30, 1888.

Mr. RANDALL. I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, we already have, under a resolution of the House, an assistant clerk of the Committee on Claims, who is paid at the rate of $6 per day. The object of this amendment is to make this assistant an annual clerk. This, I take it, will operate ultimately as a reduction of expenditure. If Congress should be in session for eight months, this assistant clerk, whose per diem compensation is never refused because of the vast amount of labor required at his hands, would receive $1,440 in a single year, and for a session of nine months $1,620. Under this amendment, the salary of the assistant would be $1,200 a year instead of $6 per day, or $180 per month during the session. As I have suggested, this amendment would, in my judgment, be really in the interest of economy. I do not think any point of order ought to be urged against it.

Mr. RANDALL. There is now no law authorizing the employment of this officer as an annual clerk. I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For clerk to the Committee on the Census from July 1, 1888, to March 4, 1889, at the rate of $2,000 per annum, $1,351.90.

Mr. COX. I move to strike out on page 13 of the bill, commencing with the words "from July first, eighteen hundred and eighty-eight, to March fourth, eighteen hundred and eighty-nine," and in line 6 the words "one thousand three hundred and fifty-one dollars and ninety cents," so the paragraph will read, "For clerk to the Committee on the Census, two thousand dollars."

Mr. FORNEY. We have followed the instructions of the Committee on Accounts in this matter.

Mr. RANDALL. Just as they said.

Mr. COX. This only extends from the 4th of March to the 1st of July. There is no objection to that.

Mr. RANDALL. Oh, yes, there is.

Mr. COX. It is an oversight; I thought it was in the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. It is not an oversight.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For thirty-nine clerks to committees, at $6 each per day during the session, $28,314.

Mr. McRAE. I move to strike out "at $6 each per day" and insert "$100 per month."

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why, this is a reduction.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not know of any law fixing these clerks at an annual salary.

The CHAIRMAN. If that be the amendment the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. McRAE. My amendment does not propose to give these clerks an annual salary. I only seek a reduction in their pay. They may be worth $6 per day if they had anything to do; but many of the committees they are supposed to serve do nothing, and, with the best of feelings towards the clerks, I think $100 per month enough for the work.

Mr. RANDALL. But does not the amendment make them annual?

Mr. McRAE. Certainly not; it merely strikes out the words "at $6 each per day" and inserts "at $100 per month," so it will then read, "For thirty-nine clerks to committees, at $100 per month during the session." Instead of giving them $6 a day, I propose to give them a hundred dollars a month during the session. That is all I intend, and that I am sure will be the effect of the amendment if adopted, as I trust it will be.

Mr. RANDALL. In that case I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being withdrawn, the gentleman from Arkansas is entitled to the floor on his amendment.

Mr. McRAE. My amendment simply provides that instead of paying the session committee clerks $6 a day during the session, they shall be paid $100 a month during the session. I propose it purely as a measure of reform in the item of expenses. We pay too much money for committee clerks. I want to stop it.

Mr. TAULBEE. I thought the point of order had been made against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It was made, but afterwards withdrawn, and the gentleman from Arkansas is now discussing his amendment.

Mr. TAULBEE. I did not catch what the Chair stated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated that the point of order had been made and withdrawn, and the gentleman was now occupying the floor discussing the amendment.

Mr. TAULBEE. I renew the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. It is too late. The gentleman from Arkansas is on the floor explaining his amendment.

Mr. TAULBEE. At what time was it in order to renew the point? I did not understand the gentleman from Arkansas took the floor for discussion of his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so stated, that he took the floor for that purpose.

Mr. TAULBEE. If I had understood that to be his purpose I should have renewed the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas sent up his amendment, and it was read, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania rose to a question of order. After some discussion, the gentleman from Pennsylvania withdrew his point of order, and the Chair then recognized the gentleman from Arkansas to discuss his amendment. If the gentleman from Kentucky was not giving attention it is not the fault of the Chair.

Mr. TAULBEE. If the Chair pleases, I was giving attention to it, and as soon as I understood the point of order had been withdrawn I rose and renewed it.

Mr. BLAND. The amendment reduces the salaries of these clerks.

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROGERS. The chairman of the Committee of the Whole, I think, is evidently laboring under a misapprehension of the fact, and is unwittingly doing the gentleman from Kentucky an injustice. When the gentleman from Pennsylvania found there was no point of order and he withdrew it, then the gentleman from Kentucky rose and renewed the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. But the Chair had recognized the gentleman from Arkansas, and he was proceeding to explain his amendment.

Mr. TAULBEE. I rise to a point of order. I wished to ascertain from the gentleman from Arkansas the purpose for which he first rose, for the reason I wished to enter another point of order. But I did not wish to lose my right to recognition for the purpose of doing so.

Mr. McRAE. I am willing to waive time as to the point of order made by the gentleman from Kentucky so as to relieve the Chair from embarrassment. I will submit the matter to the judgment of the Chair after it has heard my friend from Kentucky on the point he seeks to make.

Mr. TAULBEE. I ask to have the report of the Official Reporter read, so as to see what did occur when I rose to renew the point of order when withdrawn by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state to the gentleman that is not necessary, as the point of order has been withdrawn. The Chair recognizes the gentleman on his point of order.

Mr. TAULBEE. Do I understand the Chair to withdraw his ruling deciding that my point of order came too late?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas states that there is no objection to waiving the time on the point of order that the gentleman from Kentucky was too late.

Mr. McRAE. I waive the time on the point of order, provided the gentleman from Kentucky comes at once to the point. I do not want to occupy the time of the committee in having the notes of the Reporter written out and read. The Chair is correct in the statement made.

Mr. TAULBEE. I always come directly to the point. [Laughter.]

Mr. McRAE. Then I hope the gentleman will maintain his record in that respect, and not consume time by having other matter read. I am in earnest about this matter.

Mr. TAULBEE. I did not call for the reading of the official notes for the purpose of consuming time, but because I did not understand the Chair to withdraw the ruling by which I was taken off the floor.

My point of order, Mr. Chairman, is this, that this provision of the bill now under consideration makes an appropriation for the payment of the clerks appointed under a resolution of this House, passed by the House, and the employés so provided for are clerks and acting as such, and are paid as such under existing law. The amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas to that extent changes existing law. Now, that is all I have to say.

Mr. McRAE. I think it is unnecessary to say anything against the point of order. I remember we had a little experience about these clerks when we proceeded to organize the present House of Representatives at the beginning of this session. I did my best to have the salaries fixed at that time, but was voted down, because it was said the per diem had been fixed until July 1, 1888. I predicted then just what we have now. With this kind of dealing we can never get rid of these clerks nor reduce their pay. It is a waste of money, and should be stopped.

This bill, of course, fixes the salaries for the next session, or rather for the year beginning July 1, 1888. The bill under which we are now operating—the current appropriation bill—provides for the pay of some of these clerks for the present session, or until June 30, and no longer. They will get their pay at $6 per day until that time, even if we pass this. It was definitely stated in the debate on the resolution by which some of them were provided that no provision was made for their payment beyond the current fiscal year. There was no authority to make any contract beyond that time, and of course we have the right to control the amount of compensation, or to dispense with them entirely if we desire to do so. They took their positions with the distinct understanding that there was no payment provided for them beyond this fiscal year, and should not be heard to complain now. Believing that we can get competent clerks to do all the work of the committees interested at the rate I have suggested, $100 a month, I hope the amendment will be adopted. I think the point of order against the amendment ought to be overruled.

Mr. CRAIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. McRAE. Certainly.

Mr. CRAIN. If you can not increase a salary in this appropriation bill—a salary that is fixed by existing law——

Mr. McRAE. There is no existing law fixing these salaries. If you do not pass this bill you have no law and no clerks after the 30th of June. Even the number of clerks is not the same as in the current law.

Mr. TAULBEE. The same may be said of the salary of every official of this Government.

Mr. CRAIN. The question I want to ask is, if you can not increase a salary fixed by law, whether you can reduce it?

Mr. BURNES. Yes; that is in the direct line of economy.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to know if there has been any order of the House as to the amount to be paid these clerks?

Mr. TAULBEE. I answer the Chair and state that there is. There was a resolution providing for their payment.

Mr. McRAE. Where is it?

Mr. FORNEY. I think the gentleman from Kentucky is correct. The resolution providing for these clerks provided also for their compensation.

Mr. TAULBEE. I have not the resolution before me, but the gentlemen on the Appropriations Committee, who have had the matter in charge, know this to be the case. They have considered it and in connection with this bill, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], as well as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY], are ready to corroborate what I say.

Mr. McRAE. I undertake to say that there is nothing whatever except the current appropriation bill which fixes the salary, and names thirty or thirty-one, instead of thirty-nine. There may possibly have been in the resolution of the House a provision fixing it, but I do not understand that to be existing law within the meaning of the rule. It is simply a House resolution and was not concurred in by the Senate, and has nothing to do with the compensation except for such as are paid out of the contingent fund; even that depends for its continuance on this bill.

Mr. TAULBEE. And I undertake to say that the resolution providing for the appointment of the assistant clerks and fixing their duties, where assistant clerks are appointed, and for session clerks, when appointed, does fix the time of their appointment, the term of their service, and the rate of compensation, and I am unwilling to agree with the gentleman from Arkansas that the resolution so providing for these things is not the existing law for the purposes of this bill.

Mr. FORNEY. I think the gentleman from Kentucky is correct. The resolution came from the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. TAULBEE. Yes, sir.

Mr. FORNEY. And fixed the rate of compensation.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. McCREARY. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Are we now discussing the point of order or are we discussing the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. BLAND. I rise for the purpose of discussing the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order of the gentleman from Kentucky is under discussion, but in connection with it the question is raised whether or not the House has ordered or fixed the sums to be paid to these officials.

Mr. TAULBEE. And I make the further point that the point of order should be disposed of before the merits of the amendment are discussed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule upon the point of order, but desires information from the gentleman in charge of this bill on this point: whether or not this House has by resolution determined that the amounts fixed in this bill are the salaries to be paid to these clerks.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FORNEY. We know the fact that the Committee on Accounts assigned thirty-nine assistant clerks to these various committees, and that the salaries were fixed at $6 a day, each, during the session.

Mr. McRAE. I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows the resolution provides for a rate of $6 a day, and if he is willing to say that it fixes the per diem and term of service and provides for the whole of the thirty-nine? I think you will find it only provides for such as are to be paid out of the contingent fund. If the resolution providing for this is existing law, then the bill violates the rule by changing this law so as to provide for payment otherwise. It will fix permanently upon the House eight more clerks. Some of them serve committees with almost nothing to do. Other employés of the House work for $100 per month and some for less, and they work hard, too.

Mr. TAULBEE. I desire to answer for the gentleman. I hold in my hand one of the resolutions authorizing the appointment of a clerk for this session, and I will send it to the Clerk's desk that it may be read. In this resolution the compensation is fixed at $6 a day. I have a distinct recollection also as to the resolution under which the other session clerks are appointed; and I think I am not mistaken in saying the compensation for each of them is fixed at $6 per day.

Mr. SOWDEN. Why do you not send for the other resolution?

Mr. TAULBEE. I can not obtain it at this moment. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] has informed me that he has sent for the other resolution, which can be read when it comes in.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be authorized, during this session only, until further ordered by the House, to employ an assistant clerk, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, at the rate of $6 per day.

Mr. McRAE. That resolution provides for payment out of the contingent fund. I undertake to say that the resolution providing for the payment of clerks authorized by the current appropriation bill does not say anything about $6 a day, and if it does it can have no binding effect, because we only had authority to employ thirty or thirty-one clerks until June 30, and the resolution only apportioned these to so many committees.

The CHAIRMAN. In the doubtful condition of the information connected with the resolution, the Chair will entertain the amendment.

Mr. McCREARY. As I understand, the Chair has overruled the point of order, and the amendment to reduce the amount payable to these committee clerks to $100 per month is now before the committee. I think that for the House to adopt that amendment at present would be treating the persons who are now acting as clerks of committees unfairly.

The general law which I have now before me provides for thirty-one clerks to committees at $6 each per day during the session. That is the general law. I dare say that every clerk who was appointed and who came here to enter upon the discharge of his duties, accepting a compensation of $6 a day, has been drawing it ever since he qualified and entered upon the discharge of his duties. As these gentlemen left their homes and their various avocations and came here relying upon this statute that they would get $6 a day, and as they have been drawing that amount, I think it would be unjust to these gentlemen in the middle of the session to allow them only $100 a month, or a little over one-half of what they accepted.

I believe, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas should be voted down. I am in favor always of economy; but certainly the day has not arrived under our Government when a man should be induced to take a position as an officer and then, while discharging his duties faithfully, have his salary reduced nearly one-half.

It may be added also that $6 per day has been the rate paid to the clerks of committees for many years; and there is no necessity now for that economy which reduces the pay one-half and puts it at an amount that I do not believe you can obtain good clerks for.

Mr. RANDALL. There is one point in connection with this item to which I desire to draw the attention of the committee. It increases the number of clerks provided for from thirty-one to thirty-nine. That arises from the resolutions which have been adopted in this House adding eight clerks to the number provided for in the current law. This is done because the committee believe the entire number of clerks to committees should appear in the law, and that part should not be paid out of the annual appropriation and part out of the contingent fund.

Mr. TAULBEE. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAULBEE. I believe this does increase the number of clerks beyond the number actually employed.

Mr. RANDALL. It does not increase the number of clerks, but the bill provides for thirty-nine clerks, to be paid out of this appropriation, increasing the amount $5,808. It does not increase the number actually, but makes provision that they shall not hereafter be paid out of the contingent fund.

Mr. BUCHANAN. This proposed amendment does no injustice to any one. The clerks are now employed by virtue of different resolutions which provide that their employment shall be for this session only at $6 per day. This House proposes to carry out that contract. The bill under consideration provides for the compensation of committee clerks for the next session. For the next session we have no contract with them, and we have a perfect right to put the rate of compensation at $6 per day, or at $100 a month, as we think fit. There is no vested right, and I doubt very much whether there is any reason at all for the employment of those thirty-nine clerks for the coming session. Everybody knows the Calendar has more bills upon it than will be acted upon.

Mr. McCREARY. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I have only got five minutes, and I have to talk fast. Everybody knows, I say, that the Calendar has more bills on it than will be acted upon, and that there will be practically no work done in those committees during the next session.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I fully agree with the gentleman from Kentucky on this question. I think it would be little less than an outrage to attempt to reduce the salaries of these gentlemen employed as clerks. Clearly it was understood when they were employed that they were to have $6 a day——

Mr. BUCHANAN. Well, we are giving it to them.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. Yes; but it applies to the next session just the same as to this.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Not at all. There is no authority for saying that. There is no contract with them for next session.

Mr. McCREARY. The gentleman from New Jersey is mistaken. These gentlemen are employed for the Fiftieth Congress, including both sessions.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. It was understood that their employment extended through both sessions of Congress, otherwise you could not have employed them. They could not be hired to be buffeted around in that way any more than a member of Congress could. Their salaries are just like the salaries of members. They extend through both sessions.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But we are elected for two sessions.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. And they are appointed for two sessions. I do not think that any proposition to reduce their salaries is admissible. When I heard the amendment in the first place I was in favor of it, because I thought it was a proposition to increase the salaries; but when I found that it was designed to cut them off by paying them only during the working days of the session I was opposed to it, and I am opposed to it. A motion to increase these salaries might be admissible, but a motion to decrease the salaries, in the face of the terms of the employment of these men is unfair and wrong, and I hope it will be promptly voted down.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. McRAE, and the Chair announced that it was rejected—ayes 11, noes 44.

Mr. McRAE. No quorum.

Mr. McCREARY. I make the point that the result has been announced.

The CHAIRMAN. The announcement of the result disclosed the fact that there was no quorum voting. The point being made, the Chair will appoint the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] to act as tellers.

Mr. McRAE. If I can have a vote in the House on this question, I will withdraw the point.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw the point of "no quorum?"

Mr. McRAE. I do not unless they will accept my proposition to have a vote on this in the House.

Mr. TAULBEE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the point.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will take their places.

Mr. McRAE withdrew the point of "no quorum," and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Doorkeeper: For Doorkeeper, $3,500; and for hire of horses, feed, repair of wagon and harness, $600, or so much thereof as may be necessary; assistant doorkeeper, superintendent of document-room, assistant superintendent of document-room, and Department messenger, at $2,000 each; one employé, $1,500; document file clerk, $1,400; assistant document file clerk, under resolution of December 19, 1881, $1,314; clerk for Doorkeeper and janitor, at $1,200 each; nine messengers, including the messenger to the reporters' gallery, at $1,200 each; nine messengers, at $1,000 each; seven laborers, at $720 each; two laborers in the water-closet, at $720 each; three laborers, including two in the cloak-rooms, at $900 each; female attendant in ladies' retiring-room, $900; superintendent of the folding-room, $2,000; three clerks in the folding-room, one at $1,800 and two at $1,200 each; one foreman, $1,500; one messenger, $1,200; one folder in the sealing-room, $1,200; one page, $500; one laborer, $900; ten folders, at $960 each; five folders, at $840 each; three folders, during the session, at $70 per month each; and fifteen folders, at $720 each; one night watchman, $900; one driver, $900; fourteen messengers on the soldiers' roll, at $1,200 each; two chief pages, at $900 each; thirty-three pages, boys not under fourteen years of age, during the session, including two riding pages, one telephone page, and one telegraph page, at $2.50 per day each; two messengers, during the session, at $70 per month each; ten laborers, during the session, at $60 per month each; six laborers known as cloak-room men, during the session, at $50 per month each; in all, $117,476.50.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to raise the point of order against the provision in lines 20 and 21, which increases the salary of the Doorkeeper $500 above the amount in the last bill. I think that what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander; and if this Committee of the Whole can not make any change in last year's appropriation bill to increase or decrease a salary, neither can the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. FORNEY. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this proposed increase is offset by the decrease of the allowance for horse-hire.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I know that, but, as I have said, what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander; and if the Committee of the Whole House can not increase any salary upon this bill, but must conform in all particulars to the bill of last year, I can not see how under any reading of the rule it does not apply equally to the Committee on Appropriations; so that the committee are bound to adhere strictly to the law of last year. In other words, they become mere clerks to rewrite the law of last year as regards the salaries contained in this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, the proposed change may be subject to the point of order, but it is proper to give the reason which prompted the committee in making it. The change is exactly in the same line as that which is made in reference to the salaries of the Clerk of the House and the Sergeant-at-Arms. The committee found on investigation that the Doorkeeper was receiving $1,100 for horse-hire, and that he was actually expending for that service only $600; the remaining $500 being an addition by indirection to the emoluments of his office. The committee did not feel at liberty to decrease his emoluments, so they made this change, with a provision which requires him to account to the proper auditing officers of the Treasury for the amount which is allowed for horse-hire. I think the change is in the line of good policy, because it secures strict responsibility for the money expended in that way by these officers. But I concede, of course, that it may still be subject to the point of order.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I wish to ask the gentleman a question for information. Under the course pursued heretofore, has it been the practice of the Doorkeeper to receive this $1,100 for horse-hire without being required to account for the expenditure of it?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir; and the First Comptroller decided that he had no power over the expenditure of that $1,100; so that it was in effect a perquisite, and that is the arrangement which we propose to break up.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks business will be facilitated by a prompt ruling. The point of order made by the gentleman from Tennessee is sustained.

Mr. WASHINGTON. The point of order having been sustained, I now move to amend by striking out "$500," in line 21, so as to make the clause read, "for Doorkeeper, $3,000."

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that the effect of the ruling of the Chair was to leave this salary at $3,000 instead of $3,500.

Mr. WASHINGTON. The point of order having been sustained, I think it proper this amendment should be entertained.

The CHAIRMAN. It does not appear to the Chair a matter of much moment whether the $500 goes out under the ruling of the Chair or by a direct vote of the Committee of the Whole. The Chair's ruling in effect is that the salary of $3,500 is contrary to existing law.

Mr. RANDALL. I want the Committee of the Whole to understand that the effect of the amendment is to make a cut of $500 upon the salary of the Doorkeeper. I do not think the House wants to do that, and I do not understand that to be the object of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee raised the question of order that the amount of salary allowed the Doorkeeper in this bill was not in accordance with existing law; and the Chair sustained the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. The Chair was no doubt right.

The CHAIRMAN. Therefore this increase of compensation goes out.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the whole sum go out, or only the amount in excess of the existing law?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule that the $500 increase upon the salary allowed by law goes out.

Mr. TAULBEE. Then the $3,000 will stand.

The Clerk was proceeding to read the bill, when

Mr. OUTHWAITE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was under the impression that this paragraph in relation to the office of Doorkeeper had been read when the question of order was raised. But the Clerk now informs the Chair that he was in error. Therefore the paragraph will now be read, after which the Chair will entertain any points or propositions which may be presented.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I desire to offer some amendments to the paragraph.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri. This paragraph contains the clause "and for hire of horses, feed, repair of wagon and harness, $600." Is it in order to move an amendment to that clause now?

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph must first be read. The Chair supposed it had been read when the gentleman from Tennessee raised the point of order which has been ruled upon.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I desire to make a point of order as to a part of the language in this paragraph, and also to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will be recognized for that purpose in due time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Doorkeeper: For Doorkeeper, $3,500; and for hire of horses, feed, repair of wagon and harness, $600, or so much thereof as may be necessary; assistant doorkeeper, superintendent of document-room, assistant superintendent of document room, and Department messenger, at $2,000 each; one employé, $1,500; document file clerk, $1,400; assistant document file clerk, under resolution of December 19, 1881, $1,314; clerk for Doorkeeper, and janitor, at $1,200 each; nine messengers, including the messenger to the reporters' gallery, at $1,200 each; nine messengers, at $1,000 each; seven laborers, at $720 each; two laborers in the water-closet, at $720 each; three laborers, including two in the cloak-rooms, at $900 each; female attendant in ladies' retiring-room, $900; superintendent of the folding-room, $2,000; three clerks in the folding-room, one at $1,800 and two at $1,200 each; one foreman, $1,500; one messenger, $1,200; one folder in the sealing room, $1,200; one page, $500; one laborer, $900; ten folders, at $960 each; five folders, at $840 each; three folders, during the session, at $70 per month each; and fifteen folders, at $720 each; one night watchman, $900; one driver, $900; fourteen messengers on the soldiers' roll, at $1,200 each; two chief pages, at $900 each; thirty-three pages, boys not under fourteen years of age, during the session, including two riding pages, one telephone page, and one telegraph page, at $2.50 per day each; two messengers, during the session, at $70 per month each; ten laborers, during the session, at $60 per month each; six laborers, known as cloak-room men, during the session, at $50 per month each; in all, $117,476.50.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I desire to raise a question of order

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I now desire to submit a proposition.

Mr. FORNEY. I wish to offer an amendment to perfect this paragraph.

Mr. TAULBEE. Before amendments are offered I desire to reserve a point of order on this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Points of order will be reserved, but the amendment sent up by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] will be acted on, if there be no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 9, page 14, strike out the word "seven" where it first occurs and insert "six;" so as to read: "six laborers, at $720 each."

Mr. FORNEY. This change is made to conform to the action of the Committee of the Whole this morning in raising to the rank of messenger a man who, while holding the position of laborer, has in fact acted as a messenger to the Speaker.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FORNEY. On behalf of the committee I desire to offer a further amendment, to strike out "fourteen," in line 4, page 15, and insert "twelve."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I now make a point of order against the word "six," in line 22, and also against the words "or so much thereof as may be necessary," in lines 22 and 23. My point is that these portions of the paragraph are out of order as contrary to existing law. If it be necessary, I desire to amend by inserting "eleven" instead of "six;" so as to make the bill conform to existing law. If the Chair should sustain the point of order against the word "six" and should decide that the effect of ruling out that word is to insert the word "eleven," in conformity with existing law, then of course no amendment will be necessary.

Mr. RANDALL. The clause "or so much thereof as may be necessary" is, I believe, in order. It has been decided that the committee has power to introduce restrictions upon expenditures provided for.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the control of this matter is not left with the committee, but that the Comptroller has ruled that this sum is a part of the salary of this position as much so as if so designated. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. TAULBEE. I would like to call the attention of the Chair to the language of the decision of the First Comptroller, to which reference has just been made. I had occasion to examine that decision very closely, and, if I recollect correctly, the construction of the Comptroller was based on the phraseology of the then current appropriation law. As I understand, there is no law fixing this item of expenditure as part of the compensation of the Doorkeeper, except that the former appropriation bill provided that $1,100 should be applied for this purpose; and the present appropriation bill has restricted that expenditure by language which has heretofore been considered as not obnoxious to the rule which prohibits new legislation on general appropriation bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the Chair hold that the Committee has not the power to make the change from $1,100 to $600?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair remembers well that in the Forty-fourth Congress there was a change of salary in reference to this office; and this amount, which was then fixed, was understood to be a part of the salary allowed to this officer, so that he was required to make no account of the particular sums expended by him under this item. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Does the decision of the Chair result in the introduction of the word "eleven" instead of the word "six?"

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled out the sum named in the bill, and it is now in order to move an amendment covering that point.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I move to amend by inserting the word "eleven" before the word "hundred," so as to make the appropriation conform, as I understand, to the ruling of the Chair and to the intention of the law upon the statute-book, which was that the Doorkeeper should receive this amount of $1,100.

Mr. PAYSON. I ask that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 22, on page 13, strike out "600" and insert "1,100;" so as to read: "For hire of horses, feed, repair of wagon and harness, $1,100."

Mr. PAYSON. Is an amendment to that amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. PAYSON. Why?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already stated that, according to his information, the accounting officers of the Treasury have uniformly treated this item of $1,100 as a part of the salary of this official, so that he does not render any account of the particular expenditures in connection therewith.

Mr. PAYSON. But if this is an amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio under the rules of the House, why is it not subject to amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio first raised the question of order that this item for the Doorkeeper as inserted in the bill was not in accordance with the statute. The Chair sustained the point; and hence the amount proposed in the bill went out. There being then no provision for the amount required by law, the gentleman from Ohio moved an amendment in accordance with existing law. Any amendment differing from that, the Chair holds, would be in violation of the rules. Whatever reasonableness or unreasonableness may attach to a decision which is necessitated by the rules, the Chair is not responsible for it.

Mr. PAYSON. In order to present the question, I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio by striking out "11" and inserting "6."

Mr. OUTHWAITE. On that I make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. And the Chair sustains it.

Mr. TAULBEE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the law fixes the compensation of the Doorkeeper at $3,000, and also allows a perquisite of $1,100 for certain expenditures, is it in order under the rules of the House to provide in a general appropriation bill for the payment to that officer of a less sum than is provided for by existing law as his salary?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not rule on any supposed case, but only on amendments as they are offered.

Mr. TAULBEE. This is not a "supposed case," but is connected with the point now under consideration.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I believe the Chair has ruled the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio as in order, and therefore before the committee. On that point I wish to say that the Committee on Appropriations, who have investigated this question, have reported $600 as amply sufficient to enable the Doorkeeper to provide for "hire of horses, feed, repair of wagon, and harness." Some examination of this matter was made at the beginning of this session, when it was insisted by many members that $1,100 was an excessive allowance for these purposes, and they undertook to show that a former Doorkeeper had done the work for less money, and because he had saved a small amount in this way he was accused of embezzlement and fraud. Now, if this work was done for $600, I say this Committee of the Whole, in justice to itself, and in justice to the country, ought not to appropriate $1,100, but ought to save $500 for the Treasury. This sum, which we can save on this item, ought not to go to the Doorkeeper, whoever he may be, Democrat or Republican. We ought not, because of the wording of a previous law, to make this sum $1,100, when it has been demonstrated that a less sum is sufficient for this purpose. Referring to past appropriation bills, we find that the salary of the Doorkeeper has been raised and lowered from time to time according to the discretion of Congress. In 1878 the Doorkeeper's salary was only $2,500. This bill, as it came before us, proposed to make the salary $3,500. Where is the necessity for this increase? Have the duties of the Doorkeeper increased? Have his responsibilities increased? Has the amount of his work increased? Let gentlemen answer those questions for themselves. In 1885 the law fixed this salary at $3,000, and that has since been the amount. I insist that it is sufficient to-day, but I do not object to allowing the Doorkeeper in addition the $600 which the Committee on Appropriations say is sufficient to pay for horse-hire, etc. It seems to me proper to pass the appropriation in this shape.

Mr. RANDALL. The committee thought that $600 was adequate, and that $1,100 gave an emolument which came by indirection.

Mr. McCREARY. Which was not intended.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly not.

The question recurred on Mr. OUTHWAITE'S amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 27, noes 55.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. No quorum has voted. I do not think the House understands this is doing the Doorkeeper an injustice. [Cries of "Order!"]

Several MEMBERS. Debate is not in order.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. It cuts down his salary $600.

The CHAIRMAN appointed as tellers Mr. FORNEY and Mr. OUTHWAITE.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 59, noes 42.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I withdraw my point of order that there is no quorum, if nobody objects.

Mr. WILLIAMS renewed the point of order, but afterward withdrew it.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers now report—ayes 59, noes 42.

So Mr. OUTHWAITE'S amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I move, after the word "at," in line 9, page 14, to strike out the words "one thousand dollars" and insert "one thousand two hundred dollars;" so it will read:

Nine messengers, at $1,200 each.

Mr. KERR. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, against that amendment. I understand the present law provides for $1,000 only. I make the point of order that it changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I move, then, to strike out the last word. Certainly, if the Democrats of the House of Representatives can afford to continue this injustice against their own employés, the Republicans can afford to permit them to do so.

I wish to reply to the criticism made yesterday in the course of the debate by my friend, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KERR], to the effect that he regarded it as the duty of the Republicans of the Committee on Accounts to refrain from offering any such amendments or recommending such action in the House. He said that it was not good politics, or that seemed to be the gist of his criticism.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that, so far as my limited experience is concerned, I have yet to learn that anything is gained by loading a cannon for the purpose of destroying a tom-tit. [Laughter.]

Judging from the debate which has been carried on here for the last month, it seems to be agreed that the great questions of protection and free trade and revenue reform and reduction in the surplus revenue are to be the issues in the coming Presidential campaign before the country, and it is barely possible in the discussion of these great questions that there will be dropped out of sight any question of a reasonable increase in the salaries of the messengers and other employés of the House of Representatives. It does not seem to me that this latter question is broad enough upon which to base a national issue and a national campaign, nor does it seem to me to be essential to the great doctrine of public economy that injustice should be perpetuated by this House against its own officers. Nor do I believe that the American people are in favor of economy which degenerates into niggardliness. [Applause.]

That is all I have to say.

Mr. KERR. I wish to say to the gentleman there is one principle of the Republican party which he does not seem to be much in favor of, and that is economy in the public expenditures.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. In all the essentials of Republican principles I think I can say with truth that I have never been found wanting. But I am not in favor of the kind of economy which the gentleman from Iowa mistakes for a Republican principle.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I raise the point of order on the words on the fifteenth page, beginning with the third line, "boys not under fourteen years of age," as they propose new legislation in this bill.

Mr. RANDALL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] moved an amendment to this very item which was entertained and agreed to by the House.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The Chair will remember that as to these words in this paragraph I reserved the point of order. I have been unable to obtain the floor to state my point of order until the present moment. I did not hear the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no doubt that is true.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It is true.

The CHAIRMAN. But the Chair is bound to rule as he has done. No doubt if the gentleman had heard it in the confusion he would have raised the point.

Mr. BUCHANAN. What amendment was inserted?

The CHAIRMAN. Twelve instead of fourteen.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I raise the point of order on the remaining words "not under years of age," and on that point of order I desire to be heard.

Mr. FORNEY. That portion of the bill has already been amended.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from New Jersey raises a new question of order, which he will state.

Mr. DOCKERY. The point of order evidently comes too late. It is not a substantive proposition. The words left do not make good sense standing alone.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the Chair indicate some way that I could have made the point of order sooner? I announced my intention of reserving the point of order upon the paragraph when it was first read, as the Chair will remember.

Mr. FORNEY. The gentleman should have made the point of order when the amendment was offered by myself.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But I had not the floor for that purpose. I reserved the point of order, and supposed that reservation would be regarded.

I will submit to this now; but I give notice now that it shall not be done again.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to state that there was no disposition whatever to prevent the gentleman from presenting his point of order. When the gentleman from Alabama moved to amend the paragraph, if the gentleman from New Jersey had heard it and made his point of order, the Chair would have entertained it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am not seeking to find fault with the Chair. The Chair undoubtedly performed its duty.

The Clerk read as follows;

Office of Postmaster: For Postmaster, $2,500; first assistant postmaster, $2,000; ten messengers, including messenger to superintend transportation of mails, at $1,200 each; three messengers during the session, at $900 each; four messengers, at $100 per month each during the session; and one laborer, at $720; in all, $21,220.

For hire of horses and mail-wagons for carrying the mails, $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. TAULBEE. I make the point of order against the provision contained in lines 22 and 23—

For hire of horses and mail-wagons for carrying the mails, $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary—

That it changes existing law.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman will not do that. He does not want us to contract for just $5,000, when by competition we may be able to get it done for $4,000.

Mr. TAULBEE. I would say, in reference to that, Mr. Chairman, that the point of order which I have made goes to the effect that the language of this clause should conform to the former appropriation bill; and it does not necessarily involve the expenditure of any additional sum, if the point of order is sustained.

Mr. RANDALL. The object of this is to have this work done by contract, and at the lowest possible rate. Now there is no power to do this unless the language employed here is used. It may be done for $4,500 or $4,000, as I have said, and I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his objection.

Mr. TAULBEE. I wish to say, in reference to the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that this item of expenditure is amply guarded by the phraseology of the clause itself.

Mr. RANDALL. It is now as clear as language can make it.

Mr. TAULBEE. The provision that my point of order would strike out relates to the words "five thousand dollars."

Mr. HOLMAN. But that is the law now.

Mr. RANDALL. In the last appropriation it was this sum.

Mr. TAULBEE. But it recurs to the former law of the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. But, as I have said, that provides for $5,000.

Mr. FORNEY. The idea here is to provide for competition, so as to reduce the cost.

Mr. TAULBEE. On the suggestion of gentlemen around me I will withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Official Reporters: For one Chief Official Reporter, $6,000; and for four Official Reporters of the proceedings and debates of the House, at $5,000 each; messenger to the Official Reporters, $1,000; in all, $27,000.

Mr. FORNEY. By direction of the committee I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to come in after the words "twenty-seven thousand dollars," just read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert:

"Stenographers to committees: For two stenographers to committees, at $4,000 each, $8,000."

Mr. KERR. I desire to ask the member of the committee in charge of this bill whether this is a copy of the existing law?

Mr. FORNEY. It is.

Mr. RANDALL. In making up the bill the committee are required to comply with the existing law under the rule.

Mr. TAULBEE. I desire to make the point of order upon the amendment for the purpose of asking the gentleman who offered it to what committees these are to be assigned.

Mr. RANDALL. To all committees having need for them.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Speaker assigns them to such committees as require their services.

Mr. FORNEY. Any committee that has need for that service can employ these stenographers.

Mr. TAULBEE. I withdraw the point of order.

The question recurring upon the amendment of Mr. FORNEY, it was agreed to.

Mr. BURNES. I move to strike out, in line 2, the words "messenger to the Official Reporters," and in lieu thereof to insert the words "one Assistant Official Reporter under the Chief Official Reporter." The amount is left as it is in the bill, the only change proposed being one of phraseology. Mr. Philip McElhone, the incumbent of this office, is a young gentleman of education and special skill as a shorthand writer. He is perfectly competent to fill the position of Assistant Official Reporter under the Chief Official Reporter. He is familiar with the rules and business of the House, and is daily engaged in noting the filing and disposition of reports of committees. It would seem to be fair if he is to make this his profession he should receive the proper designation of Assistant Official Reporter with the hope and expectation of standing in the line of promotion by experience and ability to the higher position.

The membership of the House has largely increased, and there has been a corresponding increase in the business transacted, yet the Official Reporters remain the same while their duties continue to be of the most onerous, difficult, and responsible character. It would only seem to be just that the Chief Official Reporter should have this one assistant to afford him some relief in the discharge of his labors.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For miscellaneous items and expenses of special and select committees, including compensation at such a rate as may be fixed by the Committee on Accounts, but not exceeding $1.50 per printed page: To stenographers to committees, to be appointed by the Speaker on the application of committees, $20,000.

Mr. FORNEY. I move the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 16, line 16, strike out all after the word "committees" down to and including line 20, and insert "$20,000."

Mr. FORNEY. This makes the paragraph conform to the amendment just adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For Botanic Garden: For superintendent, $1,800; for assistants and laborers, under the direction of the Joint Library Committee of Congress, $9,900; for three additional laborers, at $1.25 per day each, $1,173.75; in all, $12,873.75.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I move to amend by striking out, in line 22, the word "twenty-five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifty;" so that it will read:

Three additional laborers, at $1.50 per day each.

Mr. FORNEY. I make the point of order that this changes existing law.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I hope the gentleman will allow me to be heard upon this amendment.

Mr. FORNEY. I think we had better proceed with the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must rule upon the point of order which is insisted upon by the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I move to strike out the last word. Of course I believe the present occupant of the chair considers himself right in his decision. Still it looks to me like a farce to ask the members of the House to sit here and go through this bill, which merely re-enacts the law passed by the last Congress—to listen to the reading of this bill and not be able to make a single amendment, even where it might appear proper to every member of this House. I believe that this decision of the Chair is wrong. And while I do not feel called upon myself to appeal from the decision of the Chair, I do hope that some other member, more versed than I am in parliamentary law, will at this stage of the consideration of the bill discuss the parliamentary question involved, and after discussion demand an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

In the consideration of this bill the ruling of the Chair in the Forty-ninth Congress was different, and, in my judgment, correct. Here is an amendment to pay a laborer $1.50 per day, the least that is paid for similar work in most of the cities. In New York and my own city the pay for the same kind of labor is often even more than that. To make a point of order on an amendment which will have the effect of only adding $234.75 to the total amount appropriated, raising the wages of men underpaid 25 cents per day, I will say, is rather a small piece of business on the part of the gentleman who made the point of order. I hope he will withdraw it in the interest of fair play to the wage-worker. We certainly ought to ask no man to work for this Government for the paltry sum of $1.25 per day.

Mr. FORNEY. I will state to the gentleman that laborers in my part of the country get less than $1.25 a day.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I now withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. PAYSON. I renew the substantial amendment made by the gentleman from New Jersey, to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifty." I ask the Clerk to read the paragraph as it would be so amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

For three additional laborers, at $1.50 a day each.

Mr. FORNEY. I make the point of order upon that amendment.

Mr. PAYSON. On the point of order I desire to say a few words.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. PAYSON. I was not present when the point of order was originally decided by the Chair, holding that these amendments were not in order. As I understand the ruling of the Chair—and if incorrect in that understanding I desire to be corrected—as I understand, the ruling of the Chair is tantamount to holding that whenever an appropriation bill is adopted by the House of Representatives, that is a continuing law for this country as long as the Government shall stand and the rules of the House shall not be changed. The rule of the House which it is claimed is impaired or infringed upon by this amendment, as I understand it, is this, that an amendment to an appropriation bill which changes existing law shall not be in order.

The point which will be urged against this amendment is that, under existing law, whatever laborers are employed in the Botanic Garden can only receive $1.25 per day. The error in that argument is that the provision in existing law ceases and is limited by the expiration of the pending year. I agree as to any laborer now employed in the Botanic Garden; his wages for the current year can not be reduced below $1.25, because a rule of the House provides that existing law shall not be changed in an appropriation bill. I submit to the Chair with all deference, and yet with earnest confidence, that the only existing law with reference to these men who are working for a dollar and a quarter a day at the Botanic Garden is the appropriation bill for the present year. When the present year shall end, when the 30th of June shall roll around, that is the end, not only of the law, but of the power to employ those men.

What is the existing law with reference to the men provided for or about to be provided for in this bill? There is none. This committee is making a law with reference to those men. That will be the law whenever what we do in committee shall be approved by the House.

It seems to me the statement of the proposition is the strongest argument we can have with reference to it. In this precise case what are we asked to do? By this bill and by the pending proposition we are asked to authorize the superintendent of the Botanic Garden after the 1st day of July to appoint three men. Except for the provisions of the bill we are now considering, he has no power to employ these men. He would be as powerless in regard to it as the President of the United States or any citizen of the Union. But in the law which we are proposing to enact, to become operative at the beginning of the next fiscal year, we provide for the details and say that three men shall be employed under the provisions of this bill and that those men when thus employed under this authority shall be paid $1.25 a day. I say that Congress has the power to order that those men shall be paid $1.50 a day. Suppose something should happen requiring that their services should be dispensed with (and I am in ignorance now how many are employed there)—suppose there should be an exigency of the service requiring, in the judgment of Congress, the employment of four men, or half a dozen men, it seems to me to go without saying that this Congress, looking at the necessities of the future as to the employés of the Botanic Garden, has the power to say not only what they shall be paid, but how many shall be employed. Otherwise it all comes back to the proposition, under the ruling of the Chair, that until there shall be a change in the rules of this House the annual appropriation bill fixes the status of every condition of employment under this Government as long as the nation shall stand, which to me is an utter absurdity.

A MEMBER. This appropriation commences in the future.

Mr. PAYSON. Of course it must commence in the future, because the "existing law" in connection with appropriations is simply the current law for the current fiscal year. What can be said against the proposition that there is no "existing law" as to the number of men that shall be employed in the Botanic Gardens after the 1st day of July or as to what they shall be paid?

Mr. REED. And the last House fixes all the expenditures of the present House.

Mr. PAYSON. Yes; and the First Congress of the United States fixes them for all time, on that theory.

Mr. REED. The House fixes it and deprives itself of the right to change it. I always thought the rule was absurd any way.

Mr. PAYSON. But this goes far beyond the rule. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I have made myself understood, I do not desire to say anything further at the outset; but the matter seems to me to be so clear that if the Chair insists upon its ruling I think the rule ought to be changed——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can but rule as the Chair thinks correct in the matter and as has been ruled heretofore. The Chair thinks, however, that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] states the ruling very much more strongly than the Chair intended it, or than has ever been ruled. The gentleman says that under the ruling the number of employés at the Botanic Garden could not be added to; and so the gentleman might lead on and say that there could not be any increase in the number of employés in any Department. The Chair never meant to announce any such opinion.

Mr. PAYSON. Then let me make a parliamentary inquiry for the purpose of understanding the ruling of the Chair. Does the Chair hold that it would be in order to move to increase the number of employés under the present appropriation bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that it is perfectly competent for the Committee on Appropriations, when they find that the Government needs an additional number of employés, to provide for them in the bill, as has always been done.

Mr. PAYSON. That is not the question I asked the Chair. My question was as to the power of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The CHAIRMAN. And the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union may do the same thing.

Mr. PAYSON. Then if the committee can make that change as to the number of employés, why may it not do the same with reference to their pay?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not care to get into a colloquy with the gentleman.

Mr. PAYSON. It is not a colloquy. I am making a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already given his views in stating his ruling.

Mr. REED. But does not the Chair perceive that the same line of reasoning which allows an increase in the number can also allow a change in the compensation?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think so.

Mr. REED. Because they are both a change of existing law, if one of them is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think so.

Mr. PAYSON. With all due respect to the Chair, I must ask the ruling of the committee on this point.

Mr. REED. The whole thing has its origin in a folly which has been prevalent in the House for ten or a dozen years past, the idea that the House of Representatives—its majority—is not to be trusted with the power to fix salaries; that it may lower them, but it may not raise them—an idea which always seemed to me to be a logical and practical absurdity, which never could justify itself to any intelligent person.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not ruled that the committee may lower salaries, but not raise them. The Chair has simply held that it is restrained by the rules of the House from any discretion in the matter of what shall go into appropriation bills in relation to the compensation of employés. When the compensation of any number of employés shall be once ascertained, then the salary has been fixed, and that is an indication of the legislative will.

Mr. REED. Will the Chair permit me a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair prefers not to make any ruling until the gentleman concludes. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. REED. Merely one suggestion. The point is, I suppose, as to "existing law." Now, the appropriation bill covers only a certain time, a certain year. How, then, can it be "existing law" with regard to an appropriation bill which proposes to cover another year? There has always been my difficulty about calling these appropriation bills existing law. I can understand that where a statute has deliberately fixed for all future time, until repealed, the salary of an office, it would be a violation of existing law for the House, under its present rules, to permit a change upon an appropriation bill. But where there is only an appropriation bill, which is existing law for the time being, and can not be the existing law quoad the time to which the appropriation bill is to apply, I can not see how a point under the rules can be based upon a mere temporary provision in such prior law. This is the point I wished to bring before the Chair. I have not been attending to the present discussion, and very possibly the same point has been already made.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. The provision of the rule is that "no appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be offered as an amendment thereto, for an expenditure not previously authorized by law." Now, I wish to inquire whether the Committee on Appropriations may report to this House in an appropriation bill matter which would not be proper by way of amendment in the Committee of the Whole?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I understood the ruling of the Chair was the other way.

Mr. LAWLER. Mr. Chairman, upon examining this bill very carefully yesterday, I was very much surprised to find that any committee of this House should in a bill like this propose that men working in a city like Washington should receive for their work only $1.25 a day. I take it upon myself to say that there is no member of this House, however economically he may manage his expenditures, who is not called upon to take out of his pocket daily for merely incidental expenses $1.25; yet we propose this sum as the whole per diem compensation for men who are to labor for the Government.

Mr. FORNEY. I will remind the gentleman that the appropriation here proposed is the same that has been made heretofore.

Mr. LAWLER. That may be; but I take the position that this parsimonious way of paying the humbler employés of the Government is one of the causes of our troubles to-day. I have listened very patiently while gentlemen on this side and on the other side have recently, by their speeches on this floor, declared their feelings toward the toilers of the country; and I was gratified at the expressions which I heard uttered. But when I look over this bill, I can see the attempt to carry out right here in this city class legislation of the most objectionable character. Gentlemen here who find themselves scarcely able to live at a less expense than $4,000 or $5,000 a year, are so generous as to propose that the humble laborers of the Government shall support themselves and families on a compensation of $1.25 a day.

Now, I say to members of the House who during the last thirty days have been expressing themselves with so much feeling in behalf of the toilers of the country, that here is a splendid opportunity to show what we are willing to do practically in that direction; and I propose to put every member of this House on record. I say that these men ought to have $2 a day. [Applause.] It is a crying shame that members of this House who have some knowledge of the cost of living in this city of Washington, and who provide in other portions of this bill princely salaries for high officials of the Government, should ask any human being to work for the Government for $1.25 a day. I protest against it; and I ask that this allowance for men employed in the Botanical Garden be made $2 a day instead of $1.25. I ask unanimous consent of this Committee of the Whole that that change be made. I want to see any gentleman get up and object to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. I object to it.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Chairman, I understand there is a question of order pending which must be decided before the proposition of my colleague [Mr. LAWLER] can be entertained. I assure him that he has my thorough sympathy in a great deal of what he has been saying——

Mr. LAWLER. I understood that the Chair rendered his opinion on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustained the point of order.

Mr. LONG. Under the Chair's ruling the question is, what is the existing law? That, I understand the Chair to say, is concluded, in the absence of a general statute, by the appropriation bill of last year. And, looking at the appropriation bill of last year, its provisions make the rate of wages $1.25 a day for the current fiscal year ending the 1st of July next, but there is no provision for the future. The existing law, therefore, is $1.25 a day until July 1, and nothing after that time. The Chair's ruling, therefore, leads to the absurdity, you can make no provision at all for the next year, because that would change existing law, which now provides nothing for next year. It is a reductio ad absurdum.

Mr. FORNEY. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. PAYSON. It might as well be decided now as at any other time. I insist on the motion to amend.

Mr. FORNEY. I have withdrawn the amendment.

Mr. PAYSON. The amendment I move is to increase the pay of these three men from $1.25 to $1.50 a day. Now, it does seem to me that is asking a great deal of the laboring men of this city who work for the Government and put in the necessary time to constitute a day's work and to receive the pay of only $1.25. It seems to me opposition to this simple increase to the laboring men of this country comes with poor grace from those who have no hesitancy whatever in increasing salaries ranging from $500 to $1,000 on the part of men upon whom are imposed the arduous duties of sitting and waiting at the different doors of this room and of the gallery. [Laughter.] The idea of economy, which seems to have been adopted in the Committee on Appropriations, is to cut down the wages of men who do actual work to $1.25 a day. I do not believe the House will sustain any such action, in view of appropriations contained in the pending bill.

Mr. RANDALL. The Committee on Appropriations do not anywhere cut down the wages of workingmen. On the contrary, in many places the wages of the laborers have been increased.

Mr. PAYSON. They certainly have not been increased in this instance.

Mr. FORNEY. There is a fund of $9,900 out of which laborers are paid, ranging from $1.50 to $3 a day each. These three additional laborers were provided for at $1.25 a day each, because the Superintendent of the Botanical Garden asked for their employment at that rate. Out of the slush fund of $9,900 he can pay $3 or $5 as he pleases, according to the service rendered; but I presume these three laborers are required to be permanently employed at $1.25 a day each. They are required to roll wheelbarrows and to do like work around the grounds.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I moved to strike out $1.25 and insert $1.50, because I did not think this economical House would agree to give $2 a day, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LAWLER]; but I now move to strike out $1.25 and insert $2 a day. It must be remembered that expenses in the city of Washington are considerably higher than they are elsewhere or than they were here fifteen years ago. Rents have considerably increased in that time, and I do not see how it is possible for a man to get along for a less sum than $2 a day.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

The House divided; and there were—ayes 65, noes 20.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COBB. I move to amend by striking out the whole paragraph in reference to these three laborers at $2 a day; and I desire to state the reasons why I do so. This committee has already provided for the usual number of laborers under the appropriation of $9,900, and in making this provision it is to be presumed the committee which reported the bill understood the character and amount of labor necessary to be had, and provided in this sum adequate compensation therefor. It is to be presumed that the committee covered all the labor necessary to be performed at the Botanical Garden. Therefore, why is it necessary to put in a provision for three additional laborers as is done in this paragraph? Because I deem that to be unnecessary I have moved to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. LAWLER. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the gentleman from Alabama is actuated by motives of economy, or if he is against the allowance of this special amount being paid to these employés. There must have been a necessity for their getting into this bill, for I can promise my friend from Alabama that the committee who reported it never would have carried them in its pages if they had not deemed that necessity to exist. If I could understand the purpose that actuates my friend and the principles that govern him in moving to strike this out after the House of Representatives has made the increase that was asked for from $1.25 a day up to $2 a day, then I could respond to the gentleman's position.

Mr. COBB. I will state to the gentleman my object in making the motion. I am in favor of the employment of such labor as may be necessary at whatever pay is proper and right to be given for the services rendered. Under the provisions of this bill, immediately preceding the words which I propose to strike out, the power is given to the superintendent of the Botanical Garden to employ at any reasonable price or at the market price such labor as he may require, even if it costs three or five dollars a day. By the words I move to strike out he is limited, as to the three laborers, to the compensation named—$2 per day. He could not pay more, even if the market price demanded it.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Do you know whether it is necessary or unnecessary to employ these additional laborers?

Mr. COBB. I know nothing in regard to the matter, except what I hear from the chairman of the committee.

Mr. LEHLBACH. But the committee say it is necessary. Now if they say it is not necessary to employ the three additional laborers, then strike that from the bill. But do not put the House in the false position (because they were generous enough to advance the rate of wages from $1.25 a day to $2 a day) of striking it out altogether from the bill, although the gentleman may be willing to do that. That would put the House in a false position.

Mr. COBB. No, the gentleman is putting me in a false position by assuming that I am opposed to the specified per diem pay. I am perfectly willing that these laborers, if employed at all, shall be paid the sum of $2 a day, as has just been determined by this House to be proper and right. I have no objection whatever to that. It is not opposition to such compensation that prompts me to submit the motion. But I do say that the superintendent ought to be allowed, under the preceding provisions of the bill, to go into the market and employ all needed labor at whatever price it commands, even if such price be $3 a day, and to employ just such labor as is necessary to carry on the work. It would be class legislation for the Government to give more for labor than it is reasonably worth—more than it commands in a fair market, uninfluenced by unusual surroundings or disturbances.

Mr. LAWLER. I want to say to the gentleman right here and now that the tax-payers of this country are paying millions of dollars for salaries of persons whose services we could get in the market at a much less rate, and save to the people of this country that large sum which we now expend.

This bill, which he gracefully votes for, proposes in some instances the payment of thousands of dollars a year in the way of salaries to certain individuals, and yet the gentleman proposes to strike from this very bill an item for the employment of three additional laborers at $2 per day.

Mr. Chairman, I have refrained from taking any very active part in the business during the present session up to this time, but I give notice that the agitation going on now in this country and all over it arises from the very condition of the class legislation which is found in such bills as this. I repeat that it is a crime and a shame that gentlemen who draw from the tax-payers of this country $5,000 for salary each year will ask a man to live on $1.25 a day in a city like Washington, or any other city in the United States, as a laborer or employé of this Government. On general principles I believe that no laborer ought to be employed under $2 a day.

But my issue is on the general principle involved without regard to the three men here at all. We are met always with the statement that "the city is filled with laborers, and let us take advantage of them and employ them at $1 a day or less if we can get them."

Gentlemen, that is all wrong. I know in my district there are gentlemen who would give $10,000, yea $20,000, to hold the position I am occupying here to-day [laughter], and they would make a present to some charitable institution of the salary of this office; and I believe the same can be applied to every district to-day in this country. Now, you pay a Congressman $5,000 a year, and we come here gracefully and draw our $5,000, like little men, and vote $5,000 here without question as salary for a few hours a day to other men, besides giving them carriage hire and feed for horse, and we give them servants, and take it all out of the blood of the man who is compelled to labor to beautify the city and keep it in a healthful and attractive condition, and ask him at the same time to render his services to the Government for a dollar and twenty-five or a dollar and fifty cents a day. I say this Congress must commence somewhere to make an equalization of all such things, and now is as good a time as ever, and this bill is the very place. Hence I hope the gentleman will not press his motion.

Mr. COBB. I would like to be heard for a moment in response to the gentleman. I do not propose, Mr. Chairman, to be placed in any false attitude in regard to the question here presented. I am perfectly willing to meet any responsibility that may be cast upon me as a member of this House by my action upon this or any other question. If the gentleman had paid attention to what I said, if, indeed, I have been fortunate enough to make myself understood, he would have found that it was not against, but absolutely in the interest of, the very laborers for whom he speaks, that I was arguing.

There is no limit necessary to be fixed here. Here is an appropriation which, it is to be presumed, is sufficient to cover all the labor that is reasonably necessary to be employed in and about this business. If it is necessary to employ labor, and if that labor is worth $3 a day, it is unjust to fix it in this bill at $2 a day.

Mr. LAWLER. Let me say to the gentleman that the superintendent made, as I understand, a statement to the Committee on Appropriations that it was necessary to have these three additional men.

Mr. COBB. The chairman of the committee has just said that the superintendent had this matter incorporated in a former appropriation bill out of abundant caution, lest, on account of some emergency, he would not have a sufficient appropriation to do the work in and about the botanical department. And on account of the emergency that might possibly happen—whether it has ever happened or not we are not informed—this provision for the employment of three laborers was put in the appropriation bill some years ago.

Now, I want to say that I am willing to strike out the whole section. I am opposed to this whole botanical business. I am opposed to this conservatory affair we have that does none of our constituents any good. What have we got here? We have something that we call the botanical department; and what does it do? You are permitted to go there if you have the time—I have not gone there yet, but they tell me such is the case—and you find stuck away under glass various and sundry kinds of flowers; some, I believe, they call orchids, that cost from $200 to $1,000 apiece.

What good they do to anybody I have not yet been informed. Where they are sent, if anywhere, I am not advised. As to who gets the benefit of them I know nothing. I do know, sir, that your constituents and mine who pay the costs of their cultivation receive no good from them. I know that fact well. So far as this whole thing is concerned I am unalterably opposed to it, and if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LAWLER] is on the line of economy and for the protection of the interests of laborers, and of his constituents, I will cheerfully join with him in voting to strike this whole section out of the bill. This would be legislation in the direction of reducing taxation, or, at least, of economy in expenditure, which makes reduction of taxes possible and hence in the interest of labor.

Mr. LAWLER. What would then become of my colleague [Mr. SPRINGER] and his bouquet every day? [Laughter.]

Mr. COBB. Mr. Chairman, I am just informed why it is that this Botanic Garden is kept in existence. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LAWLER] is correct it is for the purpose of supplying his colleague with the bouquets he wears on the lappel of his coat.

Mr. SPRINGER. I never got a bouquet there in my life.

Mr. COBB. The reason I do not make the motion to strike out the whole section is this: Some time ago I was talking to a gentleman on this floor and was asking about this flower business. Being a new member, and, like other new members, not used to these extra performances, and being in favor of and committed to retrenchment and reform, I asked him why it is we need a botanical department; what good it does to any body; especially what good does it do to my and his laboring constituents who never saw one of these elegant orchids or like expensively cultivated flowers?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MONTGOMERY was recognized and yielded his time to Mr. COBB.

Mr. COBB. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy. The gentleman I was talking to was an old member, who had been here many years. I asked him about all this, and I told him it did not seem to me to be exactly in the direction of retrenchment and reform. He was a Democrat, too. [Cries of "Name him!"] I told the gentleman that I was a very modest man. I assumed that. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. You are making a violent assumption.

Mr. COBB. Well, be that as it may, I asked the gentleman in consideration of my supposed modesty, to attack the useless business, or if he would not, as he seemed not disposed to do so, to advise me how best to proceed in making such attack. He suggested, "Wait until the appropriation bill comes in, and then you can get a chance at it; but I warn you to let it severely alone." I told him I felt constrained to make some effort in so good a cause, and that when the appropriation bill was reported I intended adopting his suggestion to move to strike out any appropriation for the botanical department, and thus starve it out. What do you suppose was his reply—the reply of a Democrat in favor of retrenchment and reform? He said, "If you do, you are a fool." [Great laughter.]

Mr. STRUBLE. Let the name of the genius be known.

Mr. COBB. He gave a good reason for his assertion. He said, "When I came into Congress I was just as green as you are." [Laughter.] He went on to say, "I thought just as you do, that a man ought to bring his common honesty with him when he comes into the House of Representatives, and not leave it all at home; and that he should look around to see what is best to be done to carry on the Government in the most economical manner consistent with the greatest efficiency in the service, and I thought about this thing, too, and I made this effort, and they laughed at me and called me just what I say you will be if you make the effort." [Laughter.] I asked him what was the use of the thing. "Well," he said, "the members are entitled to go there, the favorite ones—not every fellow" [laughter]—I found that out afterwards [laughter]—"they are entitled to go there, and get bouquets."

You see, Mr. Chairman, he was going upon the idea, and I expect it is a very just one, that a first-termer has not much standing in this House [laughter]; that there is not much use for him here until it is seen whether he is going to be indorsed by his constituents or not. And really I am not sure that my friend was very far wrong in such ideas, or that it is not assumed that the first-termer is a "fool" until it is ascertained whether his constituents think otherwise.

Mr. STRUBLE. That is, whether his constituents are fools. [Laughter.]

Mr. COBB. Perhaps so, only I can not consent that my constituents are entitled to such designation under any circumstances.

Mr. WEBER. Till they find out whether he is going to fight these appropriations.

Mr. COBB. Yes, sir; all improper appropriations.

Mr. WEBER. Well, you are all right from this time on.

Mr. COBB. I am just telling you what my friend told me about the uses of this concern—this Botanic Garden.

Mr. PETERS. You will have no trouble hereafter in obtaining flowers. [Laughter.]

Mr. COBB. No; that is one thing I am doing this speaking for. [Renewed laughter.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TAULBEE. I move to strike out the last word, and I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to consume the time of this committee unnecessarily, but I am not quite through telling what my friend told me about this garden.

Mr. LAWLER. Go ahead and tell it.

Mr. COBB. I do not believe I will tell the rest of it.

Mr. LAWLER. Oh, yes.

Mr. COBB. He was just giving me a history of the uses of the garden.

Mr. LAWLER. I want that information myself.

Mr. COBB. Well, he said, "There are beautiful bouquets that go out from that garden to favored members, but where they go after they reach the possession of the members I can not tell; only I know they do not go to members whose wives are with them." [Great laughter.]

Mr. FORNEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a pending motion by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. COBB. I withdraw that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to strike out is withdrawn. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] can now send up his amendment.

Mr. FORNEY. I send the amendment to the desk, and ask to have it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 18, strike out all of line 21 and the lines following down to and including line 25, and in lieu thereof insert "$13,100."

Mr. FORNEY. The effect of that amendment will be this. Under the head of Botanic Garden is this provision:

For Botanic Garden: For superintendent, $1,800; for assistants and laborers, under the direction of the Joint Library Committee of Congress, $9,900; for three additional laborers, at $1.25 per day each, $1,173.75; in all, $12,873.75.

The committee will notice that this is all under the direction of the Joint Committee on the Library. By striking out what this amendment proposes to strike out there is given a net sum, so that the pay of the laborers will be under the control of the joint committee, and the amount embraces the pay of three laborers at $2 a day.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to inquire first of the gentleman having the bill in charge upon what per diem basis this computation as to the pay of the day laborers is founded?

Mr. FORNEY. That is to be left to the Joint Committee on the Library. But if the gentleman will notice, $9,900 is given for the pay of assistants and the laborers, under the direction of the Joint Library Committee. Now, in addition to that, the superintendent asked some time during the last Congress for an additional force of three laborers, at $1.25 a day, but the House has just decided that they should have $2 a day; so we have made a computation at that rate, and have increased the amount to that extent.

Mr. PAYSON. But the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama does not place any restriction upon the committee as to the wages which shall be paid, though in the computation of the amount allowed $2 a day may have been the basis. To place the matter beyond question, I move this amendment:

Provided, That the wages of no day laborer shall be less than $2 per diem.

I offer this as an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. FORNEY. I think this matter should be left to the joint committee of Congress and to the superintendent.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Civil Service Commission:

For three commissioners, at $3,500 each; one chief examiner, $3,000; one secretary, $2,000; one clerk of class 4, who shall be a stenographer; one clerk of class 3; one clerk of class 2; one clerk of class 1; one clerk, at $1,000; two clerks, at $900 each; one messenger; and one laborer; in all, $25,800.

For necessary traveling expenses, including those of examiners acting under the direction of the commission, $4,000.

Mr. TAULBEE (during the reading). I desire to inquire whether these salaries are in conformity with existing law.

Mr. HOLMAN. Exactly.

Mr. FORNEY. They correspond with the appropriation bill for the present year.

The Clerk having concluded the reading of the paragraphs,

Mr. McCOMAS said: I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 20, in line 9, strike out "one" and insert "two."

In line 10 strike out "one" and insert "two;" and also strike out "one," after the words "class one," and insert "two."

In line 16 strike out "$4,000" and insert "$5,000."

Mr. McCOMAS. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in this amendment is to give the Civil Service Commission three additional clerks, as asked for by the commission, and also $1,000 additional asked for by them as traveling expenses.

It will, perhaps, surprise members of the House when I remark that the last printed report of the Civil Service Commission was published in 1886. That was the year when President Cleveland, for the last time, commended the civil service, in his language, to "the jealous care of Congress." But since August, 1886, there has been a great change, and now the best avenue to the applause of the other side of the House is to throw up your hat and cry "To the victors belong the spoils!" This slogan brings down the Congressional applause across the aisle every time.

The President himself seems to be now so much concerned in other matters that unless we on this side of the Chamber, whose party inaugurated the civil-service reform, take care of it, it will be stabbed and wounded after it has been left for dead already by the Administration now in power. It is not dead, but will survive this spoils Administration, and triumph ultimately.

I send to the desk to be read an extract which I have marked, wherein with precision one of the noblest, one of the foremost Democrats of this country defines the relation of the President to revenue reform and to civil-service reform, to which the President no longer gives "jealous care."

The Clerk read as follows:

Finally, we think that the legitimate relations of the President to the two subjects of reform are not by any means identical. When he postpones the purification of the Federal service to advise Congress how to purify the tariff he neglects what is emphatically his own business to meddle in what is primarily the business of others. "Dr. Cleveland" is slighting his patient to obtrude his opinions on another physician. No doubt he ought to be called into consultation, and no doubt the other doctor has shown himself utterly incompetent, but this does not excuse him. He was elected as an executive officer; it is the duty of such an officer to choose faithful and competent subordinates; and however excellent may be the counsel he gives the National Legislature, if he abandons the public service to inefficiency and corruption while he urges it on them, he is committing a mortal sin to do a work of supererogation.

Mr. Chairman, this language, which appears in the Civil Service Reformer, published in Baltimore, I believe to be from the pen of one of the purest and best men in this country. It is, in my belief, the felicitous utterance of the ablest, though not the foremost, Democrat in Maryland.

Several MEMBERS on the Democratic side. Who is he?

Mr. McCOMAS. I have not named him. My belief does not warrant the use of his name. If you will inquire you will find out who he is and what he is, and that I have justly called him a Democrat. I am ready to whisper to my friends in private on the other side the name of this Democrat who justly says that the President is "committing a mortal sin" to do "a work of supererogation."

I ask favorable consideration for the amendment I have offered, to increase the number of clerks of the Civil Service Commission, which has not been able to have published any reports since August, 1886, and which now says that additional clerks are needed for the proper and prompt performance of the steadily-increasing clerical work of that Department. I wish to enable the members of this commission to investigate in different parts of the country the operation of Democratic civil-service reform; and in this connection I wish particularly to see the $1,000 additional appropriated for traveling expenses, so that the members of the commission may at least go to New York and find out how it was that in the campaign of 1885 Democratic custom-house officials raised a campaign fund of $2,000 in a raffle over the Widow McGinnis's pig. [Laughter.] I think this $1,000 will enable the commission to find out the paternity and proprietorship of that pig, and how assessments in the coming campaign can be raised by levies on office-holders, and how many dollars are to be subscribed for each pig in the various custom-houses this fall. In this investigation $1,000 may count for a great deal. I ask for a vote on my amendment. I hope to see it carried even in this House.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to discuss the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS], because I suppose it was not offered with any intention of having it adopted.

Mr. McCOMAS. With the desire, but not with the hope.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I presume they were offered in order to secure the opportunity of making the remarks which the gentleman has made. It is needless now to discuss the merits of the system.

It has been a disappointment to the partisan Republican politicians and editors that President Cleveland has faithfully and honestly carried out the civil-service law according to its letter and spirit, whereas the preceding Republican administration disregarded its provisions. [Applause.]

Gentlemen may criticise this statement, but I wish to give some figures which will satisfy this House and the country the present Administration has faithfully executed the law and that its action is in commendable contrast with the action of the Republican party when it was in power. [Applause.]

This law was approved January 16, 1883. From January 16, 1883, to January 16, 1884, there were forty-eight appointments to places within the classified service in the Departments at Washington. From January 16, 1884, to January 15, 1885, there were four hundred and thirty-two, including ninety pension examiners not apportioned by the commission. This was during the preceding administration, and shows a greater number of appointments in one year than have been made in that service within any twelve months of the present Administration.

Then from January 16, 1885, to January 16, 1886, the first year of this Administration, including a month and a half of the former administration, there were in all two hundred and thirty-nine appointments, eighteen of these before the 4th of March, 1885. From January 16, 1886, to January 16, 1887, there were three hundred and ninety-one, and from January 16, 1887, to June 30, 1887, there were one hundred and fifty-five. From June 30, 1887, to May 24, 1888, there were three hundred and forty-one. The removals have been less than the numbers I have given, because these numbers indicate all appointments, whether to fill vacancies caused by removal, death, or resignation, or to fill new offices created by law.

Within the twelve months preceding the incoming of the present Administration, the last Republican administration made more removals than have been made in any one year under the existing Democratic Administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And that, too, after you had possession of the Government and control of all appointments throughout the country for twenty-five years. No stronger proof could be asked on the part of the people of the fidelity with which the President has executed the civil-service law. [Applause.]

It shows also an excess in the twelve months preceding the present Administration of removals of your own appointees, turning out those who held office and replacing them by others, no doubt of the same political faith. That period covered the Presidential campaign, during which it was necessary, I suppose, to reward those who were expected to work for the Republican cause. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCCOMAS rose.

Mr. CLEMENTS. The gentleman from Maryland will excuse me, as I have but a few moments, and have not a minute to spare.

There have been, since the civil-service law went into effect, appointments in the graded service in Washington in the Departments numbering sixteen hundred and seven. As I have already stated, that includes a little more than two years of the previous administration, during which about five hundred of these appointments were made. Allow for new positions created and vacancies by reason of death and resignation, and the actual removals fall far short of this number. Of the thousands of employés in all the Departments here, it is evident that there have been far less than one thousand removals within the classified service. This, I submit, is a very small number considering the kind of material by which the Departments had been largely filled during the twenty-five years of Republican rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I am obliged to the gentleman from Arkansas for his courtesy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us see how the law was carried out under the preceding administration. When this Administration came into power, of the various boards of examiners not only in the city of Washing but in all the customs districts throughout the country, as well as in all the post-offices controlled by the civil-service law, and there are quite a number of them, there were only two boards upon which there was a single Democrat, one here and one in the city of Philadelphia.

The Secretaries were of the same party. Thus the officials requesting certification of eligibles and choosing therefrom, as well as those conducting the examinations, grading applicants, and certifying eligibles, were all of the same party. The excuse rendered for this state of things was that the law required the boards to be composed of persons in the service, and that suitable persons who were Democrats could not be found. This, I have no doubt, was true, for they were not admitted to the service. There was not even a pretense of fairness in this.

In the New York custom-house there were in the five years preceding 1882 sixteen hundred and seventy eight removals and appointments, which is a larger number than all the appointments which had been made in the departmental service here under the administration of this law on account of removals, deaths, and resignations.

The President has in good faith kept his pledges and executed the law and all that has been promised in relation to the civil service. We hear complaints about the removal of postmasters who are not controlled by this law, and I find that on yesterday the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] complained that papers were filed in the Departments here against officials of this class who were not allowed to see them in order to prepare and file answers. He denounced the practice as one of the most outrageous invasions of common right and common fairness ever witnessed in any land or in any age. This is no new practice. It has been the practice ever since the Government has existed. It is not peculiar to this Administration by any means.

He might go through the Departments, and if he took pains to look he would find that under all administrations charges have been filed and are on file, complaints in the archives against incumbents of offices; and it never was proposed, until the gentleman by his bill introduced here proposed it, to convert all of the Departments into courts to hear charges and answers of gentlemen contesting for places.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman will do me the justice to say that my bill does not propose to take anybody into court; and my experience and observation are diametrically opposite to what the gentleman states to be the fact.

Mr. CLEMENTS. The gentleman proposes in his bill to make a radical change, to break down this practice, and I say that the practice has been the same ever since the organization of the Government in regard to the filing of such charges.

Mr. BUCHANAN. And I repeat that my experience and observations are diametrically opposed to the gentleman's.

Mr. CLEMENTS. And the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS] a few moments ago alluded to some practices in 1875 in New York. Now, I want to read——

Mr. MCCOMAS. I said 1885.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I want to read some letters illustrating the Republican machine methods bearing date of 1885. I send one to the desk.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TAULBEE moved to strike out the last word, and yielded his time to Mr. CLEMENTS.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I am very much obliged to the gentleman. I ask the Clerk to read now the letter I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

HEADQUARTERS REPUBLICAN STATE COMMITTEE,
Philadelphia, September 2, 1885.

DEAR SIR: We desire an early subscription to the State committee, and as liberal as you can afford to make it. If the Republicans of Pennsylvania win a decisive victory this year it will prevent any agitation or disastrous change of the tariff by the incoming Congress and pave the way for the overthrow of the Democratic State and national administrations. We propose to push the work of the State committee with the utmost vigor until election day. Please send your subscription as early as possible, by check, money-order, or call at headquarters.

Yours, very truly,

THOS. V. COOPER, Chairman.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I now ask him to read this one.

The Clerk read as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, October 10, 1885.

MY DEAR SIR: We ask you as an active and generous Republican to promptly aid the Republican State committee to whatever extent you may feel able. You can send by check, post-office order, or call in person at headquarters, St. Cloud Hotel, where a correct and private financial record is kept. Prompt aid will insure a victory in Pennsylvania, which, with that now surely promised in New York, will maintain Republican ascendency in the United States Senate, insure the election of our governor and Legislature next year, and pave the way to Republican supremacy in 1888.

Very truly, yours,

THOS. V. COOPER.

Mr. CLEMENTS. These letters were written to parties in the employ of the Government in the post-office and custom-house at Philadelphia. I have some letters here written to other employés, but I will not take the time of the committee to read more of them. The Republican party became so in the habit—under the system of "Jay Hubbellism," and sanctioned by the Republican committee of which Mr. HALE was a member (notwithstanding he proposes now to complain because the President made removals without the limits of civil service)—of assessing the employés of the Government from the least to the greatest, that when the civil-service act became a law and went into practical operation they did not cease their old habits; and I suppose to-day that the great majority of those remaining in the Departments at Washington and in the custom-houses and post-offices and other public offices throughout the country, who remain still loyal to the old party, are contributing their proportion to its success.

But simply because the President has seen proper to extend this law and the spirit of the law beyond the mere letter, but has made removals of postmasters and others, gentlemen have gone to great pains to collect data to show how many removals have been made. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS] just said that this law was passed by a Republican Congress; that it was their law. Why then complain that a Democratic President has seen proper to make removals which you did not embrace within the law? Why object to his carrying it out? Can the gentleman point to a single instance on the part of the present Administration where a violation of the law or any rule under it has taken place?

Mr. REED. Did he not write a letter extending the status somewhat?

Mr. CLEMENTS. What does the gentleman say?

Mr. REED. Did he not write a letter extending the status of the law somewhat? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. CLEMENTS. I understand——

Mr. REED. And about the same time he wrote the silver letter, you remember?

Mr. CLEMENTS. He did, and I will add that he did not say to Mr. Curtis, "Burn this letter." [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. REED. Now, will the gentleman answer my question? He has stated what he did not do. Will he state what he did do?

Mr. CLEMENTS. The President has written letters. What letter does the gentleman from Maine refer to?

Mr. REED. I have stated it. I spoke of the letter enlarging civil-service reform, and the silver letter dated about the same time.

Mr. CLEMENTS. The President did say that the spirit of this law could with great propriety be applied to officers without its limits, and he has extended its application so as to retain in office a large per cent. of the postmasters, postal clerks, and other officers. After the election of President Cleveland and before his inauguration the Republican administration changed the classification in the Departments, extending it upward and downward so as to include all employés as near as possible, but the propriety of this was not seen by them until after the election.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McCOMAS. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CLEMENTS] is the chairman of the Committee on Civil Service Reform under the administration of President Cleveland. It was his office, and not mine, to introduce the amendment which I have sent to the desk, and yet my friend has not said one word in behalf of civil-service reform. Every word he has said has been in extenuation of the abuses of which I complain, and which this law was enacted to prevent. I care less which party was right or wrong long ago, and more to know which will do right to-day.

Mr. Chairman, my colleague on the Appropriations Committee and the chairman of the Civil Service Committee at the same time, the gentleman from Georgia, ought to be the first man to give this Civil Service Commission all the aid it needs; but he points away back yonder how, in some other year, some people were removed, and I may safely deny the accuracy, as I deny the relevancy, of his old Silurian excavation; but it is strange he forgets that President Cleveland, in the letter which he ought to have burned, in view of what has taken place since, said the benefits of the law should be extended and its usefulness increased, and commended it to the liberal care and jealous protection of Congress, and straightway proceeded to remove almost every Presidential postmaster, all of the lower-class postmasters except about 12 per cent., all the foreign ministers and secretaries of legation, nearly all the consuls, the collectors of customs, the naval officers of customs, the appraisers, the assistant treasurers of the subtreasuries, the collectors of internal revenue, the district attorneys, the Territorial governors, the pension agents nearly all swept clean—a change of 100,000 office-holders.

Mr. TAULBEE. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. McCOMAS. Wait a moment. Peace; be still! My friend from Georgia talks of one year—some years ago. I say in a whole century, even under Jackson and under Van Buren, there has not been such a clean sweep as under Cleveland of Federal officers, with this difference, that fifty years ago the clean sweep was with brutal frankness, while under Mr. Cleveland it is done under the phylactery of the most colossal hypocrisy that ever was worn by a lord high executioner.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri, Mr. McKINNEY, and Mr. TAULBEE rose to interrupt Mr. McCOMAS.

Mr. McCOMAS. One at a time, gentlemen.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. If your party should regain office, would you not be in favor of cleaning out every Democrat?

Mr. McCOMAS. No, sir; the good of the public I would place before the greed of the party. I hope and believe when the Republican platform is framed that the Republican party will indorse a candidate and a platform squarely and boldly in favor of civil-service reform and its extension to other offices. But you gentlemen who came into power under the cry "turn the rascals out," have deceived nobody but the dyspeptic Mugwumps who, believing first in free trade, bartered away for it civil-service reform. And so your President every day is committing mortal sin in abandoning civil service to tinker with the tariff to the destruction of American labor and American interests.

Mr. TAULBEE. Let me suggest to the gentleman——

Mr. McCOMAS. The suggestions of the gentleman from Kentucky are so frequent and so verbose that my five minutes would expire before he got them in.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS] has expired.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois, rose.

Mr. TAULBEE. I only wanted the floor long enough to suggest——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. It seems to me we are wandering a little from the proper line of debate on the amendment of my friend from Maryland. I confess to some little surprise at the argument made by the chairman of the Committee on Civil Service Reform. This amendment proposes to restore the amount claimed by the Civil Service Commission, in order that they may efficiently discharge their duty. The book of estimates before me shows they represented to the Committee on Appropriations that in order to properly discharge their duties and carry out this law in its spirit and in its letter it was necessary to have an appropriation of $36,160; and yet we find that the Committee on Appropriations, of which the chairman of the Committee on Civil Service Reform is a member, cut that appropriation down to a little over $25,000—less than three-quarters of the amount that was actually asked.

When the attention of the House is called to this fact, instead of the chairman of the committee, who, we would suppose, would desire to see this law carried out in its true spirit—instead of his getting up here and aiding his colleague on the Committee on Appropriations to have this amendment made, he opposes it, and attempts to evade the issue by claiming that the Republicans did something wrong some years ago.

Now, sir, in the trial of causes in court I never have known it to be regarded as a good defense for a criminal to say that somebody else had done the same thing that he was accused of doing. If the Republicans have not carried out the law, as these parties claim, why do not the Democrats live up to their own professions, made when they were voted into power, and carry out this law, as the Mugwumps were led to believe they would do when they aided them with their votes? Why does not the chairman of this committee help to carry out this law, by coming to the aid of the commissioners and voting this appropriation through? Look at the Calendars of this House. What day has been assigned to the Committee on Civil-Service Reform for the purpose of giving us better laws to aid this commission in weeding out the corruption that is showing itself every day under this Democratic Administration?

A MEMBER. Where?

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Where! On every hand; in the custom-house at New York, in Pennsylvania, in the State of Illinois. Why, look at the post-offices at Indianapolis and Philadelphia. Where! The trouble is that you can not find a Democratic office-holder who is carrying out this system as the party agreed to carry it out when Mr. Cleveland was placed in the executive chair. If the newspaper reports are to be believed, Mr. Cleveland's Federal office-holders have captured the State convention of Pennsylvania, and have muzzled the representatives of the people. The same thing has been done in the State of Illinois. The leader of the delegation to the St. Louis convention, where it is planned that the President is to be renominated, is a Federal office-holder. Yet this is a reform administration, and this is the way that the civil-service law is being carried out!

Mr. LAWLER. We will wipe out the law, if that will suit the gentleman any better. [Laughter.]

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] complains that a Democratic President has not enforced the civil-service law. The first civil-service law was passed during the administration of President Grant, and the Republicans, in charge of both Houses of Congress, afterwards repealed that law by refusing to appropriate money to carry it out. Thus failed that first attempt at civil-service reform. A Republican Committee on Appropriations starved it to death.

In this House a Democratic committee has reported an appropriation sufficient to carry out the law and enforce it as Democratic committees have done ever since a Democratic President came into office.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him, I find in the Book of Estimates, in a note, a statement as to the additional clerk-hire needed for the proper and prompt performance of the steadily-increasing clerical labor of the commission.

Mr. HERBERT. Yes, sir; and so the gentleman will find that every Department of this Government, I think I might say almost without exception, asks of Committees on Appropriations larger sums every year than it really needs or than it expects to get. The Democratic party is responsible to the country, and Democratic committees scarcely ever appropriate according to the extravagant estimates sent in, and so estimates are always sent in with a margin to cut down. But if enough was appropriated last year to carry out and enforce the law during the current year, and undoubtedly that is so, and if the committee recommends the same sum now, I fail to see how any gentleman can say we are failing to support the civil-service law.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HERBERT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Is it your understanding that the Appropriations Committee desired to carry out in all its letter and spirit the civil-service law, and made an appropriation with direct reference to that law?

Mr. HERBERT. I do not know what may have been the motive of the majority of the committee; I can only judge by their conduct, and this I do know: They have not done as a Republican Committee on Appropriations did under President Grant; they have not refused any appropriation at all for carrying out the civil-service law.

Mr. McCOMAS. Will the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] now, under Cleveland, vote to give this Civil Service Commission what they want to carry out the law?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. We are talking about one thing and the gentleman from Alabama is talking about another thing. You, on that side, are always satisfied when your best comes up to our worst. [Laughter.] The point is that the Democratic party is not friendly to civil-service reform, whether real or not, and the appropriation, I submit, is not made equal to the requirements of the service; while I understood my friend from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] to say that he understood that the committee had made the appropriation deeming it full and ample to meet the proper requirements of the service.

Mr. HERBERT. I understand that this appropriation is the same as the appropriation of last year. That was sufficient to enable the commissioners and the President to carry out the law. You Republicans have been quarreling with the President ever since he came into power because he has disappointed you, because he has failed to verify your prediction that, like a Republican President and a Republican Congress, he would trample the law under foot.

Mr. O'FERRALL. And Democrats have complained of him on the same ground.

Mr. HERBERT. The Democrats have complained, some of them, that he did not go far enough in turning out the office-holders, but the Republicans have quarreled with him because he has enforced the law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. If the Chair will recognize me, I will yield to my friend from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT].

Mr. HERBERT. But the people who have watched the President from the moment he took the oath to support the Constitution and the laws have been with him and are with him to-day.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The experience of some members of this House on the Democratic side is that it is not safe to be anywhere else. [Laughter.]

Mr. HERBERT. The gentleman and his party will find next November that it is not safe for anybody to be against Mr. Cleveland who wants to be with the people.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I would like to ask the gentleman one question. If it was wrong for a Republican Congress not to give the full amount for civil-service reform ten years ago, will not the gentleman to-day vote to the Civil Service Commission in the pending bill the amount which they have asked and which my amendment proposes to give them?

Mr. HERBERT. I will vote enough to enable the President to administer the law faithfully and honestly, just as he has been doing ever since he took office.

Mr. MCCOMAS. The Civil Service Commissioners ask this sum.

Mr. HERBERT. No Committee on Appropriations can safely take the estimates of officials and appropriate the full amount asked. It is scarcely ever done.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Will the gentleman explain why it is that we have not been able to get any more civil-service reports since 1886?

Mr. HERBERT. I do not know, but I think a very satisfactory explanation has been given by the chairman of the Civil Service Committee [Mr. CLEMENTS].

Mr. DOCKERY. The Agricultural Report has not been published since that year either.

Mr. HERBERT. A great many reports are behind.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I presume there has been no civil-service report since 1886 because there has been nothing to report under the present commission.

Mr. HERBERT. The quarrel with the President all the time has been, not that he has not enforced the law as passed by Congress, but that he has not gone further and enforced something that is not the law.

A MEMBER. Do you mean the complaint on the Democratic side?

Mr. HERBERT. No; the quarrel on the part of gentlemen on the other side with Mr. Cleveland is that, as they choose to believe, he has not lived up to the construction they seek to put upon a letter he has written—a letter which the gentleman from Maine calls an enlargement of the statute made by the President.

Mr. MILLIKEN (to Mr. HERBERT). What is your quarrel with him?

Mr. HERBERT. None whatever. We do not quarrel with him at all.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FORNEY. I hope we may be able to agree on some limit to this debate.

Mr. REED. I desire only five minutes.

Mr. FORNEY. Then I will ask that this debate be closed in five minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like to occupy five minutes.

Mr. FORNEY. Well, let it be agreed that the debate be closed in ten minutes.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS] would like to occupy five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. What proposition does the gentleman from Alabama make?

Mr. FORNEY. Well, I will not make any proposition at present.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, I do not think gentlemen on the other side in their own minds deal quite fairly with the accusation made against them. I have no doubt they desire to do so; their failure results rather from confusion of mind than from wicked intention. [Laughter.] I can remember when there was no subject that seemed to penetrate the atmosphere with Democratic objection like civil service and civil-service reform. I can remember how gentlemen on the other side, in season and out of season, used to point to the melancholy spectacle of Federal office-holders participating in nominating conventions. I can remember when those gentlemen were in the habit of using language of the most violent reprobation in regard to the appointment or removal of any man for political reasons. On these questions they used to tear a passion to tatters on all occasions, and they asseverated that if they ever came into power that thing should end. They declared that it was for the interest of the Republic that it should end. Carrying out the language of their own virtuous oratory, the sincerity of which the President in his then innocent condition did not doubt [laughter], he proclaimed to the world that he intended to stop Federal office-holders from participating in this fashion in nominating conventions, not having a prophetic eye on the recent Pennsylvania convention [laughter], nor upon the New York convention, nor anything of that sort.

The accusation made against these gentlemen is—and I hope I shall not be unparliamentary—that their conduct compared with their declarations savors of hypocrisy. [Laughter.]

Now, what we point out is that after all their virtuous oratory, these gentlemen, as soon as they get into power, do precisely the same things about which they were so indignant before they got into power. They reiterate by saying, "You did it before the election." That is precisely the gravamen of their charge. It is precisely the thing they were to rectify. That is precisely the fault they were going to correct.

Now, when they commit precisely the fault which they themselves had reprobated they turn around and reiterate what they said before election, forgetting the position has entirely changed. [Laughter and applause.]

In other words, the pointed accusation, gentlemen, we make against you is that you maintain it is perfectly proper to do what you do because we did it, forgetting that the real issue is what you do compared with your own declarations. [Great laughter and applause.]

Now, there is the whole charge [renewed laughter], and I submit you can not get rid of it by repeating some of your old speeches, because your old speeches charge us with the fault, accompanied by the promise of correction on your part, a promise the non-fulfillment of which we point out. Now, there is the whole matter. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. ADAMS. I wish to say a word about the last amendment proposed by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS], which relates solely to the traveling expenses of the Civil Service Commissioners. The last fifteen minutes has shown how easily a discussion of civil-service reform takes on a partisan character. I have been waiting patiently for fifteen minutes to let partisan discussion clear away in order that I might show that something might be said on the subject which did not consist in crimination or recrimination of any political party.

When a Republican Congress adopted this Pendleton bill, so called, its purpose was to substitute a new mode of appointing subordinate officers. How did we propose to make that substitution? Did we propose the President should make it? No; the President is too far from these clerks to exercise his judgment. Did we propose the members of his Cabinet should do it? No; for they were too far, and they had to trust to local boards.

Now, the course taken under that law was to provide for a board of Civil Service Commissioners. They might have provided for local boards of a non-partisan character. They decided not to do so. As the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CLEMENTS] said a few minutes ago, many of these local boards, even under Democratic administration, consist altogether of Republican partisan office-holders. The mode in which the law is executed depends on the fidelity with which those local boards act, and you can be sure of having nothing like consistency or even fidelity unless the general Board of Civil Service Commissioners can have adequate compensation for traveling expenses in order they may assume the responsibility of the whole matter. And therefore it is, if you are in favor of carrying out this experiment of the Pendleton bill in good faith you ought to appropriate at least for that Civil Service Commission the $5,000 they ask for traveling expenses. And the traveling expenses they need are not for junketing excursions. They are to examine the working of this system in the local boards, on the fidelity or lack of fidelity of, which depends the whole question of success or failure of the whole system. And therefore it is that every year for two or three years I have offered this particular amendment to this appropriation bill. And it seems to me, if regard be had to all that has been said in the last fifteen minutes, this increase should be made for the purpose I have indicated.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Only a word, Mr. Chairman, in this connection, and that is in relation to the merits of the amendment which has been suggested.

The first appropriation made for the support of the Civil Service Commission and to carry out the law was about $17,000. It has gone up from that time—and that was in the Forty-seventh Congress—until now the annual appropriations amount to about $25,000. Of course the Committee on Appropriations is not prepared to recommend the highest amount asked by the Department in relation to the various bureaus. This is one only among many instances where the full amount of the estimates has not been allowed.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman from Georgia, as he is at the head of an important committee in connection with this subject, tell me whether in the judgment of that committee the Committee on Appropriations ought to have allowed the estimate of $5,000 for traveling expenses?

Mr. CLEMENTS. The question has not been before the committee.

Mr. ADAMS. It ought to have been.

Mr. CLEMENTS. And I can not speak from personal knowledge.

Mr. McCOMAS. Mr. Chairman, after full inquiry and examination, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations permit me to say that this allowance for traveling expenses of the board is in my opinion just and necessary and it ought to be allowed, and I make this statement without any reference to any partisan considerations which may enter into the question.

I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Civil Service Reform to co-operate with me in trying to have it passed.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. And let me state, as a member of the Committee on Civil Service Reform, that I will cheerfully co-operate and join hands with the chairman of the committee in trying to get it adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, when this amendment was offered I reserved the question of order upon it; but on reflection it seems to me entirely proper that it should be waived, and a direct vote of the committee taken upon the proposition to increase the appropriations for this commission. I wish to say, going a little more into the details of the creation of the commission than the gentleman from Georgia, that the appropriation for 1884, the first general appropriation for this service, amounted in the aggregate to $23,300. My friend from Georgia referred only to the salaries fixed for the Commission when he spoke of $17,000 as being the first expenditure. That appropriation embraced three commissioners, one chief examiner, one secretary, one stenographer, and one messenger, and these were the only officers provided by the original law. That first appropriation also embraced $5,000 for traveling expenses.

The appropriation for the present fiscal year provides as follows: For three commissioners, one chief examiner, one secretary, one clerk of class 4, one clerk of class 3, one clerk of class 2, and one clerk of class 1, two at $900 each; one messenger, one laborer; and $4,000 for traveling expenses, making the entire appropriation for the commission, $29,800.

Now, it will be seen at once and at a glance that this is quite an unusual increase. I wish to mention to the committee also the fact that during both sessions of the last Congress this force was materially increased, and I think the commission has force enough to perform its duties at Washington. No further appropriations, I think, ought to be made. I had occasion during the last Congress, at both sessions, to look into the subject most carefully, and I think the appropriation of $4,000 for traveling expenses is quite ample.

One word more. The duties of the commission are well performed; that is my judgment, at least; and I think that no law has ever been placed upon the statute-books which has been carried out with more fidelity than this law. It applies, as all gentlemen know, to the classified clerks in the Departments, but not to any of the administrative offices; and the existing law is carried out by this Administration with a fidelity that may be characterized as absolutely without variation or shadow of turning. I think, therefore, that gentlemen who favor the law—I am not the champion of it by any means—ought to feel that the law has been carried out both in letter and spirit to an extent not even expected by its most ardent friends. A glance at all of the Departments here, showing their working, will demonstrate the fidelity with which it has been carried out.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Chairman, as everybody on both sides seems entirely favorable to the principle of civil-service reform, and as we have each of us been accusing the other of dereliction in regard to it as parties, I wish to call attention to one fact which this amendment reaches. This seems to be more than a mere question of money. I introduced a bill early in the session in this House for the extension of the civil-service law to certain additional offices. I did so because I believed that the advance of that reform, which I regard as clearly in the interests of the public business and of the public welfare, could only be achieved through legislation. I believe the only solid advance that has been made in regard to civil-service reform has been by legislation, and the Civil Service Commission appointed under that law.

I was told with regard to that bill, which now lies on the Calendar under an adverse report from the committee of which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CLEMENTS] is the chairman, that one objection to it was that there was ample power in the President and the Civil Service Commission to extend the present law to other offices; that it was merely an expression of the wish of Congress in the matter; but that they could not extend it to new offices, because they did not have the money to do it with. Therefore this proposed additional appropriation is simply a statement on the part of Congress that they believe that the civil-service law should be extended and maintained. And I think that was the language of both political platforms of both political parties in many conventions, State and national.

Therefore I hope to see this amendment prevail as a distinct advance in the line of civil-service reform.

Mr. HERBERT. I desire to say in reply to what fell from the gentleman from Maine that it was not the Democratic party that, before the passage of the present law, was loudest in its professions in favor of civil-service reform. The gentleman happened to be, as I was, a member of this House, when that bill was passed. It was in the first session of that Congress—I believe the Forty-eighth.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The Forty-seventh.

Mr. HERBERT. In the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress, I think it was, a modest bill was reported by a Democratic committee simply making it unlawful to levy contributions upon office holders here in the Departments. The Republican party arrayed itself solidly against that bill and resorted to the parliamentary tactics—filibustered for weeks and weeks to prevent even that first step in the direction of civil-service reform.

Congress adjourned and we went before the country. That was the year when Mr. Cleveland was nominated for governor of the State of New York. That was the year when Jay Hubbell was chairman of the Congressional executive committee of the Republican party, and that was the year when the question of civil-service reform was submitted to the people in the elections. The result was that in the State of New York Grover Cleveland was elected governor by 192,000 votes. When we came back to the second session of that Congress our Republican friends showed that they had experienced a great change of heart. They went to work with great zeal in both ends of the Capitol and hurried through the bill that is now the law. They sent it to us from the Senate, and here Democrats and Republicans voted for it alike.

That is the history of this law; and the quarrel to-day of the Republicans is that Grover Cleveland has enforced the law which public opinion forced them to vote for. They predicted he would violate it, as they had done; but the gentleman from Georgia, the chairman of the Civil Service Committee, has challenged them to show, and the gentlemen on the other side failed to point out, a single instance in which the law has been violated under a Democratic Administration. The only charge is that Mr. Cleveland has not extended it as far as, in the opinion of his critics on the other side of this Chamber, he ought to have done because of some letter he has written. To that extent, and to that extent only, his offending goes.

It seems to me that is a perfectly fair statement of the situation. Sir, if I did not believe this appropriation sufficient I should be in favor of increasing it so as to carry out this law faithfully. The Democratic committee charged with this matter does not seek to destroy or emasculate the law, but has reported to the House what the gentleman from Indiana, long connected with appropriations and familiar with the necessities of this case, says is sufficient to enable the commissioners to enforce the law.

Mr. McCOMAS. I ask the gentleman from Alabama——

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. McCOMAS. I ask just a moment.

Mr. FORNEY. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. ROGERS having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BLOUNT reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9377) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SACRAMENTO, CAL.

Mr. McKENNA. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Union Calendar, for present consideration, the bill (S. 1554) to increase the appropriation for the erection of a public building at Sacramento, Cal.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the amount heretofore fixed as the limit of cost for the erection of a public building by the United States Government at Sacramento, Cal., be, and the same is hereby, increased to $150,000, and that sum is hereby fixed as the limit of cost for the erection of said building, including site.

SEC. 2. That the officers of the United States Government having charge of the erection of public buildings are authorized and required to be governed by the limitation hereby prescribed in making contracts for the erection of said building.

SEC. 3. That the additional sum of $50,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be used and expended for the purposes provided in this act.

The bill was reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with the following amendments:

In section 1, line 6, strike out "$150,000" and insert "$200,000."
In section 3, line 1, strike out "$50,000" and insert "$100,000."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN rose.

Mr. McKENNA. I will state to the gentleman from Indiana that the bill as we propose to have it passed is the Senate bill making the limit $150,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. With the understanding that the amendment increasing the amount to $200,000 is withdrawn, I shall not object.

Mr. McKENNA. Mr. Speaker, it is understood that the amendments are withdrawn, and that the Senate bill shall be passed.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the suggestion of the gentleman from California that the amendments be disagreed to and the question taken on the Senate bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McKENNA moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING, TALLAHASSEE, FLA.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill S. 1083, and that it be now put upon its passage. It is a bill for the erection of a public building at Tallahassee, Fla. I also ask unanimous consent that the reading of the bill be dispensed with. It is exactly in the form prescribed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and it has been reported favorably by that committee. The bill passed the Senate, and was referred to the House committee and reported back favorably. There have been three reports in favor of this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase, acquire by condemnation, or otherwise provide, a site for, and cause to be erected, a suitable building, with proper fireproof vaults therein, for the accommodation of the courts of the United States, post-office, land-office, internal-revenue offices, and other Government offices, at the city of Tallahassee, Fla. The site and building thereon, when completed, upon plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed the cost of $75,000, nor shall any site be purchased until estimates for the erection of a building which will furnish sufficient accommodations for the transaction of the public business, and which shall not exceed in cost the balance of the sum herein limited after the site shall have been purchased and paid for, shall have been approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and no purchase of site nor plan for said building shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury involving an expenditure exceeding the sum of $75,000 for site and building: Provided, That no money to be appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the site of said building shall be vested in the United States, to be approved by the Attorney-General, and until the State of Florida shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of any civil process therein. And the sum of $75,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to be used and expended in the purchase of said site and toward the construction of said building: Provided, That the site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than 40 feet, including streets and alleys around the same.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 9788) making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for expenses of collecting the revenue from customs for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes, returned from the Senate with amendments, be taken up, the amendments non-concurred in, and the bill and amendments recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. REED. I object.

The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the House took a recess, under the order, until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m., Mr. ROGERS in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

JESSE DICKEY.

Mr. DOCKERY, by unanimous consent, called up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 9682) increasing the pension of Jesse Dickey.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Jesse Dickey, late of Captain Johnson's Company Illinois Mounted Volunteers, Black Hawk war, to $12 per month.

The report (by Mr. BANKHEAD) is as follows:

The claimant is now a pensioner of the United States at the rate of $6 per month for a gunshot wound of the right thigh, which he received while in the military service of the United States, in the Black Hawk war of 1832. He is in his seventy-ninth year, has no source of income except his small pension, and has an aged wife dependent upon him. A large number of his townsmen join in a petition to Congress setting forth his indigent condition and the necessity for relief. The old man is severely disabled by his wound, and by hernia and hydrocele.

Your committee report back the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DOCKERY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN F. HUCKABA.

Mr. WHITTHORNE, by unanimous consent, called up for consideration the bill (H. R. 9200) granting a pension to John F. Huckaba.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John F. Huckaba, a private of Company H, Second Regiment of Tennessee Mounted Infantry.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) is as follows:

The claimant made application to the Pension Office for pension, and the same was rejected on the ground that the soldier was not properly in the service of the United States when the wound for which he claimed a pension was incurred, and that the same was not incurred in the service and in line of duty.

The facts in the case, as gathered from the papers before the committee, are as follows:

In August, 1863, John F. Huckaba enlisted in a military organization then being formed under the direction of Andrew Johnson, then military governor of the State of Tennessee. The organization was under control of Capt. Thomas J. Crypert, and was designated as the Second Tennessee Mounted Militia Infantry. He was sworn into service by Captain Crypert, and shortly after, before said force had arrived at Nashville, where they were to be mustered in, he was sent out with a scouting party by order of said Captain Crypert, and while out in the discharge of his duty as a scout he accidentally received a severe wound in his left hand by the accidental discharge of his own gun while dismounting from his horse. He presented himself at Nashville for muster, but owing to the crippled condition of his hand he was refused the privilege of being mustered into said service.

Thomas J. Crypert testifies that he was captain of Company A, Second Tennessee Mounted Infantry; that he is acquainted with John F. Huckaba; that he enlisted him in the service of the United States and swore him into said service while making up said regiment, about the month of August, 1863, under the authority of Andrew Johnson, military governor of Tennessee; that after he was enlisted and sworn he went with him and other enlisted men to Corinth, Miss., then a United States military post, and drew a gun and ammunition and part of a uniform. Soon thereafter, say about September 8, 1863, the said John F. Huckaba was sent on a scout in Wayne County, Tennessee, he thinks by his own order, with other enlisted men belonging to the organization, and while on said scout he was severely wounded in the left hand, which wound, the captain says, "was reported to me as having been made by an accidental shot from his own gun. His wound has almost entirely deprived him of the use of his hand permanently. He had not been mustered into the service at the time he received said wound, but soon thereafter he presented himself, with others, for muster at Nashville, Tenn., but, owing to the crippled condition of his hand, he was rejected. While enlisting men for the regiment it was necessary for the enlisted men to remain together in a body and perform duty as soldiers for their mutual protection before they were mustered into the service, as the enemy were in that part of the country at that time.

Isaac H. Goble, a member of said company and regiment, testifies as follows: "Some time after enlistment I was ordered to take five or six men with me and go on a scout, and the said John F. Huckaba was one of the men sent with me on that duty. While in the line of his duty he received a severe wound through his left hand by the accidental discharge of his own gun. I was present when he received the wound; the same was received while in the act of dismounting from his horse, and was purely accidental. The wound shattered the bones of his hand, and he has ever since been almost totally deprived of the use of that hand on account of the wound."

James F. Goble, who was a member of said company and regiment, and who was one of the number in said scout, testifies that Huckaba was also one of the number on said scout, and was wounded as stated by Captain Crypet, Isaac H. Goble, and others. He was present and saw Huckaba when the accident occurred.

The committee believe that the evidence warrants the conclusion that the soldier was a member of the military organization, as stated, that he was in line of duty when the accident for which he asks relief occurred, and that said accident occurred as stated. The committee believe this to be a meritorious case, and therefore submit a favorable report and recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHITTHORNE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FLORA C. ANDREWS.

Mr. WILLIAMS, by unanimous consent, called up for consideration a bill (H. R. 8771) to place the name of Mrs. Flora C. Andrews on the pension-roll.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension law, the name of Mrs. Flora Andrews, widow of Samuel D. Andrews, deceased, late a private in Company C, Forty-fourth Regiment of Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. YODER) is as follows:

Samuel D. Andrews, the husband of Flora C. Andrews, enlisted in Company C, Forty-fourth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, on the 15th day of September, 1861, and was borne on the company rolls as Simon D. Andrews, and was discharged from the service of the United States on the 25th day of January, 1863, on surgeon's certificate of disability, reciting that he had done no duty for a month, and had had a cough for six months and was suffering from phthisis pulmonalis. The soldier's discharge recited that he was discharged by reason of phthisis pulmonalis.

Mr. Andrews filed an application for pension April 2, 1880, and he was granted a pension certificate from the 26th day of January, 1863, and ending November 16, 1881. Said certificate is on file with papers in the case, which certificate was subsequently revised to end January 26, 1868. His first certificate was granted the 11th day of February, 1885, and when the same was revised the soldier ap plied for restoration to pension-rolls April 16, 1886. On July 14, 1885, the medical board gave him no rating; nevertheless the soldier died November 3, 1886, and his attending physician, Dr. E. C. Cruner, of Dayton, a physician of high character and large practice, states in the affidavit filed in the papers that Samuel D. Andrews died from the effects of a deposit of tuberculous matter in the intestine glands, causing inflammation, ulceration, and rupture of the bowels, and that he is convinced that the deceased was suffering with a tuberculous deposit in the lungs, and that he was an undoubted sufferer from phthisis pulmonalis, and that deposit in the intestinal glands was of the same nature, causing inflammation and rupture.

Dr. Green, who attended shortly after his discharge from the Army, testified that in 1863 he examined the soldier, and that he was very much emaciated, and that he had chronic pneumonia, with marked evidence of "caseation in one or possibly both lungs." Although the soldier in a measure recovered his health, yet the evidence shows that up to the day of his death he had a cough, weakness, difficulty of breathing, and many of the certain indications of lung disease, and from the fact that he was discharged for phthisis pulmonalis, and that he died from the effects of tuberculous matters in the intestinal glands, and from the further fact that after a thorough investigation the Pension Office found a pensionable disability from date of discharge to November, 1881, your committee are satisfied that the deceased soldier suffered from phthisis pulmonalis in greater or less degree from date of his discharge until the day of his death, and that his death was the result of the same disease, and do therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AURELIA P. HALL.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, called up for consideration the bill (H. R. 9487) granting a pension to Mrs. Aurelia P. Hall, with an amendment.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Aurelia P. Hall, mother of Wilson S. Gilliland, deceased, late a private in Company A, Third Ohio Infantry Volunteers; also of Company C, Fourteenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and still later of Company C, Fourteenth Infantry, United States Army.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio) is as follows:

That the beneficiary of this bill, Mrs. Aurelia P. Hall, of Vineland, N. J., is the mother of Wilson S. Gilliland, who, when about seventeen years of age, enlisted in Company A, Third Ohio Volunteer Infantry, on the 13th day of June, 1861, and served until the 21st day of June, 1864, when he was honorably discharged, and who afterwards, on the 27th day of September, 1864, enlisted in Company C, Fourteenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and served until the 3d day of June, 1865, when he was again honorably discharged.

Claimant was twice married, and at the enlistment and during the service of her said son was living with her second husband, Albert G. Hall, who was an invalid, and could contribute but little to her support or to the support of her children. She had four children, younger than the soldier, who remained at home with her, the eldest of whom was only about sixteen years of age when the soldier enlisted. During his service and afterwards the soldier contributed largely to the support of claimant and his brothers and sisters who resided with her, and she was in great measure dependent upon him.

After the war the soldier married, but his wife soon separated from him and remarried, although not divorced, but she afterwards instituted a suit for divorce, which was pending at the time of the soldier's death.

After his marriage and some time in the year 1870 the soldier enlisted in Company G, Fourteenth United States Infantry, and died in July, 1871, at Fort D. A. Russell, Wyo. During his service in the war of the rebellion he contracted chronic diarrhea which continued during the remainder of his life, and contributed materially to his death.

The claimant is now nearly seventy years of age and in needy circumstances, and your committee, in view of the facts above stated, recommend the passage of the bill, with an amendment striking out the letter "C," in the last clause of the bill, and inserting the letter "G;" so that this clause will read "and still later of Company G, Fourteenth Infantry, United States Army."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RUTH ANN PORTER.

Mr. HOLMAN, by unanimous consent, called up for consideration the bill (H. R. 9321) granting a pension to Ruth Ann Porter, with an amendment.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Ruth Ann Porter, dependent sister of George H. Porter, late a private in Company D, Third Regiment of Indiana Volunteer Cavalry, on the pension-roll, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) is as follows:

The claimant under this bill is a dependent sister, for which class no provision is made in the general laws, but which Congress has recognized in many private bills which have received executive approval.

This case is one of exceptional merit, the fact being that claimant's three brothers, upon whom her mother and herself were dependent, enlisted in the Union Army at the same time. One was killed in the battle of the Wilderness, another was wounded and died at Douglas Hospital, Washington, after undergoing a second amputation of the leg, and the remaining one came home completely broken down and dissipated, after which he left home in search of health, and has not been heard of for eighteen years, and is undoubtedly dead. The mother was pensioned. She has since died, and the daughter asks that the pension be continued to her. Claimant's memorial and an affidavit from William S. Holman, jr., a son of Hon. William S. Holman, are herewith appended:

"STATE OF INDIANA, County of Dearborn, ss:

"On this 12th day of March, 1888, personally appeared before me, a notary public in and for the county and State aforesaid, Ruth E. Porter, a resident of Aurora, Dearborn County, Indiana, aged forty-one years, and who, being duly sworn, makes the following statement in order to procure a pension by special act of Congress as dependent sister: I have resided in the city of Aurora, Ind., during my entire life; my father died in 1849, leaving surviving my mother and eight children, consisting of three girls and five boys. My father was not possessed of any real estate and but little personal property. The eldest child was a daughter, and who married the same year that my father died; the next eldest was a son, who died in 1854, and my mother was thus thrown upon her own individual exertions and that of her remaining sons to obtain a means of subsistence, and by the united labor of the family we managed to gain a living.

"In July, 1861, my three remaining brothers, George H. Porter, Benjamin F. Porter, and Gillett A. Porter, all enlisted in Company D, Third Indiana Cavalry, thus leaving my mother with a family of two daughters and one grandson. I was then about twelve years of age, and my remaining sister and my mother were compelled to provide for the family by their own labor and the help of my brothers in service, as myself and the grandson were too young to assist in obtaining a means of subsistence. My mother, however, received contributions from all of my brothers while in the Army, and these contributions were absolutely necessary for the support of the family, as we lived in rented property, and we had no means of subsistence except the labor of my mother and sister, as before stated. My brother Gillett was mortally wounded May 30, 1864, and died June 1, 1864, and my brother George H. was wounded in action May 5, 1864, and died at Douglas Hospital, Washington, D. C., June 4, 1864, from amputation of leg. My other brother, Benjamin F., served out his time, but came out of the Army in feeble health. My mother was thus left in very destitute circumstances, as my brother George was the main dependence of the family.

"My mother was pensioned on account of the death and service of my brother George H., under certificate No. 72235; my mother died January 24, 1882. My only remaining sister married in 1865, and died in 1878 at Memphis, Tenn., leaving a daughter eight years of age, that was sent to my mother to care for. The said child is now with me, and is an invalid, and I and the said daughter of my sister are all that remain of our family, as I have not seen my brother Benjamin for eighteen years. I have always been in very delicate health, and am nearly all of the time under the doctor's care, and I have been compelled to gain a subsistence by sewing, which has so injured my health and my eyesight has become affected by working after night, that I fear that I will be compelled to abandon my only means of subsistence. And I make this true statement of facts believing that a grateful Government will be willing to admit a claim to which I think I am justly entitled, having been deprived of the natural and only means of support by the loss of my brothers in the Army.

"If I was in good health I would not ask anything of the Government. My mother was confined to her bed in last sickness for six months, and I had to give up my sewing to attend her, and we had no money except as her quarterly allowance of pension came to hand. I can furnish testimony of neighbors to corroborate these statements. I am in very destitute circumstances, and make this appeal in my dire necessity, and hope that I do not plead in vain.

"Miss RUTH E. PORTER.

"STATE OF INDIANA, Dearborn County, ss:

"On this the 12th day of March, 1888, before me, Benjamin Vail, jr., a notary public within and for the county and State aforesaid, personally came Ruth E. Porter, a person of lawful age, well known to me to be reputable and entitled to credit, who, being by me first duly sworn according to law, made oath to the foregoing statement and subscribed to the same in my presence.

"Witness my hand and notarial seal.

"[SEAL.] BENJ. VAIL, JR., Notary Public.

"William S. Holman, jr., first being duly sworn, says: I have resided in and near Aurora, Ind., for more than thirty-five years. I have been acquainted with Ruth Porter for about fifteen years; I have known of her and her family for more than twenty years. She had three brothers in the Union Army during the late war. Two of her said brothers, George Porter and Gillett Porter, never returned, having died or been killed while in the said service, as I have been informed and believe. The other brother, becoming intemperate in habits, has for many years failed to do anything for the support of his said sister.

"My especial attention was directed to this family about the time Ruth Porter's mother, Mrs. Sarah Porter, obtained a pension from the Government on account of the death of her said sons, or one of them. That at the time of Mrs. Sarah Porter's death, and for a longtime previous thereto, she and her said daughter Ruth were entirely dependent upon said pension and the charity of friends for their support. That since the death of Mrs. Sarah Porter, who departed this life on the 24th day of January, 1882, her said daughter Ruth has had a bitter struggle for existence. That she has only been able to obtain necessary food, shelter, and clothing through aid of charitable persons. That she has made every effort possible towards self-support. That she has been in feeble health for many years, and is unable to perform continuous labor.

"That so far as her strength would permit she engaged in sewing, but that recently her eyesight has failed to such an extent she is able to accomplish but little. That she is in destitute circumstances. That she owns no real estate, and that her personal property will not exceed in value $25. That she is a lady of refinement, of high moral character, and of strict integrity. That she is destitute by reason of the death of her said two brothers, who lost their lives in the service of their country, she being dependent upon them for support. That she is in every way worthy of aid; and further deponent saith not.

"WM. S. HOLMAN, JR.

"Subscribed and sworn to before me this 31st day of March, 1888.

"[SEAL.] BENJ. VAIL, JR., Notary Public."

Your committee are in possession of other affidavits, from leading citizens of Indiana, setting forth the necessities of claimant, and urging that the pension be granted. As before said, we regard the case as one of great merit, and therefore recommend that the bill be passed, after being amended by striking out the words "subject to the conditions and limitations of the pension laws," and inserting instead thereof the words, "and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month."

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WEBSTER C. WEBB.

Mr. HUNTER, by unanimous consent, called up for consideration the bill (H. R. 9284) granting a pension to Webster C. Webb.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Webster C. Webb, late a private of Company H, Seventieth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) is as follows:

It is shown by the proof on file in this case that claimant enlisted at Brownsville, Edmonson County, Kentucky, in September, 1864, and was at the same time elected a second lieutenant of Company G, Seventeenth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry.

In this capacity he continued to serve until the 23d day of February, 1865, when he resigned because of some misunderstanding with the colonel, Samuel Johnson, and on the same day he enlisted and was duly mustered into the United States service as a private in Company H of said regiment to serve one year, and on the 20th day of September, 1865, he was honorably discharged at Louisville, Ky.

On the 7th day of August, 1876, he filed an application for pension, because of disability resulting from a wound received and a disease contracted in the service, and alleged in his declaration that in January, 1865, at or near Nebo, in the county of Hopkins and State of Kentucky, he was wounded in a battle with the rebels by a pistol ball passing through his arm between the elbow and shoulder, and that he contracted small-pox in the month of March, 1865, at Russellville, Ky.

He filed an affidavit from T. W. Campbell, who was lieutenant-colonel of the regiment, and who is now a resident of Louisville, Ky., who states under date of September 29, 1876, as follows:

"I, T. W. Campbell, late lieutenant-colonel of the Seventeenth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry, state that Webster C. Webb, in January, 1865, was acting second lieutenant of Company G, commanded by Capt. J. A. Studevant; that while so acting was attacked by a company of rebel soldiers at Bruce's Mills, in Hopkins County, Kentucky, and while so engaged was wounded in the right arm and taken prisoner and paroled by them. I further state that in a few hours after the attack was made upon Company G I was on the ground in pursuit of the rebels; I also state that while the said Webb was in the service and under my immediate command, he was attacked with small-pox; that I visited his tent in the field at Russellville, Ky., several times, having had the disease several years before myself. I further state that I have no interest, direct or indirect, in any claim the said Webb may have for pension or anything else."

Also affidavits of John W. Webb and William M. Stice, army comrades of claimant, who state:

"That they were members of Company G, Seventeenth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry; that they were present on the —— day of January, 1865, and engaged in action with Lieut. W. C. Webb at Bruce's Mills, near the Hopkinsville County line, Kentucky; that while we were engaged in a fight with a portion of the rebel General Lyon's command, commanded by Walker Taylor, the said W. C. Webb was wounded in the right arm, above the elbow, by a gunshot or pistol wound. That we have no interest in the claim made by said Webb for pension."

John L. Skaggs, who was orderly sergeant of claimant's company, and Samuel E. Sanders, a member of the same, under oath, state as follows:

"That they have known Webster C. Webb for thirty years; that at the time and for many years prior to enlistment, as also ever since discharge to the present time, they have been close neighbors to said Webb and intimately acquainted with him. That said Webb was elected by their Company G as second lieutenant of said company in its original organization; that they know that at the time of enlistment and at the time of entering the service of the United States Webb was a stout, healthy man, free from any disease whatever as they verily believe, and free from small-pox or any of its deleterious effects.

"That on or about the 3d day of March, 1865, they were in camp at Russellville, Ky., and were messmates of said Webb, and tented with him; that he became sick, and that this affiant, Samuel E. Sanders, waited upon him until he became apprehensive that he was taking small-pox, when we sent Lieut. Col. T. W. Campbell, of our regiment, who had had small-pox previously, and Colonel Campbell pronounced it small-pox, and we then had Webb sent away out into the cedars, and placed in a tent, where he remained until his recovery. That Dr. Randolph, who preser bed for him, is dead. That our post-office address is Brownsvil e, Ky., and that we have no interest in the claim."

James Lindsay, a neighbor of claimant, states:

"That he has been acquainted with Webster C. Webb ever since his boyhood, during which time he has lived a neighbor to him. That at the date of his enlistment he was sound and free from diseases of all kinds and was considered a stout and healthy man. That at the date of his discharge, September, 1865, he came home suffering with an affection of the scalp, having had small-pox while in the service, and was not sound and well at date of his return home; had an ulcerous affection of the scalp and some disease of kidneys. I do not think he has been sound and well since his discharge, and it is my opinion that he has not been able to perform more than one-third manual labor."

Dr. John R. Roof, of Brownsville, Ky., states, under oath, as follows:

"That he has given the following medical advice and treatment to Webster C. Webb, late second lieutenant of Company G, Seventeenth Kentucky Cavalry Volunteers: Said Webster C. Webb came under my treatment and observation some time in the month of September, 1865, at or some time after his discharge. He was then suffering with albuminuria, caused by small-pox. The scalp was ulcerated, and I continued to treat and prescribe for his disease, occasionally, ever since; but I have no memoranda by which to fix exact dates and duration of all treatment rendered in his case, but know that he has been more or less disabled for the performance of manual labor, on account of said albuminuria and affection of scalp, which has become chronic ever since his discharge, and I am satisfied from his appearance and physical condition in general that he has been disabled at least one-third of the time from the performance of manual labor. I also knew him before enlistment, and regarded him as being sound and free from said diseases or any predisposition thereto; and I am not concerned in the claim."

Dr. Claiborne J. Watton, United States examining surgeon at Munfordville, Hart County, Ky., made an official examination of claimant on the 3d day of November, 1876, and states:

"Gunshot wound in right arm; ball entered the middle of arm, back portion, passing forward and inward, and curving on inner aspects of the arm, wounding the triceps and biceps muscles. There is pitting at the points of ingress and egress, and he represents that his arm upon hard manual labor becomes useless, and from this cause his disability is one-fourth. He is pitted severely from small-pox, and represents that his knees occasionally swell upon exerting himself physically. He looks debilitated, and is from this condition one-fourth disabled."

Dr. William T. Wilkins, United States examining surgeon at Bowling Green, Ky., also made an official examination of claimant on the 31st day of May, 1882, and states:

"There are quite a number of large scars over the head, arms, and legs, from which applicant states that in warm weather these scars break open and discharge matter that is very offensive. There is also considerable inflammation of both kidneys."

This claim was rejected by the Pension Office on the 7th day of July, 1882, on the ground that the wound was received and the disease contracted prior to enlistment.

While it is true that claimant's trouble originated before he was regularly mustered into the United States service, the fact remains that he was enrolled, performed military duty, participated in battle, and was at all times ready to be mustered from September, 1864, to February, 1865, during which time his disabilities occurred. He should not be permitted to suffer from the failure of the mustering officer to discharge his duty.

Your committee therefore make this favorable report, and recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment: Strike out the word "private" in the sixth line and insert in lieu thereof "second lieutenant," and after the word "cavalry" in the seventh line add "and grant him a pension of $17 per month."

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have the bill read again.

The bill was again read.

Mr. MATSON. I can not understand, Mr. Speaker, from the reading of the report why we should undertake to fix the rate of pension in this bill. It is contrary to the rule of the committee and to the rules of the House. The proper thing to do is to treat this applicant the same as others are treated, and let his rating be fixed by a board of examining surgeons. The reason he comes to Congress at all is that he was not mustered in, and that point is covered by the bill, which gives him the right to go and be examined and rated by the board like other applicants. There is no reason why we should undertake arbitrarily to fix the rate. We are not competent to fix it properly, because we can not judge of the disability. I therefore move that the amendment fixing the rate at $17 per month be not agreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

Another amendment recommended by the committee, striking out the words "a private" and inserting in lieu thereof "second lieutenant," was agreed to.

Also an amendment striking out "Seventieth" and substituting "Seventeenth" before the word "Regiment."

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HUNTER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. MARY L. CLEVELAND.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to present to the House a bill which I think of great merit. It is for the benefit of Mrs. Mary L. Cleveland. This lady is now eighty-one years old. Her husband was a captain in the war of 1812. She is unable, without assistance, to get out of bed or to dress herself. She is now dependent on the bounty of her grandchildren, who are unable to support her. The committee has made a unanimous report in her favor. I have never but once this session asked for the passage of any bill for my district, and I hope there will be no objection to my request.

Mr. MATSON. I do not object if it can be agreed that the gentleman from Pennsylvania on the other side [Mr. O'NEILL] be recognized for a similar request, immediately after this bill is disposed of. I think this is due to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in view of his long service in the House, as a similar courtesy has been extended to my colleague [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. NELSON. I wish to suggest here and now that inasmuch as we have started upon this proceeding the only proper course is to give us all a chance on the same plan, or else stop the proceeding right now.

Mr. MATSON. Then we will stop it right now.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Oh, no; we ought not to stop it "right now." [Laughter.] I think we are getting along very comfortably, and if we proceed in this way we shall no doubt pass a great many bills. I do not feel under the necessity of making a statement like that made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], that I am not very well, for I am feeling right well to-night, and can stay here a long while; but at the same time I would like to reach some bills in which I feel a particular interest.

Mr. NELSON. I do not want to be understood as objecting.

Mr. GALLINGER and others called for the regular order.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of pension business on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask that the bills on the Calendar be read by title in their order, commencing where we left off last Friday night, and that unless the consideration of a bill be called for when its title is read the bill be passed over informally, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. SPOONER] asks unanimous consent that bills on the Private Calendar be called over by title in their order, beginning where business was suspended at the session of last Friday night——

Mr. BRYCE. I object.

Mr. SPOONER. Then I ask that the Clerk commence with the beginning of the Calendar, and that the call be conducted in the manner I have just proposed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Rhode Island now asks unanimous consent that bills on the Calendar be called over by title in their order, and that when the consideration of a bill is not asked for it be passed over informally, retaining its place on the Calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MRS. D. P. WOODBURY.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5961) to increase the pension now paid to Mrs. D. P. Woodbury.

Mr. BRYCE. I ask for the consideration of this bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension now paid Mrs. D. P. Woodbury, widow of General D. P. Woodbury, to the sum of $50 per month from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. CHEADLE. I shall object to the passage of this bill at the present time. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. BRYCE] desires to have it go over, to be voted on in a full House, I am willing. I do not want to be compelled to call for a quorum at the beginning of this evening's session.

Mr. BRYCE. I am willing that the bill should go over until the 28th instant, upon the same conditions which have been applied to bills of a similar character—in other words, that the previous question be ordered, the right to offer amendments being reserved, and that debate be limited to thirty minutes—fifteen minutes on each side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that this bill be fixed as a special order for the 28th instant, after the bills of similar character which have already been fixed for that time, that the previous question be considered as ordered, the right to offer amendments being reserved, and that fifteen minutes on each side be allowed at that time for debate.

Mr. McMILLIN. I must object to that, because I know it is desired that on Monday next we shall go on with the tariff bill. I would not object to fixing the consideration of this bill for to-morrow or for any other day when it would not interfere with the tariff bill.

Mr. BRYCE. This bill has already been up several times——

Mr. McMILLIN. I understand that; and I have no objection to assigning for its consideration any time when it will not interfere with the business of the Committee on Ways and Means. If the gentleman wants the bill to come up to-morrow, all right; but I know it is the desire that next week we shall go on with revenue bills, which are, I think, of paramount importance.

Mr. BRYCE. I ask, then, that the consideration of the bill be fixed for to-morrow under the conditions already stated.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the previous question be regarded as ordered on this bill, and that it come up for consideration immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow morning; that the right to offer amendments be reserved, and that fifteen minutes' debate be allowed on each side.

Mr. PETERS. Other bills which have been objected to have been fixed for Monday, the 28th instant. Why should this bill have precedence over those?

Mr. MATSON. I wish to know, Mr. Chairman, whether the Committee of the Whole can make an order of the kind proposed so as to bind the House.

The CHAIRMAN. This would be simply in the nature of a recommendation to the House. Is there objection to the proposition which has just been stated by the Chair? The Chair hears none; and that order is made.

EVALINA P. BROWN.

The next business on the Private Calendar (the consideration of which was asked) was the bill (H. R. 7025) granting a pension to Evalina P. Brown.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Evalina P. Brown, widow of Jacob L. Brown, late private of Company A, Third Regiment North Carolina Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. WALKER) is as follows:

The bill was introduced by the writer of this report, in accordance with the recommendations of the honorable Commissioner of Pensions contained in his letter of January 13, 1888, that the claim of Evalina P. Brown, although meritorious, can not be allowed by the Pension Bureau, and should receive the favorable consideration of Congress.

The facts in the case, as shown by the papers submitted by the Pension Bureau, are as follows:

Claimant's husband, Jacob L. Brown, about August 1, 1864, at Strawberry Plains, Tenn., enlisted under Lieut. John W. Edwards, in Company A, Third North Carolina Infantry. After his enlistment he was employed as recruiting officer, and sent into Carter County, Tennessee, from which he returned about August 15, 1864, with some sixty or seventy men, to Guernsey Cove, Tenn., the place of meeting agreed upon with said Lieutenant Edwards.

Brown was again sent out for more recruits, having in the mean time been promised a commission in Company D of said regiment; but while out on this trip was killed by Confederates; and therefore his name was not taken up on the rolls of the command at the time of its final muster.

The soldier's name not being borne on the rolls of the Adjutant-General's Office, the Pension Bureau is estopped from the favorable consideration of the widow's claim.

The widow has not remarried, and the Commissioner of Pensions, after special examination, believing the claim to be meritorious, has presented the same, as heretofore stated, under the provision of joint resolution of May 29, 1830, for the consideration of Congress.

Your committee, after full consideration of the evidence presented, concur in the opinion of the Commissioner of Pensions, and therefore report favorably on the bill, and ask that the same do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HIRAM M. GOSS.

The next business on the Private Calendar (the consideration of which was asked by Mr. CHIPMAN) was the bill (H. R. 6810) for the relief of Hiram M. Goss.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Hiram M. Goss, late of Company A, Ninety-fourth Regiment New York Infantry, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6810) for the relief of Hiram M. Goss, have examined the case, and find that he enlisted October 23, 1861, and was discharged at Carver Hospital, Washington, D. C., July 9, 1862, for disability. He applied for a pension in March, 1886, on the ground that in May, 1862, while detailed as a teamster engaged in hauling supplies from the depot to camp at Fredericksburgh, Va., a barrel of pork fell from his load and that the effort made by him to reload it caused a rupture in his right side. The claim was rejected because he did not show that the injury was incurred in the line of duty. He testified that he was entirely alone when the accident happened, and when in consequence of it he suddenly felt a sharp pain and sick as his stomach he did not know what was the matter. His drove team about a week after this, but, being unable to lift anything, was ordered back to the command. He told some of his comrades his trouble, and was informed by them that it was a breach or hernia.

The records in the office of the Adjutant-General show his enlistment as a private in Company A, Ninty-fourth New York Volunteers, his enrollment October 23, 1861, and his presence until April 30, 1862; that he was absent in May and June sick, at Alexandria, and was discharged at Carver Hospital July 9, 1862, for disability.

The records of the Surgeon-General's Office show that he was admitted to Carver Hospital June 12, 1862, but not the nature of his illness. The certificate of disability under which he was discharged sets forth that he was incapable of performing military service because of direct inguinal hernia.

Edward B. Saunders, De France Green, and Horace Green all testify that he was a sound, vigorous man when he enlisted, and afflicted with hernia after his discharge. Their testimony shows that they knew him from infancy up to his enlistment; worked, ran, wrestled, and played with him during boyhood and manhood, bathing with him hundreds of times, and that they knew that when he enlisted he was sound and healthy and free from hernia or other disability, but that when he came out of the service he told them he was suffering from hernia. These men certainly had every opportunity to know his physical condition before he enlisted. The examining surgeon (J. T. Keates) reports that he has hernia now and one-half incapacitated from obtaining his living by manual labor. The claimant himself testifies that he was stripped naked and thoroughly examined physically when he enlisted.

It appears, then, that he had no hernia when he enlisted, but did have it when discharged. Should he be denied a pension because in the course of his duty he was alone when he was injured? That certainly would be very hard if he tells the truth.

The committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JULIA WELCH.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. Chairman, I did not observe that the Clerk had passed over on the Calendar the bill (H. R. 8291) granting a pension to Julia Welch. I ask its present consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be read.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, at the rate prescribed by existing provisions of law, the name of Julia Welch, widow of James H. Welch, late private Company A, Twelfth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. LANE) is as follows:

The soldier enlisted in the Army on the 4th of January, 1861, and he was discharged therefrom on surgeon's certificate of disability May 29, 1866, and at the time of his enlistment he was a sound, able-bodied man, and when he returned from the Army he was greatly emaciated and debilitated and suffering from chronic diarrhea and heart disease, and that his disease continued to affect his general health and disabled him from performance of manual labor to the date of his death, February 24, 1884. The claim was rejected on the ground that the soldier's death was not due to his army service.

The testimony shows that the soldier contracted chronic diarrhea and heart disease in the Army, and he was treated for this disease to the date of his death, and while he died from lung disease the testimony warrants the conclusion that it was the result of chronic diarrhea, and therefore the result of his army service.

And the testimony further shows that the widow is poor, and she has no person legally bound to support her, and that she is dependent upon her own exertions for her living.

In view of all the facts of this case, the committee recommend that said bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PETER C. CHEEKS.

The next business on the Private Calendar (the consideration of which was asked by Mr. BACON) was the bill (H. R. 7093) granting an increase of pension to Peter C. Cheeks.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Peter C. Cheeks, late a private of the United States Marine Corps, at the rate of $72 per month, in lieu of the amount ($50) per month he is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) is as follows:

The committee find that Cheeks is now receiving $50 per month, on account of consumption of the lungs, as a pension, and applied in 1886 for an increase, which was refused because he was not on the pension-rolls at the time of the passage of the act of June 16, 1890. The examining board, September 25, 1886, passing on his application for relief, find that he is in the last stages of consumption, and so disabled as to require the constant aid of an attendant. Since then he has lingered along a mere physical wreck, and is now in condition of so great feebleness that the prolongation of his life is a cause of wonder.

We recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LOVINA J. REEVES.

The next business on the Private Calendar (the consideration of which was asked by Mr. MILLIKEN) was the bill (H. R. 813) granting a pension to Mrs. Lovina J. Reeves.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Lovina J. Reeves, of Ellsworth, Me., widow of the late Forest Reeves, late of Company M, First Maine Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) is as follows:

This claim was favorably reported by the committee of the Forty-ninth Congress, but was not reached on the Calendar. The facts seem to be that Forest Reeves, the soldier upon whose service this claim is based, was pensioned on account of gunshot wound in right arm, received while serving as private in Company M, First Maine Cavalry. He died July 19, 1879, in the Worcester (Mass.) Lunatic Asylum, where he had been placed on account of insanity. Claim was rejected "on ground that the soldier's fatal disease (insanity) was not predisposed or excited by the gunshot wound of left arm, for which he was pensioned, nor in any manner chargeable to his military service."

The gunshot wound for which Reeves was pensioned is described as inflicted "by a spent ball, which entered on the inner aspect of the left arm, midway between axilla and elbow, and passing upward and backward lodged behind the triceps muscle, where it can now be felt."

Four special examiners worked upon this case and procured a large amount of testimony. Much of it tends to show that soldier had considerable trouble with his wounded arm, which pained him for years at the point where the ball could be felt, and that during his last years the pain extended to his neck and head. He gradually lost his faculties, and some months before he died it became necessary to send him to the asylum.

Dr. Eastman, superintendent of the asylum, says:

"It is very probable the ball hereinbefore mentioned may have produced such injury to the nerves near and among which it passed and remained as led to or hastened the development in the spinal cord and in the brain of the disease which was the pathological cause of his insanity."

In 1884 Dr. Hood, medical referee of the Pension Office, expressed the opinion that, "giving the claimant the benefit of the doubt, with recorded evidence, it appears the claim should be allowed and the widow pensioned;" but subsequent to this Dr. Hood's opinion was overruled and the claim rejected. With the history of Reeves's disability, as disclosed in many affidavits before us, as well as the medical opinions on file favorable to the claim, your committee feel justified in resolving all doubts in favor of the widow, and therefore report the bill back with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

THOMAS BENSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar (the consideration of which was asked by Mr. MILLIKEN) was the bill (H. R. 6070) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Benson.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas Benson, late a private in Company A, Thirty-second Regiment Maine Volunteers, and pay him a pension at the rate of $35 per month, in lieu of the amount he is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) is as follows:

This case was favorably reported by both the committees of the Senate and House of the Forty-ninth Congress, but was not reached for consideration. It appears that soldier served as a private in Company A, Thirty-second Maine Volunteers. He applied at the Pension Office and was granted a pension under the provisions of the general laws at the rate of $24 per month, for amputation of left leg, from March 3, 1883.

He files a petition with your committee asking for an increase on the ground that, in addition to the loss of his left leg below the knee, for which he is now receiving all that is allowed by the provisions of the general law, he also has a shell wound in the right hip, some 8 inches long and 3 inches deep, which is so near the spine that it affects that and the kidneys, and also his right leg and foot. His petition is signed by many neighbors, who ask that his claim be allowed, and the fact of this additional injury and increased disability is fully established. Claimant is poor and unable to labor to support his family.

Your committee report the bill back favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARQUIS D. DAVIS.

The next business on the Calendar (the consideration of which was asked by Mr. TOWNSHEND) was the bill (H. R. 722) for the relief of Marquis D. Davis.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Marquis D. Davis, late a private in Company B, Eighty-ninth Regiment of Illinois Infantry Volunteers, at the rate of $8 per month.

The report (by Mr. LANE) was read, as follows:

The record shows that the soldier was mustered into service in Company B, Eighty-ninth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, August 13, 1862, at Camp Douglas, and while in the line of duty was ruptured and sent home by the officer in charge, with the understanding that his name should be erased from the roll; and his pension was rejected in the Pension Office on the ground that he was never enrolled in the service of the United States.

There can be no question but this soldier served in the Army, and six or seven witnesses testify in the record that the soldier was a sound man when he entered the Army.

The examining surgeon, R. Poindexter, certifies in the record that he examined the soldier for disability from scrotal hernia of left side, and he says in his opinion that soldier received his disability in the service and in the line of duty and that the disability is permanent, and in the opinion of the doctor the soldier is one-half disabled from performing manual labor.

It does not appear why the soldier's name is not on the rolls of the Army, but it is certain that he served in the Army, and while in line of duty and under orders of his comman ler, while drilling, was ruptured, and was injured to such an extent that he was entirely unable to perform the duty of a soldier, and that the soldier was sent home by the officer of the company.

This fact is sustained by the testimony of several of his comrades, and there can be no doubt about the fact of his service and that he received the injury complained of in the line of duty.

The committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass, with an amendment striking out all after "volunteers," in the seventh line of said bill.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES W. HARRIMAN.

The next business on the Calendar (the consideration of which was asked by Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin) was the bill (H. R. 618) granting a pension to James W. Harriman.

The bill is follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James W. Harriman, late of Company E, First Regiment Maine Cavalry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The Adjutant-General, United States Army, reports the soldier to have enlisted December 9, 1861, in Company E, First Maine Cavalry, and was captured in action at Middletown, Md., May 24, 1862, and so borne on the rolls until November and December, 1862, when he is reported present for duty. The rolls for May and June, 1863, show him as absent sick, and same to October, 1863, when he was transferred to the Veteran Reserve Corps—cause not stated—and discharged December, 9, 1864.

The Surgeon-General, United States Army, reports the soldier as follows: Admitted to hospital, Washington, D. C., June 14, 1863, and transferred to Portsmouth Grove, R. I., July 3, 1863, where he was treated for hematuria until February 3, 1864, when he was returned to duty.

The soldier declares that at the battle of Chancellorsville, Va., May 2, 1863, he incurred double inguinal hernia from constant horseback riding, and was ordered to hospital because of his inability to ride. That no examination was made by the surgeon, at either hospital, where he was treated for some bladder trouble and other complaints, to ascertain what his true condition was.

Capt. George W. Hassey testifies that near Chancellorsville, Va., the soldier was injured while in the saddle, and in the line of duty; that he saw him immediately after he was injured, and remembers the fact well, but is unable to state in what part of the body; that he was sent to the hospital for treatment for the injury.

The claimant, unfortunately, can not furnish the affidavit of officers or comrades, showing incurrence of hernia in the service, because of the death of his captain and of Lieutenant Ellis, and because of his inability to find a comrade who is conversant with the facts.

The soldier was discharged December 9, 1834, and subsequently went to Wisconsin, where he arrived January 3, 1865, and got employment as cook in a lumber camp because of his inability to do any heavy lifting.

E. Miner, Necedah, Wis., testifies that he procured a truss for the soldier in January, 1865, and purchased another some two years later.

H. L. Nye and P. R. Stivins testify that they have been acquainted with soldier since 1865; never knew him to do any heavy labor; when he came to Wisconsin he got employment as cook in a lumber camp, and they understood that the reason he could not labor was on account of rupture; that he frequently complained of pains, and trouble generally ascribed to rupture.

The claim was rejected by the Pension Office November 25, 1881, on the ground that there was no record of hernia, and the inability of the claimant to furnish testimony of incurrence in the service.

In view of the fact that some eighteen months elapsed between the date of enlistment and the date the injury was received leads to the presumption that he was sound at the date he entered the service, and as it is shown that he suffered from the cause alleged (rupture) at the date of his discharge, and a truss was purchased for him within thirty days from the date of his discharge, and the United States examining surgeon sets forth in his report that in his opinion the disability was incurred in the service of the United States, we therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZABETH SMITH.

The next business on the Calendar (the consideration of which was asked by Mr. MORRILL) was the bill (H. R. 6478) granting a pension to Elizabeth Smith.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension act, the name of Elizabeth Smith, dependent mother of George Harbaugh, late of Company H, Fifty-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The evidence submitted to your committee in support of this bill shows that Elizabeth Smith is the mother of George Harbaugh, late of Company H, Fifty-fifth Pennsylvania Volunteers. The father of the soldier died long prior to the war, and the mother remarried. Her second husband also died prior to the war. During the war the soldier supported his mother, who was then dependent.

In February, 1864, soldier while at home on a furlough was married, and after his return to the Army he was, a few months afterwards, wounded in action in front of Petersburgh, from the effects of which he died at Fortress Monroe July 11, 1864.

The widow received a pension until 1869, when she re-married. No one is now receiving a pension on account of the soldier's death. As long as he lived he contributed liberally to her support. She is now destitute, and for three years worked for 75 cents a week to support herself. She is now nearly seventy years old, and through the infirmities of age is unable longer to earn a support.

Your committee feel that the general laws ought to be so amended as to include cases of this class, but in the absence of general legislation they recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LOUISE PAUL.

The next business on the Calendar (the consideration of which was asked by Mr. LAFFOON) was the bill (S. 749) granting a pension to Louise Paul.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Louise Paul, widow of Brig. Gen. Gabriel R. Paul, United States Army, and to pay her a pension of $100 a month, in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

Mr. CHEADLE. I will give notice to the gentleman that, unless this goes over to a full House, I shall be compelled to raise the question of a quorum on its passage.

Mr. LAFFOON. Then I ask that it be permitted to go over under the restrictions that have heretofore applied to such bills. I ask that its consideration be fixed for to-morrow, that the previous question be considered as ordered on its passage, and that the usual debate be had on each side for fifteen minutes.

Mr. CHIPMAN. That it take the same course as the Woodbury bill.

Mr. LAFFOON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Let us have the report read.

Mr. CHEADLE. I do not ask the reading of the report, as the bill is not now to be considered.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Very well; since it is not proposed to consider it now.

Mr. LAFFOON. I ask that the report be printed in the RECORD and that the bill go over until to-morrow with the conditions annexed that I have suggested.

Mr. CHEADLE. And let the usual order be made that the previous question be considered as ordered upon the passage of the bill; that fifteen minutes' debate on each side be allowed, and that it go over until to-morow morning, subject, however, to the right of amendment.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The report (by Mr. HUNTER) is as follows:

It appears that by act of Congress approved August 4, 1886, a pension was given to Mrs. Paul as the widow of Brig. Gen. Gabriel R. Paul, United States Army, at the rate of $50 per month. It now appears that Mrs. Paul applies for an increase of pension.

The committee, in considering this application, have had their attention called to the following official statement of facts in support of said application:

"Statement of facts in support of a bill to grant a pension to Louise Paul, widow of Brig. Gen. G. R. Paul, United States Army.

"Brig. Gen. Gabriel R. Paul was born in St. Louis, Mo., appointed to West Point from that State, and graduated in July, 1834. From 1834 to 1839 he was on frontier duty, and in 1839 was engaged in the Florida war. From 1339 to 1842 he was on recruiting duty, and in 1842 was in the war against the Seminole Indians, a camp of whom he surprised near Tampa Bay. He served with distinction throughout the Mexican war, having taken part in the defense of Fort Brown, the battle of Monterey, siege of Vera Cruz, the battle of Cerro Gordo (where he was wounded), Contreras, Churubusco, and Molino del Rey. He led the storming party at Chapultepec, which captured the enemy's flag, and was for this act of gallantry brevetted major. For his service in Mexico he was presented by the citizens of St. Louis with a sword. From 1848 to 1850 he was in garrison at Fort Leavenworth, 1850-'51 at Jefferson Barracks, and in 1851-'52 on frontier duty at Corpus Christi, Tex.

"In 1852 he served with the Rio Grande expedition, in which he captured Carvajal and his gang of desperadoes. He was also in the Utah expedition of 1858-'59-'60, and was engaged in the surprise and capture of a camp of hostile Indians on Spanish Fork. He was actively engaged in the late war, having rendered valuable service in New Mexico in 1861-'62. Subsequently he served with the Army of the Potomac, taking part in the battles of Fredericksburgh and Chancellorsville and in its Pennsylvania campaign. At the battle of Gettysburgh, while in command of a brigade, he was seriously wounded, a bullet entering his head about 1½ inches behind the right eye and on a level with it, passing through his head and emerging through the left socket, carrying the left eye with it.

"Thus in an instant the vision of both eyes was completely destroyed, and at the same time the senses of smell and of hearing were greatly impaired. From the effects of this wound he suffered acutely ever after in the shape of violent attacks of pain in the head and of epilepsy, necessitating the constant presence of an attendant. During the last few years of his life these epileptic attacks became very frequent, not only daily, but sometimes to the number of six during the day and night. It was in one of these attacks of unusual severity, and the direct consequence of it, that he died, as shown by the report of the attending army surgeon, a certified copy of which is appended hereto.

"The career of General Paul was a series of gallant exploits in his country's defense, covering a period of nearly thirty years of actual service in the field, and embracing the Florida wars, the Mexican war, and closing with the battle of Gettysburgh, where his sight was completely destroyed. In recognition of his gallantry on this occasion he was presented by the Twenty-ninth New Jersey Volunteers with a handsome jeweled sword, and was brevetted brigadier-general. In February, 1865, he was retired from active service 'for disability resulting from wounds received in line of duty,' and was assigned to duty at the Soldiers' Home, Washington, D. C., until June, 1865, when he was placed in charge of the Military Asylum at Harrodsburgh, Ky. Here he remained until December 20, 1866. This was his last duty.

"He died in this city on the 5th of May, 1886, having been in the service fifty-one years and ten months. His widow, Mrs. Louise Paul, is much in need, and asks that relief which the bill recently introduced by Senator HAWLEY provides—a relief for which there are very many precedents.

"Respectfully submitted.

"O. D. GREENE,
"Assistant Adjutant-General."

And, in connection with the foregoing, the statement made by Mrs. Paul that owing to the condition of General Paul from the time of his receiving his severe wound it was "such as to entirely disable him from the management of his business," and that "he was so helpless as to need constant attendance," and that "the necessary expenses of his family took up all of General Paul's pay, so that at his death nothing had been saved," and that his widow and daughter are entirely dependent on such pension as may be granted by Congress.

These allegations are supported by the certificate of Dr. O'Reilly, surgeon, United States Army (see Exhibit A), and by other testimony. General Paul was a helpless invalid almost from the date of his wound, received at the battle of Gettysburgh, requiring the constant attention of his wife, and therefore neither one was able either to contribute to an estate or save one. The amount of increase asked for is barely sufficient to secure the object Congress originally had in view in the allowance of a pension by the act of August 4, referred to; and believing this case to be one of exceptional merit and in the line of policy adopted by the Government, this committee recommend that the prayer of the petitioner be granted, and submit the accompanying bill, recommending its passage.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 31, 1887.

SENATOR: As medical attendant for several years on the family of the late Brig. Gen. Gabriel R. Paul, I became well acquainted with their financial affairs. As you are probably aware, General Paul's condition, resulting from a severe wound, was such as to entirely disable him from the management of his business, and he was so helpless as to need constant attendance. The necessary expenses of the family took up all of General Paul's pay, so that at his death nothing had been saved. I believe that Mrs. and Miss Paul are entirely dependent on such pension as may be granted by Congress.

I am, Senator, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. M. O'REILLY, M. D.,
United States Army.

Hon. W. C. WHITTHORNE,
United States Senator.

CULLEN W. GREEN.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. SHIVELY) was the bill (H. R. 3537) granting a pension to Cullen W. Green.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Cullen W. Green, late of Company I, Forty-fourth Indiana Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3537) granting a pension to Cullen W. Green, have considered the same, and now submit the following report:

Cullen W. Green was enrolled January 10, 1862, in Company I of the Forty-fourth Regiment Indiana Infantry Volunteers, and was honorably discharged June 23, 1865.

He filed application for pension March 30, 1880, alleging that at the battle of Mission Ridge, Tennessee, about September 20, 1863, he was ruptured on the left side by straining and overexertion in going down the side of the mountain.

The claim was rejected on the ground of there being no record of the alleged rupture, having received no treatment in service, and claimant being unable to furnish evidence of its incurrence in line of duty, or the testimony of persons who saw the same prior to his discharge.

There is abundance of evidence in the affirmative, and none in the negative, that the soldier at the time of enlistment was a healthy man and free from hernia. The reason there is no medical record or that he is unable to furnish the evidence of comrades is because it was incurred when he was captured at the battle of Chickamauga, Tenn. He was ruptured on the 19th or 20th of September, 1863, at the battle of Chickamauga, while retreating down from the summit of Mission Ridge.

Immediately, the same day, after suffering the injury, he was taken prisoner and confined in Libby Prison about six months. From Libby Prison he was taken to Macon, Ga., and from there to Savannah; from Savannah to Charleston, S. C., and from Charleston to Columbia, and was retained a prisoner of war until March, 1865, when he was paroled and sent to Columbus, Ohio, and was, some time in May, 1865, exchanged and returned to the Forty-fourth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, and was then soon mustered out on account of expiration of term of service. He received no treatment in the Army excepting such as was given him while in the hands of the Confederates. Since his discharge he has been treated for hernia by Dr. R. J. Hagerty, lately deceased, and has received no treatment from any other physician for said complaint. At the time said soldier received said injury he was but twenty years old and did not know what rupture was, and he did not have an opportunity while a prisoner of war to gain any medical information in regard to it.

C. G. Conn testifies as follows:

"I was a prisoner of war and confined at Columbia, S. C., with Lieut. C. W. Green. The said C. W. Green complained of hernia during our imprisonment, and at times seemed to suffer very much from it. I have also been acquainted with him since his return home from the war, and do not consider him capable of enduring severe manual labor. I was also intimately acquainted with him before his enlistment, and am satisfied that at that time he was sound and free from the alleged disability."

E. P. Willard and S. P. Wilcox testify that—

"They have known claimant for about eleven years; that he has not been able to perform manual labor to the extent of a full man's labor, and they believe his disability is the result of rupture or hernia on left side."

Henry C. Dodge, assistant surgeon Seventy-fourth Indiana Volunteers, testifies that—

"In 1872 claimant bought a truss of affiant, and stated that he had tried for a long time to obtain a truss which would hold his hernia in a safe position; that he then stated that he incurred it while being hurried as a prisoner of war down toward the rear of enemy's line."

The examining surgeon, Dr P. D. Harding, says: "Cullen W. Green has a direct inguinal hernia of the left side, which causes a tumor the size of a pheasant's egg. He wears a well-fitting truss and suffers but little when the truss is worn."

After a careful examination of all the evidence in this case, and taking into consideration all the circumstances surrounding the soldier during his long imprisonment, making it impossible for him to furnish such medical and other evidence in regard to his disability as is required by the existing laws and the rules of the Pension Office, the committee are of the opinion that this is a meritorious case, and that the relief asked for in the bill ought to be granted.

We therefore submit a favorable report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOANNA BARRY.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana) was the bill (H. R. 4653) to grant a pension to Joanna Barry.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-rolls the name of Joanna Barry, widow of Lieut. John Barry, late of Company C, First United States Cavalry, subject to the provisions and limitations of the general pension laws.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4653) granting a pension to Joanna Barry, have considered the same, and now submit the following report:

John Barry, husband of Joanna Barry, was pensioned at the rate of $7 per month for chronic rheumatism. The widow filed claim for pension, alleging that soldier died from the effects of the disease for which he was pensioned. The claim was rejected on the ground that it was not proved that the diseases which caused the husband's death were connected as results with his military service.

Dr. Frank Hyatt, the physician who attended the soldier during his last illness, testifies that the immediate cause of his death was stricture of the œsophagus and pneumonia; that the pneumonia was of but one day's duration and hastened his death but little, if any, as the patient was in a moribund condition when it supervened, and he had been expecting him to die for several days; that he believes the stricture of the œsophagus was the immediate cause of his death, and that this stricture was caused by its muscular fibers being the seat of rheumatic inflammation, leading to contraction of that canal; that for several days he was unable to swallow anything solid, and was able to swallow only the smallest amount of liquid; that there was no cancerous cachexia and no symptoms or history of syphilis; that Dr. Basil Morris stated that Captain Barry had contracted rheumatism in the service and had been afflicted with it continuously from discharge; that his limbs were drawn out of shape by it, and, in his opinion, the stricture which caused his death was due to his rheumatic condition.

The only evidence against the testimony of the attending physician is the opinion of the medical referee, which, in the opinion of the committee, is not of sufficient weight, in a pathological sense, to cause a rejection of the claim.

The committee therefore submit a favorable report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ANNA M. THIELE.

The next pension bill called up for consideration (by Mr. MATSON) was the bill (H. R. 6976) for the relief of Anna M. Thiele.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that this bill can not be found at this moment by the Clerk.

Mr. MATSON. I was under the distinct impression that that bill was passed some weeks ago.

The CHAIRMAN. For the present it will be passed over, and the Clerk will make inquiry as to the fact.

JOHN SHINE.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. FORD) was the bill (H. R. 5544) granting a pension to John Shine.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-rolls the name of John Shine, late of Company L, Seventh Regiment Michigan Cavalry, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5544) granting a pension to John Shine, having considered the same, submit the following report:

Shine served in Company L, Seventh Regiment Michigan Cavalry, during the war of the rebellion, and afterwards applied for a pension on account of an injury to his left leg, alleging that it was received in the line of duty. The Bureau of Pensions rejected his application on the ground of "claimant's inability to furnish evidence to show that the alleged injury was received in the line of duty; the evidence strongly indicates that it existed prior to his enlistment."

It apears from Shine's affidavit that he was on temporary picket duty in 1864 with other men, who were unknown to him, and while on such temporary duty his horse was shot, and fell upon his leg, severely injuring him. That he (Shine) is utterly unable to ascertain the whereabouts and furnish the testimony of those who would be prepared to testify to his receiving the injury, because their names and residences are entirely unknown to him. This statement, if believed, would apparently account for his "inability to furnish evidence to show that the alleged injury was received in the line of duty."

As to Shine's reputation for truth and veracity, and as to the existence of his injury prior to enlistment, a number of affidavits have been submitted to the committee, as follows:

Alexander Gillett testifies that—

"He has known Shine for thirty years, and that just prior to his enlistment 'he was called the best workingman in the township of Paris,' where he resided; that Shine returned from the war very lame, saying his horse had been shot and had fallen on him; that his lameness has grown worse of late years, until now he is unable to work; that his reputation for truth and veracity is good."

Charles Yanson testifies that—

"He knew Shine well before his enlistment; that he worked for Shine on his farm, and that Shine was in good physical health, and was not troubled with lameness; that after Shine returned from the war he was lame, and accounted for his lameness by saying his horse had been shot and had fallen on his leg; that Shine bears a good reputation for truth and veracity."

James Dennis, in an affidavit submitted to the committee, states that—

"He has known Shine thirty years, and that when Shine enlisted he was, to all appearances, a healthy man. That when Shine came home from the war he was lame and said his horse had been shot and had fallen upon him. That Shine's reputation for truth is good."

Samuel Langdon testifies that—

"He has known Shine for fifteen years, and that he is an honest man in his dealings with others, and among his neighbors enjoys a good reputation, and is a man whose statements can be relied on fully."

Isaac D. Hazen testifies that—

"He has known Shine well for thirty years, and that he was in good physical health at the time he enlisted; that immediately after Shine came home from the Army affiant saw him, and he was lame in one of his legs, and stated it had been caused by his horse falling on him after being shot; that Shine's lameness has increased ever since, until now he is unable to work; also, that affiant believes Shine's statements in regard to his injury in the service are true; that he is a man of truth and veracity, and bears a good reputation in the neighborhood where he resides."

Dr. John Brady, late assistant surgeon, United States Army, testifies that—

"He was Shine's physician before the war, and that he has no reason to know that he was unsound; that since the termination of the civil war Shine has been an invalid in consequence of an injury to the left knee-joint, and at present he is a permanent invalid."

Dr. Oscar H. Chipman testifies that—

"He was formerly a surgeon in the United States Army and made a physical examination of Shine at the time he enlisted, and that he was a sound, healthy man at that time; that after the war he examined Shine, and found he had an injury to his left leg."

The record in the Surgeon-General's Office discloses the fact that Shine was admitted to the post hospital, Cliffburne Barracks, October 16, 1863, with a contused wound of the knee, and was discharged from the service November 6, 1863.

In view of the above the committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

PLEMAN COOK.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. FORD) was the bill (H. R. 5177) granting a pension to Pleman Cook.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Pleman Cook, late of Company D, Sixth Ohio Cavalry Volunteers, subject to the laws regulating pensions.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill H. R. 5177, having considered the same, beg leave to submit the following report:

Pleman Cook enlisted as a private in Company D, Sixth Regiment Ohio Cavalry, November 2, 1861, and served until the close of the war, being honorably discharged June 27, 1865. On June 28, 1880, he applied for a pension on the ground of hernia in the left groin. On October 14, 1885, his application was rejected by the Department on the ground of "inability of claimant to furnish testimony showing the existence of hernia while he was in the service."

From the testimony submitted to the Pension Department and to the committee, it appears, overwhelmingly, that Cook, at the time of enlistment, was a sound, healthy, able-bodied man, with no hernia or any indication of one. That he served faithfully until the close of the war. That in 1864, at Culpeper, Va., after long-continued and arduous duty in the saddle, upon dismounting, he felt a sharp, smarting pain in the left groin; that after resting awhile upon his back the pain ceased. That he was troubled from time to time thenceforward with the same smarting pain, and that when it came on he was obliged to lie down for awhile because it was so severe he could not continue on duty. That notwithstanding the fact that this pain gave him a good deal of trouble he did not go to a hospital, but continued on duty, although somewhat disabled, until the close of the war. That upon returning home he attempted to work upon his father's farm; that at once, to wit, the second day after he arrived home, a hernia appeared in his left groin, right at the point where he experienced this pain, which hernia has continued ever since.

Taking the conceded circumstances into account, they tend directly to corroborate Cook's statement. That he was an able-bodied man at the time of enlistment there can be no question. That he was ruptured two days after arriving home while performing only ordinary farm work would be a surprising circumstance were it not taken in connection with his statement of injury in the service, the symptoms of which correspond directly with those of hernia.

Cook is now an inmate of the Michigan Soldiers' Home, is paralyzed in his lower limbs, and his rupture has become enlarged. The committee think he should be given the benefit of all doubts, if any exist, and believe that a fair construction of the testimony submitted to them warrants the committee recommending the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

GEORGE W. CROOP.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. RUSSELL, of Connecticut) was the bill (H. R. 8256) granting a pension to George W. Croop.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of George W. Croop, late a private of Company A, Thirty-ninth Illinois Infantry.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8256) granting a pension to George W. Croop, find that he was enrolled as a private in Company A, Thirty-ninth Regiment Illinois Infantry, entered the service on September 16, 1861, and was discharged for disability July 21, 1862. He claims that the disability was chronic diarrhea, incurred in the service, and that he has suffered from it ever since. His claim for pension was rejected because he could not ascertain the address of comrades who served with him, and because, too, the hospital record does not show the exact nature of his disability. He avers that he was in regimental hospital. He was sixty-seven years of age in May, 1883, when he applied for pension, and is now about seventy-one years. His comrades and others petition for a pension on account of his destitute circumstances.

We recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ADELAIDE L. JESSUP.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. LODGE) was the bill (H. R. 2475) granting a pension to Adelaide L. Jessup.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Adelaide L. Jessup, daughter of Robert W. Jessup, late a private in Company K, Seventh Regiment United States Veteran Volunteers, for a pension as minor child of a soldier who died in service.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendment:

In line 8 strike out the words "for a pension as minor child of a soldier who died in service" and insert "and pay her a pension at the rate of $18 per month, such payments to be made to her legally constituted guardian."

The report (by Mr. FRENCH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2475) granting a pension to Adelaide L. Jessup, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

The beneficiary named in the bill is the daughter of Robert W. Jessup, who served as private in Company K, Seventh United States Veteran Volunteers, and was at date of his death, July 21, 1887, a pensioner at the rate of $30 per month. He left no wife surviving. Adelaide L. Jessup is an imbecile, and, having passed the age of sixteen years, is no longer entitled to pension. She is left without means of support, and taken care of at the present time by her only sister, who has been appointed her guardian, but whose financial condition is such as to preclude the possibility of a proper maintenance of this unfortunate woman.

These facts are shown by the certificate of the proper court and the affidavits of credible witnesses who are fully acquainted with all the circumstances surrounding the case.

Congress, in similar cases, has given relief to the helpless and dependent relatives of deceased soldiers, not provided for in the general laws governing the granting of pensions.

The soldier's helpless condition for over twenty years after discharge made it impossible for him to leave any means out of which to maintain his daughter, who, by reason of her unfortunate condition, is herself unable to earn anything towards her support.

Following this liberal action on the part of Congress, your committee report favorably on the accompanying bill, and ask that it do pass, amended, however, by striking out all after the word "Volunteers," in line 8, and insert instead the words "and pay her a pension at the rate of $18 per month, such payments to be made to her legally-constituted guardian."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ISABELLA F. DYKE.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. LONG) was the bill (H. R. 8694) granting a pension to Isabella F. Dyke.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Isabella F. Dyke, mother of the late Edward G. Dyke, late second lieutenant of Company F, Thirty-eighth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendment:

In lines 6 and 7 strike out the words "late second lieutenant of Company F, Thirty-eighth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers," and insert "late first lieutenant and adjutant, Thirty-eighth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers."

The report (by Mr. FRENCH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8694) granting a pension to Isabella F. Dyke, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Isabella F. Dyke is the mother of Edward G. Dyke, who served in Company F, Thirty-eighth Massachusetts Volunteers, and as adjutant of the regiment from August 12, 1862, until May 17, 1865. He contracted disease of lungs while serving as first lieutenant and adjutant, for which he was pensioned at the time of his death, October 10, 1886, at the rate of $30 per month. He left surviving him a widow, who was also pensioned, but left no minor child surviving him. The widow died after the allowance of her claim.

Because of the fact that the soldier left surviving him a widow his mother is not pensionable under existing laws.

It appears, however, from the sworn statement of the chairman of the board of selectmen of Plymouth, Mass., where the mother resides, and others, that she was dependent upon the soldier during his lifetime for her support; that she is seventy-one years of age, in feeble health, nearly blind, and without property or income, and now dependent upon the charity of her friends. Her husband died thirty years ago.

Congress in similar cases has granted relief to the poor and aged parents of soldiers who died of disease contracted in the service, and who are, for reasons heretofore stated, debarred from the benefits of the general pension laws.

The case under consideration is equally meritorious, and therefore your committee report favorably on the accompanying bill, and ask that it do pass, amended, however, by striking out all after the words "Edward G. Dyke," in line 6, and inserting therein instead the words "late first lieutenant and adjutant Thirty-eighth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

TILLMAN FAUX.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. LEHLBACH) was the bill (H. R. 5378) for the relief of Tillman Faux.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Tillman Faux, late a private in Company E, Two hundred and tenth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. PIDCOCK) was read in part.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the report be dispensed with, and that it be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

The report in full is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5378) for the relief of Tillman Faux, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Tillman Faux enlisted in Company E, One hundred and thirty-second Pennsylvania Volunteers, August 7, 1862, and was discharged therefrom May 24, 1863. He again enrolled in Company I, Thirty-fifth Pennsylvania Militia, June 29, 1863, and served in the Gettysburgh campaign until mustered out, August 7, 1863. On the 7th of September, 1864, he again enlisted in Company E, Two hundred and tenth Pennsylvania Volunteers, and served until mustered out, May 30, 1865.

He applied for pension December 8, 1879, on account of rupture of left side alleged to have been incurred about April 1, 1865, near Appomattox Court-House, Va., by the pulling out of a stake to which the surgeon's horse was picketed. This claim has been rejected on the ground that there is no record of the injury, and the parol evidence is not deemed sufficient to establish origin in the service and line of duty, and the rejection was affirmed by the Secretary of the Interior.

The claim has been specially examined, and although none of the witnesses examined were present at the time of the injury (claimant then being on detail at brigade headquarters), a number of comrades testify that they saw the rupture shortly thereafter and while yet in service, and were then informed that it was incurred under the circumstances now related by claimant. The divorced wife of claimant, strongly prejudiced against him, testifies that upon his return home in 1865 he wore a truss, and then informed her that he was ruptured while pulling a stake by order of the surgeon.

The special examiner, in finally submitting the case, says:

"The evidence now on file is not, to my mind, altogether satisfactory, yet I believe other and better can not be furnished. * * * There is a record of wound of right foot about the time he claims to have been ruptured. All this is against him; yet the preponderance of evidence is in his favor. Claim must be admitted or rejected. Doubts should be resolved in his favor. From the evidence secured by Special Examiners Chreyter and Vosburgh, I am inclined to the belief that this claim has merit. Under the liberal practice of the office, I can but recommend that it be allowed."

The Secretary of the Interior, in his decision, likewise refers to the record of treatment for confused wound of foot about the time of injury or rupture alleged, and says that the Department is at a loss to determine why claimant's hospital record should notice contused wound of foot and fail to mention hernia. He further says:

"The claim bears marks of merit, and further investigation might establish it, but as it now stands it is involved in doubts that are too thick to be solved by the Department."

The record of contused wound instead of hernia seems to your committee to be satisfactorily explained. Claimant, in the morning of the day on which he was ruptured by the pulling up of the stake to which the surgeon's horse was picketed, while driving the same stake into the ground, accidentally struck his foot on the instep with the pole of the ax, which did not seem to hurt him much, but afterwards swelled up and troubled him for some time. It was really the more serious of the two injuries received on that day; hence the record of the wound instead of the hernia. The reputation of the claimant is of the highest order, as attested by his employers and neighbors.

From all the evidence in the case it appears to the satisfaction of your committee that claimant was sound at enlistment; that he received an injury while in service which resulted in rupture of left side, and that he has been a constant sufferer therefrom ever since.

The accompanying bill is therefore returned with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FRIEDERICKE RAFF.

The next pension bill on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin) was the bill (H. R. 927) for the relief of Friedericke Raff.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Friedericke Raff, widow of the late Theodore Raff, a private in Battery K, Second Regiment United States Artillery.

The report (by Mr. PIDCOCK) was read in part.

Mr. LONG. I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the report be dispensed with, and that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MATSON. I object.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the report, which is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 927) for the relief of Friedericke Raff, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Friedericke Raff is the widow of Theodore Raff, who served as private in Company K, Second United States Artillery, from February 11, 1859, to February 10, 1864, and died of hydrops, November 24, 1882. He was a pensioner for gunshot wound of abdomen. The widow's claim has been rejected on the ground that the fatal disease was not due to the wound, nor in any other way chargeable to the soldier's military service.

The medical examinations show that ball entered midway between umbilicus and anterior superior spinous process of ilium; made exit over ninth rib near spine.

Charles W. Hagen, late surgeon Fifty-fourth Regiment New York Volunteers, and a prominent physician of Newark, N. J., testifies that he was acquainted with the soldier for ten years prior to his death, and treated him for six years. The wound was immediately beneath the liver. Since 1876 Raff was subject to frequent attacks of hepatitis, peritonitis, enteritis. The liver was enlarged and the patient had an outspoken icterus. In 1880 his condition became critical, the patient was extremely emaciated and anemic, the heart's action became irregular, and anasarca was soon followed by general dropsy. The disease from which the soldier died was hepatitis, which was followed by cirrhosis and general hydrops.

Soldier was also treated for neuralgia and rheumatism while in service, and medical examination shows a rheumatic condition for six years prior to death.

The statement of the family physician should not be ignored in the consideration of the widow's claim. The wound unquestionably appears as a factor in the cause of the soldier's death. Its close proximity to the seat of the disease necessarily suggests a close relation to the fatal disease, if not the direct cause. This is the opinion of the attending physician, and he being skilled in his profession and of good repute, no good reason appears why Congress should not accept the same and grant the relief asked for.

Your committee, therefore, report favorably on the accompanying bill, and ask that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FRANKLIN LONG.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. MORRILL) was the bill (H. R. 5114) granting a pension to Franklin Long.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Franklin Long, of Havana, Kans., late of Company A, Sixty-first Illinois Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

This soldier enlisted in Company A, Sixty-first Illinois Regiment, January 16, 1862, and was discharged February 7, 1865. He applied for a pension, alleging wound of foot by accidental discharge of his own pistol on the 7th of June, 1864. The claim was rejected on the ground that claimant was not in line of duty when the wound was received. The case is clearly stated by the chief of the western division as follows:

"Maj. Daniel Grass testifies in his own handwriting that claimant was a teamster, and on June 7, 1864, near Little Rock, Ark., while in the line of his duty as a soldier, accidentally shot himself with a revolving pistol in the great toe of right foot; that his knowledge of the above facts are derived from seeing claimant shortly after incurrence. Affiant replies to office letter to the same effect. Credibility is of the best. Comrade W. D. Holland testifies to having been present at the time the accident occurred. In reply to office letter he says that claimant accidentally received a pistol wound through great toe, as told in his affidavit; thinks it was in spring of 1864: credibility is good.

"Comrade R. L. Horen testifies that claimant was a teamster, and about June 7, 1864, near Little Rock, Ark., about sundown, while in the line of his duty, claimant accidentally shot himself in the great toe of his right foot, with a revolving pistol, while cleaning the same; that he was personally present and saw claimant shoot himself as above described. In a letter he says that he thinks it was at Duvall's Bluff, on White River; that claimant was sitting in the hind end of a wagon-bed cleaning his revolver; that he (the affiant) stepped aside for something, and he heard the shot, turned and saw the claimant before his shoe was taken off, and it was stated that it went off accidentally; that it went through the toe; that claimant had been out with a scout or piloting a scout. Credibility of the best. Comrade John S. Marshall testifies to having been an eye-witness to the occurrence. There is a record of wound by the Adjutant-General and Surgeon-General.

"This claim, it seems to me, is fully proven, both as to origin and line of duty, and the testimony of the major and one comrade shows that claimant was acting as teamster."

The only point that your committee can conceive of as affording ground for rejection is as to the propriety of claimant's carrying a revolver. He could hardly be expected, as a teamster driving a six-mule team, to carry a piece of light artillery or even a Sharp's rifle or a heavy musket. If allowed to carry arms at all it could only be a revolver or some weapon which would not interfere with his duties in managing his team. If allowed to carry the weapon it was perfectly proper for him to keep it in proper condition for effective use.

Again and again your committee have held that wounds received as this one unquestionably was should be considered as received in line of duty. They therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

MARY FLORA.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. MORRILL) was a bill (H. R. 6006) granting a pension to Mary Flora.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Flora, now of Ellinwood, Kans., dependent mother of Daniel Flora, late of Company I, Thirty-ninth Indiana Infantry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The beneficiary named in the bill is the mother of Daniel Flora, late of Company I, Thirty-ninth Regiment Indiana Volunteers. Her claim for pension has been rejected by the Pension Bureau on the ground that soldier's fatal disease—disease of brain—is, in the opinion of the medical referee, not chargeable to his military service.

The following facts are shown by the papers now before your committee:

Daniel Flora enlisted in the above-described command February 3, 1862, and served until honorably discharged, April 4, 1865. In the spring after his enlistment he had the measles, which, according to the testimony of his officer and comrades, affected his spine and kidneys, as was evident from his frequent complaints. The records of the War Department also show treatment for congestion of the lungs in February, 1864, and for diarrhea at intervals thereafter until discharge. Upon his return to his former home in Monroe County, Indiana, he was totally unfit for the performance of manual labor, and continued so until his removal to Iowa in 1867, where his parents then resided.

Dr. H. W. Miser, a physician of over twenty-five years' practice, testifies that he commenced treating the soldier in the fall of 1867. On examination he found him suffering from considerable tenderness along the spine, more particularly in the lumbar region, with pain over kidneys; treated soldier once or twice a week for two or three months, when he apparently improved. But after an exposure to a rain-storm he got worse and took to his bed. Affiant, upon examination, found inflammation all along the spine, which extended upward till it involved the brain, and he died a raving maniac on the 3d of July, 1868.

The dependence upon the soldier prior to his enlistment, as well as the needy condition of claimant, is clearly established. Her husband has been for many years totally unfit for manual labor, and neither he nor the claimant is possessed of any property affording any income.

After a careful examination of all the evidence in the case it is the opinion of your committee that the soldier's fatal disease is clearly traceable to his military service, and therefore report favorably on the accompanying bill, and ask that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HENRY P. ALEXANDER.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. MORRILL) was the bill (H. R. 2234) granting a pension to Henry P. Alexander.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the name of Henry P. Alexander, late of Company F, One hundred and sixty-ninth Ohio Volunteers, be placed on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The records show that Henry P. Alexander was enrolled on the 2d day of May, 1864, in Company F, One hundred and sixty-ninth Regiment Ohio National Guards, and mustered as a private May 15, 1864. He alleges in a claim filed for pension January 27, 1882, that while stationed and lying idle at Fort Ethan Allen, Va., July 27, 1864, he voluntered to go on picket duty in the place of a recruit whose name he has forgotten; that he went on duty early in the morning with other soldiers, strangers, there being none of his company in the squad; that he remained all day and into the night, when it began to rain; that while he was on his post, sitting on some poles on the opposite side of the road from the squad, with woolen and rubber blankets fastened over his shoulders, his gun accidentally discharged and shot off the index and middle fingers.

He is unable to furnish the evidence of any of his comrades, as he was alone at the time the accident occurred.

Charles Thompson, captain Company F, One hundred and sixty-ninth Regiment, testifies that claimant was a good and faithful soldier; that he was shot by the accidental discharge of his own gun July 17, 1864; that the shot took effect in the index and middle fingers of right hand, removing said fingers at the second joints.

Dr. Sardis P. Taylor, surgeon, testifies that while acting as surgeon at Fort Ethan Allen, July 17, 1864, he dressed a gunshot wound of the first and second fingers of claimant's right hand; that affiant believes he lost said fingers from the accidental discharge of his own gun.

The claim for pension was rejected on the ground of claimant's inability to furnish evidence showing under what circumstances the wound was received, or that he was on duty or in line of duty at the time.

The committee believe the evidence is sufficient to warrant the conclusion that the soldier was in line of duty when the accident occurred, and so believing, we submit a favorable report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

STEPHEN SCHIEDEL.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. MORRILL) was the bill (S. 1015) granting a pension to Stephen Schiedel.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Stephen Schiedel, late of Company D, First Regiment Missouri Light Artillery.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

Stephen Schiedel, the claimant under this bill, made application for pension March 20, 1880, alleging as a basis for his claim that at Corinth, Miss., about June, 1862, while loading logs, of which they were to build their quarters, he sprained his back by overlifting, being obliged to hold one end of a log, the other end having slipped down, falling upon a lever, which flew up and hit him on the left shoulder, injuring the same; that he was treated by regimental surgeon and in the hospital at Corinth, Miss., and at Huntsville, Ala., and by doctors at Hamburgh, N. Y., and Hubbard, Ohio. The claim was rejected by the Commissioner of Pensions June 30, 1883, on the ground "that the evidence, the sources of which appeared to be exhausted, fails to show origin of injury to back and left shoulder in the service and line of duty."

The claimant in an affidavit states that he can not furnish the testimony of officers who knew of his injury for the reason that both the captain and lieutenant are dead; can not furnish the affidavit of the regimental surgeon who treated him, as he became a colonel and was killed; that the two other surgeons, whose names and whereabouts he can not give, treated him at different times.

The soundness of claimant prior to enlistment is established beyond any reasonable doubt. Two comrades testify to incurrence of the disability in the service, both being present at the time and witnessed the accident.

The testimony of his neighbors since his discharge uniformly shows continuance, and that "he complained almost all the time of his lame back and shoulder."

Dr. Julian Harmon, examining surgeon at Warren, Ohio, reporting the results of his examination, gives it as his opinion that "the claimant is three-eighths incapacitated for obtaining his subsistence by manual labor from the cause above stated, injury to back and left shoulder."

The board at Cleveland, Ohio, August 30, 1882, report that his disability is three-eighths total.

Claimant was examined at Youngstown, Ohio, March 22, 1883, by Examining Surgeon J. McCurdy, who finds "the formation of his shoulders perfect, but there is a low but distinct creaking in left shoulder-joint, indicating low form of inflammation following injury or chronic rheumatism. Rating, $4, or one-half." After his examination he rates him at total, or $8.

The War Department records show that Stephen Schiedel was enrolled October 21, 1861, in Company C, First Missouri Artillery, and was mustered out October 29, 1864.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

GEORGE W. SCHELL.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. MORRILL) was the bill (S. 625) granting a pension to George W. Schell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of George W. Schell, late of Company D, Thirty-seventh Regiment of Iowa Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 625) granting a pension to George W. Schell, submit the following report:

The following report from the Committee on Pensions in the Senate sets forth the facts in the case and is adopted with the recommendation that the bill do pass:

[Senate Report.]

Claimant enlisted as a private in Company D, Thirty-seventh Iowa Volunteer Infantry, September 23, 1862, and was discharged May 24, 1865, and has not since been employed in the military or naval service. He was pensioned for disability on account of chronic diarrhea, January 24, 1883, at the rate of $2 per month, commencing May 25, 1865, and ending September 26, 1869, disability having ceased.

On the 4th day of May, 1885, claimant made application for pension on account of total blindness of left eye and great impairment of vision of right eye, making it impossible for him to distinguish objects at a distance of 1 foot from his eyes. Said disability he alleges was contracted under the following circumstances: While a member of Company D, Thirty-seventh Iowa Volunteer Infantry, in the service and in the line of his military duty at Memphis, Tenn., August 29, 1864, he, with his company, was employed in guarding military stores, then being transported from Memphis to various points along the line; being compelled to ride upon the top of the cars, was greatly exposed to the burning rays of the sun, causing pain in his eye; that his eyes were also affected by straining while on guard duty dark nights in his efforts to recognize passing objects.

The claim was rejected April 17, 1886, on the ground of no record, no medical or other competent evidence showing origin of sunstroke or existence of disease of eyes in the service, or continuance of said disease from discharge to 1877. Claimant alleges loss of left eye in 1877, and of right eye in 1880—probably due to old age, being now seventy years old.

The testimony on file is in substance as follows: Claimant states that he was perfectly sound at the date of his enlistment, and especially free from any disease or affection of his eyes; that he could see to read the finest print; that all of his relatives possessed good eye-sight; that his eyes began to fail about July 1, 1864, while on picket duty at Memphis, Tenn.; that he first felt great dizziness, accompanied by headache, with pain in the region of his temples and across his forehead and over his eyes, causing for the time being almost total blindness; that he was treated in no hospital, but continued on duty, and that his eyes have affected him from 1864 to the present time; that he was detailed to assist about the regimental quartermaster's department at Cincinnati, Ohio; that upon going to work his sight had become so impaired that he could neither see to weigh upon the scales or to read and write without the use of eye-glasses, which he purchased; that whenever he worked in a stooping position, causing his blood to become heated, he would feel an oppressive sensation about his temples, and blindness would come over him; that from the date of incurrence to 1877 the loss of sight gradually increased, and that in 1877 the sight of his left eye became wholly extinct; that his eyes were examined by Professor Holby, of Iowa City, Iowa, who gave him no encouragement as to good results from medical treatment; that the sight of his right eye continually declined to the year 1880, at which time he became unable to distinguish one object from another; that his eyes were examined by one Professor Smythe, of Lawrence, Kans., who gave him no encouragement in the hope of bettering his sight by medical treatment; that from the date of his discharge to 1880 he had performed some manual labor at his occupation of raising small fruit, but since the last-mentioned time he has been wholly disqualified for manual labor on account of his alleged disability, and dependent upon the labor of two small boys for the support of himself and family; that he is unable to furnish medical testimony showing treatment of his disability while in the service; that he will be compelled to rely upon the testimony of his lieutenant, who had personal knowledge of the facts in the case, as to origin, and his neighbors' testimony as to continuance; that he gave up all he had in defense of his country, and that his children are deprived of the opportunity for education by reason of the fact that they are compelled to labor to support him.

Prentice Ransom, first lieutenant and quartermaster of the Thirty-seventh Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, testifies that up to June, 1864, claimant's eye-sight was unimpaired; that said regiment was on picket duty at Memphis, Tenn., guarding supplies sent by railroad; that the weather was excessively hot, and that claimant by riding on box-cars in the hot sun became dizzy, as he was informed by claimant, a day or two afterwards; that from this period of time his eye-sight began to fail him and he was compelled to use glasses to see to read or write; that he frequently saw claimant from the date of his discharge to the date of his removal to Kansas, and that his eye-sight continued to fail him, causing almost total blindness in one eye.

Robert Taylor, sergeant Company H, Thirty-seventh Iowa Volunteer Infantry, testifies that claimant's eye-sight was good up to about July 1, 1864, at which time it became impaired by doing guard duty at Memphis, Tenn., by exposure to the hot sun from the top of the cars; that claimant's eye-sight gradually grew worse from that time, until now he has entirely lost the sight of his left eye, and the sight of his right eye is so dim that he can not distinguish objects; that the facts testified to are from personal knowledge.

James P. Johnson, commissary sergeant, Thirty-seventh Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, testifies that, in 1864, while claimant was in the service, his eyes became diseased; that he can not now state just what the disease was called. He substantiates this statement when questioned by a special examiner of the Bureau of Pensions.

Wesley E. Platt testifies to a continuance of loss of eye-sight from 1880 to 1885.

Frederick Theobold testifies to prior soundness and continuance of impaired vision from 1865 to 1879.

Augustus W. Dales testifies to continuance of loss of eye-sight from 1873 to the present time.

The following-named citizens of Douglas County, Kansas, in their petition to the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, state that claimant is totally unable to perform manual labor of any kind, owing to severe blindness; that he is very feeble, being sixty-nine years of age, and is entirely without means of support; that his disability developed very gradually, and that it will be impossible for him to prove its origin in the service, as his officers and comrades took no notice of it at the time; that claimant is a reputable citizen, temperate in all of his habits, and given to no excesses of any kind; that they therefore respectfully request the passage of a special act granting claimant an invalid pension, commencing, if possible, from November 1, 1880, the date he became totally blind.

L. J. Warden, postmaster; M. Summerfield, clerk district court; E. Jones; James N. Davis; Robert Taylor; J. S. Crew; A. T. Hannald, register of deeds; J. W. Watts; M. D. Greenlee, deputy clerk of the court; Paul R. Brooks, treasurer of the county; W. W. Fluke; G. H. Murdock; J. D. Bowersock, mayor; Theodore Gardiner; W. E. Benson; D. R. Prentice, chief of police; Alfred Whitman; M. Tisdale; Jacob House; Joel S. White, county clerk; R. D. Mason; J. G. Barber; J. P. Harris; John Barber; R. Carpenter; R. Storm; J. N. Roberts, representative sixteenth district.

Claimant is rated by the board of United States examining surgeons at Topeka, Kans., for total blindness of both eyes.

The statement of Robert Taylor before a special examiner of the Bureau of Pensions, that he had no knowledge of claimant's blindness in the service, should not be regarded as adverse testimony, from the fact that the evidence in the case shows that claimant's disability was of gradual development, beginning in 1864, and resulting in total blindness of left eye in 1877, and of the right eye in 1880. It is clearly shown by the evidence on file in the claim that the applicant for pension was free from impaired vision till about July 1, 1864, and from that date his sight began to fail him and continued to grow worse, resulting in total blindness of left eye in 1877, and of total blindness of right eye in 1880.

The facts in the case warrant favorable action, and the committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MICHAEL LANE.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. MORRILL) was the bill (S. 1286) granting a pension to Michael Lane.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Michael Lane, late of Company H, Nineteenth Regiment Kansas State Militia.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1286) granting a pension to Michael Lane, submit the following report:

Michael Lane first enlisted March 25, 1863, as a private in Company M, Second Regiment Nebraska Cavalry, at Nemaha City, Nebr., for nine months. Served full time, was mustered out with his company, receiving an honorable discharge December 23, 1863.

In his declaration for pension he alleges that he enlisted October 8, 1864, in Company H, Nineteenth Regiment Kansas State Militia; that on or about October 24, 1864, he contracted hernia upon the right side of the lower part of his abdomen of an inguinal character, caused by his horse falling upon him while he was in the line of his duty as a soldier in full pursuit of the retreating enemy; his horse being upon the gallop struck his forefeet into a prairie-wolf hole, causing said horse to turn a complete summersault, claimant falling under him; that he was not treated in any hospital.

The War Department reports his service in the Second Nebraska Cavalry, and says the Nineteenth Kansas Militia is unknown to the Department.

The adjutant-general of Kansas reports that Michael Lane was enrolled August, 1864, in Leavenworth County by Capt. E. Moore, and ordered into active Kansas State militia service as private in Company H, Nineteenth Kansas Volunteer Militia, on the 8th day of October, 1864, at Leavenworth, by Governor Carney, under a proclamation issued in pursuance of a general order issued by Major-General Curtis, United States Army, commanding department, and that he was relieved from duty October 25, 1864, by order of the governor.

Two comrades testify as to incurrence and continuance. The board of examining surgeons at Topeka, Kans., under date of July 1, 1885, find a direct right hernia as large as an orange; rings dilated 1½ by 1¼ inches; borders of rings soft and patulous; unable to retain hernia with truss because of size and patulous condition of parts; and rate him for rupture on right side at total.

In a petition accompanying the bill the claimant states that he is now seventy-three years of age; that these services were rendered and his disability incurred during the Price raid in 1864, when the Kansas militia was under the command of an officer of the United States Army.

In view of the fact of his extreme age and the twenty-four years of consiant suffering from this painful disability, we think Michael Lane's name should be placed on the pension-roll, and therefore recommend the passage of this bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARGARET M. COLLINS.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar called up for consideration (by Mr. MORRILL) was the bill (S. 1286) granting a pension to Margaret M. Collins.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret M. Collins, mother of John B. Collins, deceased, late of Company D, Fourteenth Regiment of Kansas Volunteers.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report.

Mr. MORRILL (before the conclusion of the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the report be dispensed with. This is the case of a dependent mother, the soldier having died in the service.

Mr. MATSON. I object.

The report was read in full, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1015 granting a pension to Margaret M. Collins, submit the following report:

The claimant is Margaret M. Collins, dependent mother of John B. Collins, late a private of Company D, Fourteenth Kansas Volunteer Cavalry, who enlisted August 2, 1863, and died of typhoid fever in regimental hospital at Fort Smith, Ark., August 29, 1864.

The claim was rejected October 15, 1885, on the ground that the claimant was not dependent upon nor supported by the soldier prior to and at time of soldier's death, it appearing in evidence in special examiner's report that her husband was then able to and did render her a comfortable support.

The evidence shows that the soldier was son of the claimant, never married, and left no widow or children surviving him.

The evidence is absolutely conclusive that this mother is now sixty-three years of age, penniless, and with her husband dependent on others for support.

Your committee, following the established rules that have governed them in this class of cases, recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. MATSON (at 10 o'clock p. m.). I move that the committee rise.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. MACDONALD. I suggest to the gentlemen on the other side that this motion should be agreed to. Last Friday evening it took very nearly all the time between the rising of the committee and the hour fixed for adjournment to dispose of the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole.

The motion was not agreed to; there being—ayes 11, noes 13.

STEPHEN C. LOBDILL.

The next business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. MACDONALD) was the bill (S. 760) granting a pension to Stephen C. Lobdill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Stephen C. Lobdill, late of Company G, Twenty-fourth Ohio Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The report of the Pension Committee in the Senate sets forth fully and clearly the evidence in this case.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

SENATE REPORT.

Stephen C. Lobdill enlisted June 6, 1861, for three years, as private in Company G, Twenty-fourth Ohio Volunteers, and was discharged for disability June 9, 1862. He filed a claim for pension October 25, 1869, alleging that while in line of duty at Cheat Mountain, West Virginia, on or about August 2, 1861, and engaged with the command in building breastworks, he was ruptured while lifting a heavy log.

Joseph Reamer testifies that he was with claimant at Cheat Mountain, West Virginia, working on breastworks; was lifting on the same log with him, and heard claimant cry out; saw him within an hour in the hospital tent.

August Thomas was also with him at the same time, lifting and piling heavy logs; says claimant fainted when rupture occurred; helped carry him to hospital tent; his suffering was acute. Up to the time of rupture he was a man of wonderful physical development, having shown no indication of ill health. He passed a rigid physical examination with affiant at Camp Chase, being stripped.

These accounts of the incurrence of the rupture are corroborated by Comrades Hettel, Myers, and Hughes.

Not recovering from the rupture, the claimant was discharged June 9, 1862, on surgeon's certificate of disability, which stated: "Umbilical hernia; he has been entirely unfit for duty since the 12th day of July, 1861. He has had it for many years."

The last clause of this surgeon's certificate, through the efforts of the Pension Office to establish its truth, has cost the claimant his pension for the past eighteen years. It is alleged on behalf of the claimant that this clause is untrue; that his rupture originated as detailed; that the surgeon made the statement on his own responsibility and without knowledge of the facts.

To prove his sound health and freedom from rupture before enlistment there is the testimony of Dr. W. J. Clary, who was the family physician of claimant's mother and grandfather, and who testifies that he knew claimant for five years before enlistment. Claimant lived with his grandfather, and was perfectly sound and free from hernia. He was a remarkably strong boy. If he had been so affected, the witness, from his relations with the family, must have known the fact. Never heard it spoken of.

Franklin Murphy and Isaac Smith knew claimant one from infancy, and the other for ten years before enlistment; claimant had worked for both at various times up to his enlistment, and both testify to claimant's soundness.

C. M. Lake and Joseph Weeks testify that they played with him when a boy, and worked with him when a man, and never heard of his having a rupture up to his enlistment. J. N. Griffin testifies to his soundness, having known him intimately. H. J. Scouton testifies that he knew him intimately before enlistment, being often with him, and that just after claimant's enlistment he was in bathing with him, and knows he was free from rupture; six comrades testify that he was sound at enlistment and up to the time he was injured, as he claims, five of whom positively state that at enlistment he was subjected to a thorough examination, while naked, with them and in their presence, which would certainly have resulted in his rejection had rupture existed. In all some thirteen witnesses testify explicitly to this point of prior soundness, from the personal knowledge derived from intimate acquaintance. In addition to all this is the acceptance of claimant into service as a sound man and the fact that he is a man of high standing in his community, where his statements are received with confidence and respect.

The only evidence in the case to sustain the surgeon's certificate is the statement of Laura Haff, a cousin of the claimant, who says she had heard his mother say that he had this difficulty from boyhood. The witness testifies from hearsay, and not from personal knowledge.

On a careful review of the testimony in this case, it is difficult to understand, from any known standard of the value of evidence, on what meritorious ground the claim under consideration was rejected, or why its affirmance was delayed beyond the necessary limit of office routine. There is no reason to doubt the receipt of the injury in service and in the line of duty, nor that it is of pensionable degree and continuous to the present time.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration the Private Calendar, had directed him to report sundry bills with various recommendations.

BILLS PASSED.

House bills of the following titles, reported without amendment, were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 7025) granting a pension to Evalina P. Brown;
A bill (H. R. 6840) for the relief of Hiram M. Goss;
A bill (H. R. 8291) granting a pension to Julia Welch;
A bill (H. R. 7693) granting an increase of pension to Peter C. Checks;
A bill (H. R. 813) granting a pension to Mrs. Lovina J. Reeves;
A bill (H. R. 6070) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Benson;
A bill (H. R. 618) granting a pension to James W. Harriman;
A bill (H. R. 6478) granting a pension to Elizabeth Smith;
A bill (H. R. 3537) granting a pension to Cullen W. Green;
A bill (H. R. 4653) granting a pension to Joanna Barry;
A bill (H. R. 5544) granting a pension to John Shine;
A bill (H. R. 5177) granting a pension to Pleman Cook;
A bill (H. R. 8256) granting a pension to George W. Croop;
A bill (H. R. 5378) for the relief of Tillman Faux;
A bill (H. R. 927) for the relief of Friedericke Raff;
A bill (H. R. 5114) granting a pension to Franklin Long;
A bill (H. R. 6006) granting a pension to Mary Flora; and A bill (H. R. 2234) granting a pension to Henry P. Alexander.

House bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole House with amendments, were taken up, the amendments agreed to, the bills as amended severally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 722) for the relief of Marquis D. Davis;
A bill (H. R. 2475) granting a pension to Adelaide L. Jessup; and A bill (H. R. 8694) granting a pension to Isabella F. Dyke.

Senate bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole House without amendment, were severally ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed:

A bill (S. 1017) granting a pension to Stephen Schiedel;
A bill (S. 625) granting a pension to George W. Schell;
A bill (S. 1286) granting a pension to Michael Lane;
A bill (S. 1015) granting a pension to Margaret M. Collins; and
A bill (S. 760) granting a pension to Stephen C. Lobdill.

MRS. D. P. WOODBURY.

The bill (H. R. 5961) to increase the pension now paid to Mrs. D. P. Woodbury was taken up.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill is now before the House on the question of its engrossment and third reading. It has been reported from the Committee of the Whole House with the recommendation that it go over until to-morrow morning, that the previous question be considered as ordered, the right to offer amendments being reserved, and that debate be allowed for fifteen minutes on each side. If there be no objection, the order recommended by the Committee of the Whole House will be agreed to.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

LOUISE PAUL.

The bill (S. 749) granting a pension to Louise Paul was taken up, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill has been reported from the Committee of the Whole House with a recommendation that it go over until to-morrow morning, that the previous question be considered as ordered, the right to offer amendments being reserved, and that debate be allowed for fifteen minutes on each side.

Mr. MATSON. I believe I must object to this order unless the substance and the number of the amendments be stated now. In justice to the House we ought to have some understanding how much time is to be occupied upon the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. The entire debate is not to occupy more than fifteen minutes on each side; and the offering of amendments will not extend the time for debate.

Mr. MATSON. If it be understood that the offering of amendments is not to give the right to additional debate, I will not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the understanding of the Chair. If there be no objection, the order recommended by the Committee of the Whole House will be made. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MATSON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the several bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House have been passed; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARY L. CLEVELAND.

Mr. McCREARY. I move, by unanimous consent, that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9877) granting an increase of pension to Mary L. Cleveland.

There being no objection, the motion was agreed to.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, the name of Mary L. Cleveland, widow of John H. Cleveland, a soldier of the war of 1812, at the rate of $25 per month, in lieu of the amount now received by her under the law.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9877) granting an increase of pension to Mary L. Cleveland, have considered the same, and report as follows:

The husband of the claimant, John D. Cleveland, served in Capt. Conrad Saxe's company, Vermont militia, from July 15, 1812, to December 8, 1812. The widow is now drawing pension under the act of March 9, 1878, at $12 per month. She applies for increase to $25 per month.

Her physicians, Drs. C. S. Abell and A. D. Price, gentlemen of credibility and truth, certify that she is now over eighty years of age, and in very feeble health, being unable to walk or to arise from her chair when sitting, or to dress herself. She has no property of any kind, and is entirely dependent upon two grandchildren, who are financially unable to render her proper assistance.

The committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McCREARY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to recorsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARTHA B. PERRY.

Mr. GROUT. I move, by unanimous consent, that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4100) granting a pension to Martha B. Perry.

There being no objection, the motion was agreed to.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll the name of Martha B. Perry, foster-mother of Charles H. Perry, late of Company G, Fourth Vermont Volunteers, deceased, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4100) granting a pension to Martha B. Perry, having considered the same, report as follows:

Charles H. Perry enlisted as a private in Company G, Fourth Vermont Volunteers, in the early part of the war, and served continuously until June 5, 1864, on which day he was killed in battle at Cold Harbor, Virginia.

The claimant is the foster-mother of soldier, but as such can not secure pension through the regular channel. The evidence shows that claimant tenderly cared for soldier from the age of four years, at which date she became the second wife of his father. It also appears from letters of soldier filed with your committee that during his army service he contributed to the support of his foster mother, addressing her in the most affectionate terms. Claimant is seventy-five years of age and in destitute circumstances. If she had been the natural mother of soldier she would long ago have been pensioned, and as the evidence conclusively shows that she was to him, from the tender age of four years, everything that a natural mother could have been, it brings the case directly within the rule laid down by Congress in a great many cases which have already become laws by special act.

Your committee recommend that the bill be amended by substituting the word "place" for the word "put," in the fourth line, by substituting the words "foster-mother" for the word "widow," in the fifth line, and by adding after the word "laws," in the seventh line, the words "and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month," and that as thus amended the bill do pass.

The amendments of the committee were agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GROUT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. JEANNIE STONE.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I move to take up and concur in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 401) granting a pension to Mrs. Jeannie Stone.

There was no objection, and the bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Mrs. Jeannie Stone, widow of General Charles P. Stone, a pension, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The Senate amendment was read, as follows:

Add at the end of the bill "at the rate of $50 a month."

Mr. ROBERTSON. The bill came from the Senate amended as indicated, and was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and as I understand that committee recommended concurrence.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CYNTHIA WITHERELL.

Mr. MOFFITT. I move, by unanimous consent, that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3868) granting a pension to Cynthia Witherell.

There being no objection, the motion was agreed to.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place the name of Cynthia Witherell, widow of David J. Witherell, late of Captain Thumway's company of New York Militia, war of 1812, on the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3868) granting a pension to Cynthia Witherell, have considered the same, and beg leave to report as follows:

Cynthia Witherell, the claimant, is the widow of David J. Witherell, who served in the war of 1812 as a soldier in Capt. Duty Shumway's company, in Colonel Adams's regiment New York Militia.

In her petition to Congress, and in her application before the Pension Office, she declared that her husband had served for a period sufficient to warrant her a pension under the act approved March 9, 1878. The Pension Bureau rejected her claim on the ground of the insufficient period of service, it having appeared by a report from the honorable Third Auditor, United States Treasury Department, that Witherell had been paid only for a period of eleven days, namely, from the 11th to the 22d day of September, 1814, while the act referred to requires a service of fourteen days.

Your committee have obtained from the adjutant-general of the State of New York the information that the rolls in his office show, as a fact, that Witherell enlisted in the company and regiment mentioned on the 8th day of September, 1814, for the period of sixteen days.

These reports of the auditor and adjutant-general of the State satisfy your committee that the man actually served a period of fifteen days, and the statement of the Third Auditor in the case shows that the regiment went as far as Burlington, Vt., to meet the invasion of the British.

There is on file before your committee the testimony of the leading citizens and local officers of the town in which the claimant resides showing that she is held in high esteem, but is in a needy condition. Her age is now seventy-two years.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. MOFFITT. I move to correct the name "Thumway" so it will read "Shumway."

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MOFFITT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN G. MERRITT.

Mr. MACDONALD. I move, by unanimous consent, that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 2738) granting an increase of pension to John G. Merritt.

There being no objection, the motion was agreed to.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of John G. Merritt, late sergeant of Company K, First Regiment Minnesota Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension of $45 per month, in lieu of the pension he now receives.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2738) granting an increase of pension to John G. Merritt, submit the following report:

The report of the Senate Committee on Pensions is herewith adopted and the passage of the bill recommended.

[Senate Report No. 1113, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

The following report was made by your committee on this case during the Forty-fifth Congress, and a bill was passed then, giving claimant a pension of $24 a month, which he is now receiving under that act. He now asks that this pension be increased to $45 per month on account of increased disability, the grounds for which are set forth in the following statements:

Mr. John G. Merritt, late a sergeant in Company K, First Regiment of Minnesota Volunteer Infantry, was pensioned at $18 per month for shell wound of the left leg below the knee.

He filed an application for increase, alleging that the wounded limb is gradually wasting and is the source of constant and severe pain, and that his disability is equivalent to the loss of the limb for purposes of manual labor.

He was examined May 25, 1878, by the board of examining surgeons, Washington, D. C., who find "shell wounds of left leg, fracture of tibia and fibula just below the middle third; cicatrices large and adherent, and great deformity; leg shortened 4 inches; ankle-joint swollen, motion impaired; evident loss of strength, causing great lameness, equivalent to loss of hand or foot."

The claim was rejected on the ground that he is now receiving the highest pension allowed by law for disabilities of a like nature.

He claims that his limb, in the condition it now is, is as useless as though it had been amputated at or above the knee-joint, and asks that this special act be passed increasing his pension to $24 per month.

The committee regard the claim of the applicant as sustained by the evidence, and recommend the passage of the bill.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Your petitioner, John G. Merritt, of the State of Minnesota, respectfully represents that being a soldier of the First Regiment Minnesota Volunteer Infantry, in the late war of the rebellion, was severely wounded while engaged with his regiment in the battle of Bull Run, in the State of Virginia, on the 21st of July, 1861.

I was wounded in my left leg below the knee. The leg is 4 inches shorter than the right one and entirely useless so far as manual labor is concerned; is constantly swollen and inflamed (see medical examination) and very much shrunken in size from knee to hip joint. The wound has discharged constantly for the last ten or twelve years, and has to be dressed daily, and at times requires constant attention from my wife or one of my children, and during the last ten years I have undergone five surgical operations, giving me temporary but not permanent relief. My suffering is great and constant.

I now receive as a pension but $24 per month, and I consider myself entitled, on account of increasing disability, to receive the same amount as those pensioners who have had their limbs amputated above the knee and are prevented the use of an artificial limb.

JOHN G. MERRITT.

APRIL 20, 1888.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 17, 1888.

I hereby certify that I have examined Mr. John G. Merritt, and find that he is suffering from necrosis of the bones of the left leg, the result of gunshot wound fracturing both bones. The leg is deformed, shortened, and painful, with chronic ulcers about the seat of injury. He has undergone several serious operations without relief, one of which I performed myself about four years ago. The condition is incurable and he would probably be better off with the leg amputated.

J. FORD THOMPSON, M. D.,
804 Seventeenth street.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 16, 1888.

This will certify that I have been called upon to render professional services to Capt. J. G. Merritt, late sergeant of Company K, First Regiment Minnesota Volunteers, and find after a careful examination that he is suffering from the effects of a gunshot wound of the left leg below the knee.

The wound is still open and at times becomes very much swollen and inflamed, and within the last few years has frequently discharged pieces of dead bone, and I believe that unless an improvement takes place, which is not warranted by the present condition, an amputation will be necessary.

By the constant absorption of septic matter his health has been very much broken down.

There is also an atrophy or shrinking in the size of the limb, it being by measurement 2 inches less in circumference than the right, and as a consequence a corresponding weakness. His sufferings at times are intense.

J. W. BAYNE, M. D.,
Late Acting Assistant Surgeon, United States Army.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MACDONALD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JENNIE HART MULLANY.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I move, by unanimous consent, that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 2346) granting an increase of pension to Jennie Hart Mullany.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jennie Hart Mullany, widow of J. R. Madison Mullany, late rear-admiral in the United States Navy, and pay her at the rate of $50, in lieu of that which she is now receiving.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I move by unanimous consent that this bill go over to be acted on with other bills on the 28th instant, and under like conditions.

A MEMBER. No; but to-morrow.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania can not be here to-morrow.

The motion of Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, was agreed to; and the bill was accordingly postponed until the 28th instant.

Mr. DOCKERY. Subject to like conditions as in the other cases.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Of course.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of 10.30 p. m. having arrived, in accordance with previous order the Chair declares the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 26, 1888.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

DEFICIENCY IN APPROPRIATIONS FOR COLLECTING REVENUE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 9788) making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments.

Mr. FORNEY. I ask that this be committed to the Committee on Appropriations, and that the amendments be ordered to be printed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 5445) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 786) to provide a building for the United States courts, post-office, custom-office, and internal-revenue office at Vicksburg, Miss.;

A bill (S. 2345) authorizing the construction of bridges across the Cape Fear River, Black River, and the Northeast River, in the State of North Carolina;

A bill (S. 2481) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Kentucky River and its tributaries by the Louisville, Cincinnati and Virginia Railway Company;

A bill (S. 2883) for the relief of S. H. Pierce; and

A bill (S. 1747) to authorize the sale of a tract of land in the military reservation of Fort Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FORNEY. I demand the regular order.

Mr. DIBBLE. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment to ask the appointment of a conference committee.

Mr. FORNEY. Very well; I will yield for that purpose.

PUBLIC BUILDING, BAY CITY, MICH.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, the Senate have amended the House bill No. 7263 and requested a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes thereon. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to recommend non-concurrence in the Senate amendments, and to agree to the conference asked.

Mr. PAYSON. What is the bill?

The SPEAKER. The title will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7263) for the erection of a public building at Bay City, Mich.

There being no objection, the motion of Mr. DIBBLE was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will announce the conferees during the day.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FORNEY. I renew the demand for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that by reference to the Journal it is ascertained that certain bills, acted upon at the evening sessions of the House, have come over under the operation of the previous question. These bills are the unfinished business, and the first thing in order will be to dispose of that unfinished business.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent that the bills which come over by reason of the previous question having been ordered upon them last evening, as well as the bills which came over with the previous question ordered, and the consideration of which was fixed by unanimous consent for next Monday, be postponed until the 19th day of June. The reason that I make this suggestion is that the appropriation bills are pressing now, and the Ways and Means Committee desire the time for the consideration of revenue bills. The bills to which I refer are private pension bills, and can be considered and disposed of at any time. I fix the 19th of June, because at that time the House will likely be in a condition of truce, so far as political matters are concerned.

Mr. DIBBLE. I would suggest to the gentleman that that day is already set apart by special order of the House.

Mr. MATSON. Then I will say the 20th of June.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. Let me suggest to the gentleman that the 19th of June is the date of the Republican convention, and as probably quite a number will be absent from the House, it is not likely they can be here on the 20th.

Mr. DINGLEY. Suppose the gentleman from Indiana suggests the 5th of June, as perhaps it will suit gentlemen better than the day fixed. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I withdraw the suggestion I made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the bills coming over from last evening as unfinished business, and those which have been postponed until next Monday, may be all postponed until the 20th day of June, immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Will the gentleman consent to substitute the 6th day of June?

Mr. MATSON. The reason I fix the 20th, as I have suggested, is that probably more Republicans are going to Chicago than Democrats to St. Louis, and the House will certainly be in a condition of truce so far as politics are concerned. There will not be any special business pressing, and these bills can be taken up and disposed of at that time. I understand that but few Democrats are going to St. Louis.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again submit the request of the gentleman from Indiana, that these bills be postponed until the 20th day of June, the previous question ordered, and the same conditions applying as now apply. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. FORNEY. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees, and if that is carried will ask unanimous consent that gentlemen having reports to make may hand them in at the desk.

The motion to dispense with the morning hour was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to allowing reports from committees to be handed in at the desk?

There was no objection.

FILING OF REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

The following reports of committees were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

BRAZOS RIVER.

Mr. STEWART, of Texas, from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, reported the bill (H. R. 10165) for the improvement of the Brazos River; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MILITIAMEN.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported with amendment the bill (S. 1529) to amend paragraph 3 of section 4693 of the Revised Statutes, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, NEW LONDON, CONN.

Mr. SOWDEN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1846) for the erection of a public building at New London, Conn.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS FOR STORES AND SUPPLIES.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. 10166) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies taken and used by the United States Army, as reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, known as the Bowman act; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSTON, CENTRAL ARKANSAS AND NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. PHELAN, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 9420) authorizing the Houston, Central Arkansas and Northern Railway Company to construct and maintain bridges across Bayou Bartholomew and across Ouachita, Red, Little, and Sabine Rivers, in Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MACON, TUSCALOOSA AND BIRMINGHAM RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. PHELAN, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back the bill (H. R. 9612) to authorize the Macon, Tuscaloosa and Birmingham Railroad Company to build a bridge across the Tombigbee River, in Alabama; which was laid on the table.

He also, from the same committee, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 9611) to authorize the Macon, Tuscaloosa and Birmingham Railroad Company to build a bridge across the Black Warrior River in Alabama; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FORNEY. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] will take the chair.

Mr. FORNEY. I ask unanimous consent that debate be limited on the pending paragraph to ten minutes.

Mr. TRACEY. I object.

Mr. FORNEY. I wish to submit a motion, then, to limit debate.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done now by unanimous consent, as the House has determined to go into Committee of the Whole.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. BLOUNT in the chair.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the pending paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Civil Service Commission:

For three commissioners, at $3,500 each; one chief examiner, $3,000; one secretary, $2,000; one clerk of class 4, who shall be a stenographer; one clerk of class 3; one clerk of class 2; one clerk of class 1; one clerk, at $1,000; two clerks, at $900 each; one messenger; and one laborer; in all, $25,800.

For necessary traveling expenses, including those of examiners acting under the direction of the commission, $4,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the pending amendment, offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS].

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 20, in line 9, strike out "one" and insert "two."

In line 10 strike out "one" and insert "two;" and also strike out "one," after the words "class one," and insert "two."

In line 16 strike out "$4,000" and insert "$5,000."

Mr. FORNEY. I move that the committee rise, my object being to have debate limited on the pending paragraph.

Mr. CANNON. If my colleague will allow me, I think there can be an agreement made to limit the debate to ten minutes.

Mr. FORNEY. I am willing to agree to that. I only want some limit to the debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that debate on the pending paragraph and amendment be limited to ten minutes.

Mr. ENLOE. I should like to have five minutes.

Mr. FORNEY. Then let the time allowed be twenty minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that debate on the pending paragraph and the amendments thereto be limited to twenty minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Chairman, it is with extreme reluctance that I presume to dissent from this portion of the report of the Appropriations Committee and to urge the adoption of the amendments proposed by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS]. But, after examining the question, I am satisfied that the estimates made by the commissioners for more clerks and the sum of $5,000 for traveling expenses are very moderate and absolutely necessary to a proper performance of its duties by the commission.

I am convinced that with the present force it has been impossible to complete the figuring required to arrive at the standing of persons on the eligible lists, within a reasonable time, and most annoying delays, inflicting hardship on applicants, have been unavoidable.

The item of $5,000 is not excessive for traveling expenses. Fixed dates are now announced for the examiners being in attendance throughout the entire country, and the commissioners claim that their careful calculations show that a smaller sum will cripple their efforts to hold examinations.

Mr. Chairman, during the discussion of this bill yesterday a commendable spirit of emulation was shown by gentlemen on both sides of the House in endeavoring to prove that an early interest had been taken by their respective parties in the reform of the civil service.

A few days ago, when making remarks in favor of tariff reform, I quoted words of the late Samuel J. Tilden, when I sought to show that the Democratic party had consistently and actively favored reduction of the tariff during the past twenty years. I would like now to read an extract from Mr. Tilden's letter of acceptance in 1876:

The convention justly affirms that reform is necessary in the civil service, necessary to its purification, necessary to its economy and its efficiency, necessary in order that the ordinary employment of the public may not be "a prize fought for at the ballot-box, a brief reward of party zeal, instead of posts of honor assigned for proved competency and held for fidelity in the public employ."

Two evils infest the official service of the Federal Government. One is the prevalent and demoralizing notion that the public service exists not for the business and benefit of the whole people, but for the interest of the office-holders, who are in truth but the servants of the people. Under the influence of this pernicious error public employments have been multiplied, the numbers of those gathered into the ranks of office-holders have been steadily increased beyond any possible requirement of the public business, while inefficiency, peculation, fraud, and malversation of the public funds, from the highest places of power to the lowest, have overspread the whole service like a leprosy.

And in a speech after the Presidential election, at Governor Robinson's inauguration, January, 1877, he said:

To recall the government of this State to the pure condition in which a generation ago you and I knew it; to remove the fungus growths which in evil times had overspread its administration and legislation; to lighten the intolerable burdens upon the people; to improve institutions and laws; systematically to call into the civil service, whether by appointment or election, men of higher ideas of official life, of better training, and of more general culture, thus attaining a class inferior in the arts of political competition, but superior in capacities for public usefulness—these are noble objects. They had to be pursued through stormy conflicts with selfish interests an fixed habits. Our support was an unfaltering trust in the people, if the prospects of real reform could be made visible; our inspiration was a belief that nothing worth saving could be lost if only our work did not fail.

* * * * * * *

A genuine reform in the civil service has thus been realized which could not be the product of any mere legislation without the effective co-operation of the men conducting the actual administration. I have traced these results, approved by the people at the last two elections in this State, because they encourage the aspirations of the community for a better government, and tend to inspire a noble ambition in all rising men to compete for honors and power by appealing to the best moral forces of human society.

A further reason for increasing the clerical force of the commission is to enable the President to extend the classified list. Gentlemen yesterday criticised him for not doing so. Permit me to read extracts from the letter addressed to the Civil Service Commission by the President. I will have the entire letter printed in the RECORD.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, March 21, 1885.

To the United States Civil Service Commission:

GENTLEMEN: I desire to make a suggestion regarding subdivision (C), General Rule III, of the Amended Civil-Service Rules promulgated February 2, 1883. It provides for the promotion of an employé in a Department who is below or outside of the classified service, to a place within said classified service in the same Department, upon the request of the appointing officer, upon the recommendation of the commission and approval of the President, after a competitive examination, in case such person has served continuously for two years in the place from which it is proposed to promote him, and "because of his faithfulness and efficiency in the position occupied by him, and because of his qualifications for the place to which the appointing officer desires his promotion."

It has occurred to me that this provision must be executed with caution, to avoid the application of it to cases not intended and the undue relaxation of the general purposes and restrictions of the civil-service law.

Non-competitive examinations are the exceptions to the plan of the act, and the rules permitting the same should be strictly construed. The cases arising under the exception above recited should be very few, and when presented they should precisely meet all the requirements specified, and should be supported by facts which will develop the basis and reason of application of the appointing officer, and which will commend them to the judgment of the commission and the President. The sole purpose of the provision is to benefit the public service, and it should never be permitted to operate as an evasion of the main feature of the law, which is competitive examinations.

As these cases will first be presented to the commission for recommendation, I have to request that you will formulate a plan by which their merits can be tested. This will naturally involve a statement of all the facts deemed necessary for the determination of such applications, including the kind of work which has been done by the person proposed for promotion, and the considerations upon which the allegations of the "faithfulness," "efficiency," and "qualifications" mentioned in the rule are predicated.

What has already been written naturally suggests another very important subject to which I invite your attention.

The desirability of the rule which I have commented upon would be nearly if not entirely removed, and other difficulties which now embarrass the execution of the civil-service law would be obviated if there was a better and uniform classification of the employés in the different Departments. The importance of this is entirely obvious. The present imperfect classifications, hastily made, apparently with but little care for uniformity, and promulgated after the last Presidential election and prior to the installation of the present Administration, should not have been permitted to continue until this time.

It appears that in the War Department the employés were divided on the 15th day of November, 1884, into eight classes and subclasses, embracing those earning annual salaries from $900 to $2,000.

The Navy Department was classified November 22, 1884, and its employés were divided in seven classes and subclasses, embracing those who received annual salaries from $720 to $1,800.

In the Interior Department the classification was made on the 6th day of December, 1884. It consists of eight classes and subclasses and embraces employés receiving annual salaries from $720 to $2,000.

On the 2d day of January, 1885, a classification of the employés in the Treasury Department was made, consisting of six classes and subclasses, including those earning annual salaries from $900 to $1,800.

In the Post-Office Department the employés were classified on the 6th day of February, 1885, into nine classes and subclasses, embracing persons earning annual salaries from $720 to $2,000.

On the 12th day of December, 1884, the Bureau of Agriculture was classified in a manner different from all the other Departments and presenting features peculiar to itself.

It seems that the only classification in the Department of State and the Department of Justice is that provided for by section 163 of the Revised Statutes, which directs that the employés in the several Departments shall be divided into four classes. It appears that no more definite classification has been made in these Departments.

I wish the Commission would revise these classifications and submit to me a plan which will as far as possible make them uniform, and which will especially remedy the present condition which permits of persons to enter a grade in the service in one Department without any examination, which in another Department can only be entered after passing such examination. This, I think, should be done by extending the limits of the classified service rather than by contracting them.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

It is evident the President is not to blame for delay. He awaits action on the part of the commissioners, and they are delayed by want of necessary means, which Congress can alone supply.

While glad to aid gentlemen of the other side in their efforts to assist the President in carrying out the law, I rejoice that an opportunity has been given me to demonstrate the good faith of the Executive and his consistency of action.

Mr. McCOMAS. Will you vote with the Republicans in this matter?

Mr. TRACEY. I will vote for the amendment.

Mr. WHITTHORNE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the time is to be equally divided between the two sides.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. The gentleman who has just resumed his seat favored the amendment. I oppose it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] is recognized.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I regret very much that the chairman of the Committee on Civil Service Reform is not present. I had it in view to ask him what number of licentiates the Civil Service Commission show to be eligible to ask permission to become applicants for positions. According to my general information they are numbered by multiplied thousands, and yet the chairman of the committee states that during the last three years but about eleven hundred appointments have been made under the civil-service regulations.

Now, Mr. Chairman, looking at this matter as a simple business proposition, if the Civil Service Commission have before them we will say ten, fifteen, or twenty thousand licentiates authorized to apply for positions, what is the necessity for having that number multiplied. Is there any good reason for it? I submit to the business judgment of the House there is not.

Again, sir, the effect of multiplying this number of parties examined by the board is to demoralize the young men and the young women of this country. You will take them away from the legitimate avocations of life and put them on the anxious seat or the mourners' bench as applicants for office, which is doing the young men and young women of this country gross injustice.

I am happy to say that I was one of those in this House who voted against this law. I believed then, as I believe now, that it is anti-republican and anti-democratic in its tendencies. I believe that with its growth it will become a sore on the body-politic, full of mischief and full of danger to the theory on which our Government was built and constructed.

Mr. Chairman, having said this I deem it proper to say further, standing as I do as one of the complainants against this Administration for not putting more Democrats in office, that I have reason to admire the fidelity of the President of the United States to the pledges made in his letter and to his course in the execution of what he found to be the law of the land. I know, in my own personal experience, that when I have appealed to him for the removal of officials because they were Republicans he has stood immovable. As regards my own State of Tennessee not a single removal has he made of any Presidential appointee for political reasons; he has waited until under the law the term of the officer expired; and to-day there is still remaining a monument of Democratic clemency, a postmaster in Winchester, in the district represented by my colleague [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Allow me a question.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Was there any charge of inefficiency against those men?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I take it for granted the presumption of inefficiency exists when the office-holder is a Republican.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. That is just what I wanted the gentleman to state.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. You will find me perfectly frank, for I believe that at the ballot-box the voice of the people of the United States is heard, and then and there they assert their sovereignty in the effort to preserve the character of our institutions. [Applause.] It is at their desire that the Democrats have obtained the administration of this Government, and anybody, Civil Service Commission or otherwise, that stands between them and their voice and judgment is, in my opinion, working contrary to the theory of our Government. [Applause.] Yet I commend the President for his faithful execution of the laws as we passed them.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I commend your frankness, and if all Democrats were equally frank there would be less trouble.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. If you ever come into power, which God forbid, act upon the principle I have enunciated. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ADAMS. Let us begin by admitting, for the sake of argument, everything the gentleman from Tennessee has said is exactly true. It is an argument, perhaps, in favor of abolishing this law. It is not an argument against the adoption of this amendment.

He says that large numbers of young Americans have been debauched by becoming candidates for places under this law. Was there not an equal number that became candidates for places under the former system? Is the debauchery less in one case than in the other? But admit that the whole system should be abolished, the question is as to the mode in which that should be done. There are two ways. One is to bring in a bill to abolish the law; and we on this side would certainly respect gentlemen on the other side for their frankness if they would introduce and have a vote upon such a bill. But we know perfectly well that they will do nothing of the kind. In conversation, in confidential communication, they may intimate their distrust of the system; but in public all that they will do is to refuse adequate appropriations for carrying out the law. An adequate appropriation for carrying out the law is an appropriation adequate to ascertain whether the local boards do their duty, for the whole work under this law is done by the local boards. Gentlemen praise the President for his consistency and his firmness in supporting the law. It is not the President that makes the law a success; it is not even the Board of Civil Service Commissioners, except so far as that board can see to it that the local boards which actually conduct the examinations conduct them in good faith. These local boards act all over the country. They are sometimes members of one party and sometimes members of the other. What assurance have we that they do their duty in the premises? What assurance have we that one and the same system is followed in Chicago, in Cincinnati, and in other great cities of the country? We have no assurance except this, that over all these local boards is a Board of Civil Service Commissioners to supervise their action and correct their mistakes.

The gentleman from Indiana yesterday came down to the question, but did not meet it when he said that $4,000 was an ample appropriation for the traveling expenses of the Civil Service Commissioners. How did he know that? He gave us no reason. The commissioners themselves say they need $5,000 for this particular purpose; and this particular purpose is of the essence of the whole system. If the commissioners be allowed all the appropriation they ask within reason, in order to see that the system in its practical bearings is carried out, then, and not till then, can gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House claim that they have treated the system in good faith. What they should do is to treat it in good faith. Give these commissioners ample means, so that we may find out whether the system is a success or a failure; and if we find out that it is a failure, let us frankly say so, abolish the law, and go back to the old system, for, Mr. Chairman, I believe that an honest "spoils" system is far better than an alleged "civil-service" system which is accused or suspected of insincerity from one end of the country to the other. [Applause on the Republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman, I am not particularly enamored of this civil-service law; but I rise to speak in behalf of this paragraph as it stands and against the increase. I desire, however, to call attention to some statements made here yesterday, particularly by the gentleman from Maine, who charged upon the Democratic party that it was insincere, that it was practicing hypocrisy and deception upon the country under the pretense of enforcing civil-service reform. I want to call attention to a comparison which may be made between the Democratic administration of a civil-service law and a Republican administration of such a law. It might be inferred from the frankness and freedom and cordiality with which the gentleman brings his charge of insincerity and hypocrisy against the Democratic party, that it comes from a pure source, and that the gentleman's party is not open to any such charge.

But, Mr. Chairman, I want to state here that the history of the Republican party shows that, in dealing with this civil-service law, if there is hypocrisy upon the Democratic side, which I deny, so far as the bona fides of the President and his executive officers is concerned, there is infinitely more upon the Republican side in their administration of this law after they passed it. I call attention to the fact that in 1879, they passed a law providing that all executive officers and employés of the United States not appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, should be prohibited from requesting, or giving to, or receiving from, any other officer or employé of the Government any money or property, or other thing of value for political purposes; and this law provided for the punishment by discharge and by fine of any person so offending. The section of the act of August 10, 1879, to which I refer, reads as follows:

That all executive officers or employés of the United States not appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, are prohibited from requesting, giving to, or receiving from any other officer or employé of the Government any money or property, or other thing of value for political purposes; and any such officer or employé who shall offend against the provisions of this section shall be at once discharged from the service of the United States, and he shall also be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $500.

Now, in 1880, after that law was passed, in the railway mail service, which is supposed to be the freest of any Department of the civil service of the Government from political influences, the Republican party sent out its notices of political assessments, its notices to employés to pay over their "voluntary contributions," and when some of them refused to pay there was an agent sent out who was in the employ of the Government, receiving pay from the Government, supposed to be discharging public duties, whose business it was to force from employés in that branch of the service, by threats of discharge, the assessments which they had refused to contribute.

Mr. KERR. Does the gentleman deny that that is being done now?

Mr. ENLOE. I do; and I challenge the production of the proof.

Mr. HOUK. Let the gentleman produce his proof.

Mr. ENLOE. I can produce it.

Mr. HOUK. We demand the proof.

Mr. ENLOE. I will produce it.

Mr. KERR. Look at the New York papers.

Mr. ENLOE. I do not take any newspaper as evidence on this matter. Any statement which I make I am ready to establish by the record; and I ask gentlemen on the other side to produce proof of the same kind.

Mr. KERR. A letter has been published (I have a copy of it) from Mr. Hunter, chairman of the State central committee of the Democratic party of Iowa, levying a certain sum upon each postmaster in the State. That letter has been published, and never denied to my knowledge.

Mr. ENLOE. Let the gentleman produce the letter, and establish his charge. We will not try this question on newspaper statements. I submit here the proof of the statement which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] challenges. Mr. James E. White, superintendent of the railway mail service at Chicago, who is, I suppose, good Republican authority, and if he is not he ought to be, in a letter addressed to Hon. Thomas E. Nash, general superintendent of the railway mail service, testifies as follows:

[Receiving political contributions—Personal—Dictated by J. E. W.—F.]

CHICAGO, ILL., May 14, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your favor of the 10th instant—subject, receiving political contributions from E. M. Wilcox—I have the honor to state that your letter conveyed to me the first and only information I have ever received that such collections had been made and receipted for in my name.

It had been customary for the national committee to assess employés of the Government and to send to each employé a request to forward to the secretary of said committee a certain sum named therein. These requests were not responded to unanimously, and the national committee sent a list of the delinquents to the State central committee with instructions to collect. The secretary of the State central committee sent for me and requested me to make the collections from clerks in this service. I declined to do so, and for one year, in which these assessments were made, the State central committee employed James McDowell to make the collections; and for another K. K. Jones, of Quincy, Ill.; and for one of the years, evidently 1880, H. J. Skeels, who was an employé of this service, detailed to duty in this office under an arrangement made between himself and the secretary of the State central committee.

Never since my connection with this service, nor at any other time, have I solicited or received contributions for political purposes, nor authorized any one to do so, nor to use my name in any way with such transactions.

Mr. Wilcox was removed for being a member of the Brotherhood of Railway Postal Clerks.

As soon as I can find Mr. Skeels I will secure a statement from him.

Very respectfully,

JAMES E. WHITE, Superintendent.

Hon. THOMAS E. NASH,
General Superintendent R. M. S., Washington, D. C.

Mr. H. J. Skeels is the patriotic and pure representative of the real and true civil-service reform policy of the immaculate and irreproachable Republican party, as exemplified in 1880. This man, who was merely an agent and a superserviceable tool of the Republican administration, performing this unholy, disgraceful, and unlawful work for his party to promote Republican success by corruption at the ballot-box in Indiana and elsewhere, was a beautiful exemplification of the sincerity and the purity of civil-service reform administration under Republican rule. Here is his genuine and original receipt for $23 forced from a delinquent employé in the railway mail service, who no doubt needed the money to buy bread and clothes for his wife and children.

It reads:

CHICAGO, ILL., October 1, 1880.

Received of E. M. Wilcox $23, contribution to the National Republican Committee.

JAMES E. WHITE,
By H. J. SKEELS.

It will be noted that he omits to put in the receipt that patriotic word, "Voluntary." To that extent it is an honest receipt, because the very fact that Wilcox, with others, had refused to pay the assessment caused him to be detailed at the Government's expense to collect this money—caused him to be detailed to duty when it appears from the letter of his superior officer he had no other duty to perform. It will be observed again that he uses the name of James E. White without authority, for the purpose of extorting the money from the poor, hard-worked subordinate, and to make it appear that he had the authority of the superintendent to get this money or to take the official head of the recalcitrant employé.

He did not have the authority of James E. White, but he had the authority of the general superintendent of the railway mail service at that time, or the authority of the head of the Post-Office Department, and the headsman's ax which he carried would have taken the head of James E. White, superintendent, as easily as it would have taken that of the poor clerk, Wilcox. That was Republican purity in the civil service in 1880, under the act of 1879, when civil-service reform was in its infancy; but the urgency of the demands for new two-dollar bills in Indiana about that time may extenuate the offense in Republican estimation. If the plea of confession and avoidance is to be relied on by the gentlemen who make this charge of insincerity and hypocrisy against Democratic administration of this law, if it is expected that the country will be willing to believe that its administrative methods improved after the passage of the act of January 16, 1883, and that it gave signs of true repentance before death, I will meet that supposition with the statement that I can produce evidence that it died an unrepentant sinner so far as its civil service record is concerned. The Republican charges against the Democratic Administration are general, indefinite, and unsubstantial, the impassioned utterances of swift witnesses, who are encouraged by wicked imaginings to make unfounded charges, trusting to accident for proof, or to popular credulity for vindication. The charges I make are specific, substantial, and sustained by indisputable facts.

I have now only five minutes, and I can not submit to interruptions.

I make the charge, and I am prepared to make the proof by written evidence, bearing the date of the transaction, that at Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1884, in the dying hour of the grand old party of civil-service reform for the sake of the offices it held and of political assessments to raise a corruption fund to secure a further lease of power for the non-civil-service office-holders as well as for those protected by the civil-service statutes, this party of promises, in which the "Mugwumps" and the civil-service reformers are invited to rest their hopes, did then levy contributions on the railway mail clerks, and, true to its history and its practices, it forced unwilling patriots to stand and deliver their "voluntary contributions" for political purposes. The act of 1879 was a salve to the Republican conscience for the premeditated crimes of 1880, and the act of 1883 no doubt served the same purpose to the crimes against the civil-service law in 1884. The amount collected at Cincinnati and paid over to various persons was $888, and some of this money went to gentlemen who violated section 81 of the Postal Laws and Regulations in receiving it, and possibly the criminal law in using it. That section reads as follows:

That no officer, clerk, or other person in the service of the United States shall, directly or indirectly, give or hand over to any other officer, clerk, or person in the service of the United States, or to any Senator or Member of the House of Representatives, or Territorial Delegate, any money or other valuable thing on account of or to be applied to the promotion of any political object whatever.

If a bill of particulars of this charge is demanded I have the proof, and it would make decidedly interesting reading.

So far as the attitude of the Democratic party on this question is concerned, I believe, speaking for myself, that the correct doctrine in regard to it is laid down in a letter addressed by the Postmaster-General to the postmaster at Cedar Rapids, Iowa. I believe this to be a correct exposition of true civil-service reform. Under Republican administration we had interference by Federal officials in conventions, in caucuses, in conventions of the party, and at the polls, that disgraced the civil service of the country. The letter is my idea of the true Democratic doctrine.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., May 9, 1888.

DEAR SIR: I have received your communication of the 4th instant. In times past American citizenship was debauched, free expression of the people at caucus, convention, and election throttled, and the public service scandalized by the direct and corrupt influence of Federal officials at meetings of the people called for nominating purposes and at the succeeding Federal, State, county, and even municipal elections.

It seems to me that it should not be necessary, and to the credit of Federal officials under this Administration it has not been, save with rare exceptions, to warn individuals against practicing these abuses or against affording a semblance of the evil.

At the same time it should be equally well understood, and there should be no misapprehension in regard to it, that it is not and has not been the sentiment of any one connected with the Administration that because a man holds a Federal office he is thereby deprived of any of the privileges of citizenship or practically disfranchised. He is expected to exercise the plain and simple rights of an American citizen. While he must not neglect the public business to engage in partisan work, and must remember that he is in office to serve the citizens of all parties, and that these privileges are not enlarged by office-holding, and while there is no policy forbidding his attending a caucus or a convention of his party, or forbidding the exercise of his individual influence as a citizen in favor of the views which he holds in the same manner as if he were not in office, yet, in view of the disgraceful abuses heretofore adverted to, it is a matter which suggests itself to the good taste and judgment of sensible men whether the indecencies heretofore practiced should even seem to be imitated by the appearance of Federal officials of this Administration at conventions.

Respectfully yours,

DON M. DICKINSON,
Postmaster-General

ALEXANDER CHARLES, Esq.,
Postmaster, Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I have listened carefully to the gentleman's remarks, but I can not tell whether he is more anxious to stop these things in 1880 or 1888. [Laughter.]

Mr. ENLOE. Well, sir, I want to show to the country that if it expects these abuses to be stopped at all, it must look to the Democratic party to stop them, and not to the party that comes here with professions of this sort, in violation of its own practices. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The twenty minutes allowed for debate on this paragraph have expired.

Mr. ADAMS. I believe I had one minute which I did not occupy. I yield it to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Gentlemen on the other side make the old argument of the kettle calling the pot black. They have already admitted by the remarks of the two gentlemen on that side who have occupied the floor this morning that the Democratic party in 1884 was elected on a false pretense in its advocacy and support of civil-service reform. Now, since they have come to a position in which they are willing to confess, let them give force to their confession of the false pretense of 1884 by making a motion to strike out all of this bill relating to the appropriation for civil-service reform, and thereby starve out of existence the law.

I do not desire, Mr. Chairman, to occupy the attention of the House further upon a matter the hypocrisy of which has been shown to some extent by both parties. I believe——

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. McCOMAS, as already read, there were—ayes 58, noes 50.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. McCOMAS were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 81, noes 71.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPINOLA (during the count by tellers) said: Mr. Chairman, I have just come into the House, and I would like to understand what this question is.

The CHAIRMAN stated the amendment.

Mr. SPINOLA. I understand this is a question of what is called "civil-service reform." I wish to be recorded in the negative—against that relic of Federalism. [Laughter.]

The count by tellers was resumed, and the result announced as above stated.

Mr. FORNEY. I find that in a part of the bill already passed we have provided for only two elevators, when four should have been provided for. I therefore ask unanimous consent to go back in order to adopt the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 11, in lines 19 to and including 21, strike out "two conductors of the elevator, at $1,100 each" and insert in lieu thereof "four conductors of the elevators, at $1,100, who shall be under the supervision and direction of the Architect of the Capitol;" and on page 12, in lines 1 and 2, in lieu of the sum proposed, insert "$16,480."

There being no objection, the amendment was considered, and adopted.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I was not present when my colleague [Mr. WHITTHORNE] made his remarks in regard to "civil service reform." We are all in favor of "civil service reform" in Tennessee, but we have improved upon it very much down there. We have a new method which beats the system of Jay Hubbell "all hollow." I send to the Clerk to be read a letter from the chairman of the Democratic executive committee, notifying a Republican commissioner how he was expected to vote at the election, and that if he did not vote to suit the Democracy they would withhold business from him. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I would like to have the chairman of the Civil Service Committee listen to this letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

BLACKWATER, TENN., December 6, 1887.

DEAR SIR: The State Democratic executive committee requires me to ascertain what steps you intend to take in the next Presidential and gubernatorial contest, and I know of no better way to find out than to write you, hoping to hear from you on this subject at an early day. The party is willing to give, to gain strength, but otherwise say business will be withheld.

It is none of my business what steps you intend to take, I am only acting in obedience to the command of the party to which I belong.

With due regards I am, very respectfully.

J. R. M. DAVIS,
Secretary Hancock County Democratic Executive Committee.

S. WILLIAMS,
United States Commissioner, Xenophen, Tenn.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, there is evidence of what we may expect in the coming Presidential canvass in the State of Tennessee. Commissioner Williams was appointed by Judge Jackson, and is one of the very best men in the district; a man of high character, a gallant ex-Confederate soldier, an old whig, who had changed his opinions on the tariff. There is notice served upon him directly as to his appointments. If he did not do so and so all business would be withheld from him. That is the spirit of the Democracy in my State. It is evidence, I say, of the sort of reform we are living under in the State of Tennessee at the present time.

Mr. STRUBLE. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I do not know the parties referred to.

Mr. BUTLER. I do.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. But I may say that I am gratified the thing is working. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. Of course, if it works in your direction. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. FORNEY's amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

For compensation of the Secretary of State, $8,000; First Assistant Secretary of State, $4,500; two Assistant Secretaries of State, at $3,500 each; for chief clerk, $2,750; for six Chiefs of Bureau and one translator, at $2,100 each; stenographer to the Secretary, $1,800; eleven clerks of class four; four clerks of class three; seven clerks of class two; fourteen clerks of class one; four clerks, at $1,000 each; and ten clerks, at $900 each; one messenger, two assistant messengers, one packer at $720; ten laborers, one telegraph operator, $1,200; in all, $115,350.

For proof-reading the laws of the United States and reports of Congress, including boxes and transportation of the same, $1,280.

Mr. LAWLER. I wish to ask how much the ten laborers provided for in this paragraph get as wages? What is their compensation?

Mr. FORNEY. Six hundred and sixty dollars each.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Secretary's Office: For compensation of the Secretary of the Treasury, $8,000; two Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, at $4,500 each; clerk to the Secretary, $2,400; two private secretaries, one to each Assistant Secretary, at $1,800 each; Government actuary, under the control of the Treasury Department, $2,250; one clerk, at $1,200; one copyist; three messengers; two assistant messengers; in all, $31,310.

Office of chief clerk and superintendent: For chief clerk, including $200 as superintendent of Treasury building, $3,000; assistant superintendent of Treasury building, $2,100; an inspector of electric-light plants, gas, and fixtures for all public buildings under control of the Treasury Department, $1,800; four clerks of class 4; additional to one clerk of class 4 as book-keeper, $100; two clerks of class 3; three clerks of class 2; three clerks of class 1; one clerk, at $1,000; one messenger; two assistant messengers; one storekeeper, $1,200; one telegraph operator, $1,200; three elevator conductors, at $720 each; one engineer, $1,400; one assistant engineer, $1,000; two assistant engineers, at $720 each; one locksmith and electrician, $1,200; three firemen; five firemen, at $900 each; one coal-passer, $900; one captain of the watch, $1,400; two lieutenants of the watch, at $900 each; fifty-eight watchmen; one foreman of laborers, $1,000; one skilled laborer, male, at $840; three skilled laborers, male, at $720 each; twenty-six laborers; ten laborers, at $500 each; one laborer, at $480; two laborers, at $360 each; ninety charwomen; one foreman of cabinet-shop, $1,200; one draughtsman, $1,000; one cabinet-maker, $900; eight cabinet-makers, at $840 each; in all, $147,880.

Mr. FORNEY. I move the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 23, line 23, after the word "hundred" insert "and forty;" in line 24 strike out "eight hundred and forty" and insert "nine hundred;" and on page 24, lines 1 and 2, strike out "forty-seven thousand eight hundred and eighty" and insert "forty-eight thousand four hundred."

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. PENINGTON. I wish to make a point of order on the paragraph just read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have reserved my point of order.

Mr. PENINGTON. My point of order will affect the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PENINGTON. On page 23 one foreman of cabinet-shop is provided at $1,200. Under the appropriation bills heretofore enacted this foreman was paid at the rate of $5 a day. I move to strike out "$1,200" and insert "$5 per day" in conformity with the law.

Mr. HOLMAN. I thought the gentleman rose to make a point of order.

Mr. FORNEY. I understood the gentleman to make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Delaware will again state his point of order.

Mr. PENINGTON. My point of order is that this bill provides for one foreman of cabinet-shop, $1,200. I propose that this shall be amended so as to read "$5 a day," in accordance with existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the former law?

Mr. PENINGTON. Five dollars a day.

Mr. FORNEY. There is no law regulating the employés of the cabinet-shop. We found there were sixteen paid out of the general fund, at salaries regulated by the Secretary of the Treasury. The committee decided to change this provision and have reduced the number to eleven, with a foreman, at $1,200 a year; one draughtsman, at $1,000; one cabinet-maker, at $900, and eight cabinet-makers, at $840 each.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asks the gentleman whether the pay now is at the rate of $5 per diem?

Mr. PENINGTON. It is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FORNEY. I will state that the object of my amendment is to give these men the usual thirty days' leave of absence. Under the law now they do not get any leave. There is no existing law fixing their compensation.

Mr. PENINGTON. I understood the Chair to sustain my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did sustain the point of order.

Mr. PENINGTON. I ask for a vote on my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote will first be taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. FORNEY's amendment was again read.

Mr. CANNON. I rise to a point of order. The proposition is to make a certain number of cabinet-makers, at $900.

Mr. FORNEY. This is done by the committee.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman interferes with the scheme of the committee. These men get per diem pay. When they work they get so much per day; and when they do not work they get no pay. The committee now propose to make them annual employés, fixing their salary for the year on the basis of the per diem salary.

Mr. FORNEY. And giving them the thirty days' leave.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly; allowing them the thirty days' leave of absence, with sick leave, etc.

Now, the gentleman from Delaware comes in and makes his point of order that he wants them to have $5 a day, and as heretofore provided, taking one part of the committee's suggestion and embodying with it another of his own. If that be so, and the scheme of the committee is to be entirely defeated, then there is nothing left to do but to make the further point of order when he comes in and seeks in that manner to gain that advantage. Here is his point of order, which the Chair will sustain, which defeats the committee's proposition. Now, the committee's proposition must stand or fall as a whole; and therefore when he makes his motion to make these $900 annual employés, which gives thirty days' leave and sick leave, I make the same point of order against him.

Mr. HOLMAN. The point of order is undoubtedly well taken; and I would suggest to the gentleman from Delaware, in view of that fact, that he substitute the language of the present law.

Mr. PENINGTON. My point of order was only on the foreman of the cabinet-shop. It did not extend beyond that or cover the ground which the gentleman from Illinois seems to assume.

Mr. CANNON. I make the point of order upon the balance of the proposition, for the reason that I am not willing that the gentleman shall take a part of the committee's scheme in this regard and a part of his own.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the point of order on the amendment of the gentleman from Delaware, or on this paragraph of the bill itself?

Mr. CANNON. It is on the amendment and the bill both. If you propose to have any of these men per diem employés, I say let the law stand as it is.

I am content, if the gentleman will take the committee's proposition, to have the change made here; but I do object to making such a condition as he proposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be compelled to rule as heretofore in relation to such matters where the compensation is sought to be increased. Where the compensation has once been ascertained by law, an amendment which seeks to raise it is certainly obnoxious to the rule.

Mr. FORNEY. Then, of course, the whole provision goes out. If the gentleman is willing to have that done, I am content.

Mr. HOLMAN. In view of the ruling, would it not be proper——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman appeal from the ruling?

Mr. HOLMAN. No; I was only going to make a suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. We can not progress with the bill unless there be some substantive proposition pending. If the gentleman has an amendment to offer——

Mr. HOLMAN. I have an amendment. I move to insert what I send to the desk to fill the blank at this point.

The Clerk read as follows:

One foreman of cabinet-shop, at $5 per day; one draughtsman, at $4 per day; one cabinet-maker, at $3.50 per day; twelve cabinet-makers, at $3 per day each; one cabinet-maker, at $2 per day.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is simply the language of the present law. If, however, the gentleman from Alabama does not desire to fill the blank at this time I will not press the amendment.

Mr. FORNEY. I think the proposition which the committee has submitted is the proper one. That has been stricken out on the point of order, as I understand it. We have a cabinet-shop, and it was proposed to make this change for the benefit of the laborers there. But it seems that they are not satisfied. Now the gentleman can amend as he pleases; I do not care.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Indiana.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 23, line 19, strike out "one" and insert "three."

Mr. FORNEY. I make the point of order——

Mr. BUCHANAN. The Clerk has not read all the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 20, "two laborers, at $360."
Amend the footing to correspond.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I think if the gentleman from Alabama will hear me for a moment he will not insist.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that, as the point of order is raised, the Chair overrules it. It is perfectly competent for the committee to increase the number of employés in the public service whenever the exigencies of the public service may require it. The ruling heretofore made was with reference to increase of salaries. This presents a different proposition; and the Chair entertains the amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I offer the amendment to provide for these two laborers fixed in the bill at $360 each and one at $480 so as to provide for three at $480 each. I think that the United States Government should not establish a rate of wages of $360 a year for anybody who is competent to be employed in any avocation within the governmental service; and furthermore, the principal object of the amendment I have suggested is recognized in the second section of the bill where it is provided that where the rate of laborers' wages is not fixed by the bill it shall be $660 per annum, or equivalent to $2 per day. I suppose there is some subordinate work for these three laborers to do; but I do not, for one, want to vote for any appropriation bill that shall establish upon the statute-books the idea of fixing the wages of any laboring man at $360 per year. My proposition, therefore, s to raise this to $480, and even that is ridiculously small.

Mr. LAWLER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I think this committee ought to start in here with these laborers and follow out the rule of yesterday, making the compensation at $2 per day. Let it be distinctly understood that this is to be their pay; and I offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey fixing the amount at $660 for each of the men covered by the amendment he suggests.

Mr. FORNEY. I wish to state that the language in the bill is the same as in the bill of last year, and the appropriation is all that the Department asks. Under the existing circumstances different compensation is given to different laborers according to the time they are employed. Charwomen, for example, receive only $240, because they are only employed for two hours a day. They have to be there in the evening when the rooms are vacated in order to clean up. They get $20 a month and only work two hours a day. If the compensation is made $660 for all there would not be equal justice done. Certain laborers are employed who are required to work all day. The Department knows what is required in this way, and this has been the law for years. I think the proposition in the bill should remain as it is. There is really no change in the existing law. I still insist upon my point of order.

Mr. LAWLER. I think the Secretary of the Treasury should see to it that the laborers employed in his Department are kept at work, and divide the work so as to utilize the whole of the time of these men.

The CHAIRMAN. To save time the Chair will decide on the point of order made by the gentleman from Alabama that the amendment is an increase of the allowance. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not understand whether the Chair's ruling applies to my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order relates only to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LAWLER].

Mr. LAWLER. I withdraw my amendment, but will now state to the committee that when we reach the end of this bill I will offer an amendment to it making the pay to laborers employed by the United States Departments at Washington not less than $2 a day.

Mr. CANNON. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of saying, if I can have the attention of the committee, that in the Forty-seventh Congress the Committee on Appropriations found a great number of employés, these particular employés being amongst them, that were paid from the contingent fund, and under the policy then adopted the Committee on Appropriations picked up these employés and placed them in the bill at an annual salary and Congress ratified that action. It has stood in that way since without complaint and without change in the estimates.

I know that in some of these Departments (I can not speak as to specific employés) some of the laborers only work a part of the day—the charwomen, for instance. I know in some of the Departments some of these small paid employés are boys not earning as much as the ordinary class of laborers, whose pay the statute fixes at $660 a year. And while I stand ready to vote proper and ample compensation, whatever it may be, for any employé of this Government, I doubt the good sense and propriety of shutting your eyes and without having any knowledge about it make these increases. Three hundred and sixty dollars a year is not much, yet it is $30 a month, and that is all that a farm-hand with a family in the agricultural States, a man who works through winter and summer and boards himself, can earn.

A MEMBER. More than he can earn.

Mr. CANNON. Somebody says more than he can earn. But be that as it may, whether these are boys or men working part of the day and having part of the day for something else I do not know; I know that class of employés are in the Departments, and in the absence of estimate and in the absence of complaint I for one will not be stampeded by my colleague from Illinois into voting for this amendment merely because the word "laborer" is used.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I did not offer this amendment without having previous knowledge. I did not offer it because the word "laborer" was in the bill. I offered it because I happened to know it was just and right, and should be adopted. For three years I have had the honor to be a member of the committee investigating these matters; and instead of its being, as asserted here, a matter of no complaint, great complaints and many have come to us with reference to the condition of these men in these Departments. We know what we are talking about when we say they are not compensated as they should be.

It has been said that they only work a portion of the day, but the gentleman making that statement qualified it by referring to charwomen. I want to say with reference to these men that they are docked for the time they do not work. That is the information before our committee. And it seems to me grossly inconsistent for a man who is in receipt of $5,000 a year from the General Government to get up here and oppose paying $480 to an employé of the Government, who does not do perhaps as valuable service for the Government, but who has as large a family to support, and as an American citizen is the peer of any other American citizen.

Mr. FORNEY. I desire to say that the recommendations of the committee are based on the estimates made by the Treasury Department.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is the trouble——

Mr. FORNEY. I do not yield. The gentleman has had his time. I simply want the committee to know the status of affairs here. We have prepared this bill in accordance with the estimates made by the officials in the Treasury Department, and it is presumed they know what labor they require. They ask for one laborer at $480 and two laborers at $360 each. We all know that it is right that different prices should be given to laborers when one is required to work all the time and another is not.

As gentlemen here are so much concerned about the pay of laborers, I will say that I am willing for laborers to have liberal salaries; but of course some laborers ought not to have as much as others. The paragraph now before the committee embodies the wish of the Department in this respect.

The question having been taken on the amendment of Mr. BUCHANAN, there were—ayes 31, noes 58.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Simply because time is so limited, I will not call for a quorum; and at any rate a count by tellers would not demonstrate what is the fact, that the negative vote is almost wholly from the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. The noes have it, and the amendment is not agreed to.

Mr. TAULBEE. I move to amend by inserting, in line 15, page 23, after the word "watchmen," the words "at nine hundred dollars."

Mr. FORNEY. The law now allows $720 to these employés. I make a point of order upon the amendment.

Mr. TAULBEE. It is only the appropriation bill, as I understand, that fixes that salary.

Mr. FORNEY. No, sir; it is the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Division of warrants, estimates, and appropriations: For chief of division, $3,000; assistant chief of division, $2,400; estimate and digest clerk, $2,000; six clerks of class 4; three clerks of class 3; one clerk of class 2; four clerks of class 1, two clerks, at $1,000 each; one clerk, at $900; one assistant messenger, and one laborer; in all, $23,480.

Mr. LAWLER. I wish to inquire what is the pay of the laborer provided for in the paragraph just read.

Mr. FORNEY. Six hundred and sixty dollars. That is the amount fixed by law.

The Clerk read as follows:

Division of appointments: For chief of division, $2,500; assistant chief of division, $2,000; one clerk of class 4; four clerks of class 3; two clerks of class 2; one clerk, at $1,000; two clerks, at $900 each; two copyists, at $840 each; one assistant messenger; two laborers; in all, $22,020.

Mr. FORNEY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, which proposes simply to give to the chief of division the salary to which he is really entitled under the law.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 21, on page 24, strike out "five hundred" and insert "seven hundred and fifty;" and in line 2, page 25, strike out "and twenty" and insert "two hundred and seventy."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Division of stationery, printing, and blanks: For chief of division, $2,500; four clerks of class 4; two clerks of class 3; three clerks of class 2; two clerks of class 1; two clerks, at $900 each; two messengers; two assistant messengers; one foreman of bindery, at $5 per day; four binders, at $4 per day each; and one sewer and folder, at $2.50 per day; in all, $31,799.

Mr. FORNEY. I offer an amendment for the purpose simply of making a correction of an amount named in this paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 25, page 26, "$99," and insert "$75.40."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Division of special agents: For assistant chief of division, $2,000; one clerk of class 3; three clerks of class 1; one clerk at $1,000; three clerks at $900 each, and one messenger; in all, $11,740.

Mr. FORNEY. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "thousand," in line 9, page 27, insert "four hundred;" and in line 12, on the same page, strike out "eleven thousand seven hundred and forty," and insert "twelve thousand one hundred and forty."

Mr. HOLMAN. Reserving a point of order, I wish to inquire whether this amendment is in accordance with existing law.

Mr. FORNEY. It is an increase upon the amount heretofore appropriated, but it has been asked for by the Department, and I am directed by the committee to propose it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Alabama will explain the reasons for the increase.

Mr. FORNEY. All I know is that three or four successive Secretaries have at different times asked this increase, and a majority of the committee have now decided to give it. The statute authorizes eight assistant chiefs of division at a salary of $2,400 each, but there is only one at present. This amendment is really in accordance with law; and as I have said, the increased appropriation has been asked for by three or four successive Secretaries. This is all I know about the matter.

Mr. HOLMAN. This increase, I understand, is not authorized by the present law.

Mr. FORNEY. Yes, sir, it is, as will be seen by referring to page 396, volume 18, of the Statutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. The office is authorized, but is this salary authorized?

Mr. FORNEY. Yes, sir; it is authorized by the act of 1874, reorganizing the Treasury Department. This amendment does not go beyond what the law authorizes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will not press the point of order.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

First Comptroller of the Treasury: For First Comptroller of the Treasury, $5,000; deputy comptroller, $2,700; four chiefs of division, at $2,100 each; seven clerks of class 4; eleven clerks of class 3; eleven clerks of class 2; eleven clerks of class 1; three clerks, at $1,600 each; and eight clerks, at $900 each; one skilled laborer, at $840; one messenger; and three laborers; in all, $88,760.

Mr. FORNEY. In accordance with the wishes of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, which is a reduction of the force.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 28, strike out "seven," in line 20, and insert "six;" in line 21, strike out "eleven" where it first occurs and insert "twelve;" and in line 2, page 29, strike out "seven" and insert "five."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Second Comptroller of the Treasury: For Second Comptroller of the Treasury, $5,000; deputy comptroller, $2,700; seven chiefs of division, at $2,100 each; nine clerks of class 4; ten clerks of class 3; ten clerks of class 2; ten clerks of class 1; two clerks, at $1,000 each; five clerks, at $900 each; one messenger; and three laborers; in all, $89,920.

For the additional force in the Second Comptroller's office rendered necessary by increase of work relating to pensions, namely: One clerk of class 4, $1,800.

Mr. FORNEY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, which does not change the aggregate sum appropriated.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 29, strike out the word "nine," in line 7, and insert "ten;" and in lieu of the sum proposed in lines 10 and 11 insert "$91,720;" and strike out all of lines 12 to 15, inclusive.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

First Auditor: For the First Auditor of the Treasury, $3,600; deputy auditor, $2,250; four chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; seven clerks of class 4; ten clerks of class 3; eleven clerks of class 2; eighteen clerks of class 1; three clerks, at $1,000 each; four copyists and counters, at $900 each; two assistant messengers; and two laborers; in all, $88,810.

Mr. CRAIN. I make a point of order upon the amount appropriated in the paragraph just read for the salary of the First Auditor of the Treasury. I make this point upon the ground that the provision in the bill is a change of existing law. The law of the Forty-third Congress reorganizing the Treasury Department fixed the salary of the First Auditor at $4,000, and that is the existing law. In support of my point of order, I respectfully call the attention of the Chair to his decision, made yesterday, upon the point raised by the gentleman from Indiana. The Chair then said:

It has generally been held that where there was any general law fixing a salary, that law governs in relation to this rule; that where there had been no salary fixed by law, other than in an appropriation bill, that the salary therein stated indicated the purpose of Congress as to what it should be, and that any effort to change it after it was once indicated by the House on an appropriation bill was in violation of the rule and subject to the objection here raised.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand the statute which, as I said before, in reorganizing the Treasury Department fixed the salary of the First Auditor at $4,000. It has been held by some of the courts of this country, where the question has been raised, that a failure to appropriate the amount fixed by law as the salary of any officer does not change ipso facto that salary, but that the officer who claims the difference between the appropriation made and the salary fixed by the law is entitled to receive from the courts a judgment in his favor where the State allows a suit to be brought. It has also been held by the Court of Claims in two cases which were cited when the point of order was made against the gentleman from Indiana, who had control of this branch of the general appropriation bills, that the language "in full compensation," used in the bill, if not stricken out by a vote, or if not ruled out upon a point of order, fixed the salary for the current year. But it has nowhere been held that where the general statute fixes the salary of an office an appropriation bill appropriating a less amount for the officer whose salary is thus fixed can operate as a change of the salary, except in so far as it may affect the salary for the current year.

Mr. DOCKERY. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Texas whether the law to which he refers applies to the remaining Auditors of the Treasury Department.

Mr. CRAIN. That is not a question pertinent to my point of order.

Mr. FORNEY. In the Forty-fourth Congress the appropriation for this salary was reduced to $3,600; that was continued in the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses, which were under Democratic rule. In the Forty-seventh Congress, when the Republicans had come into power, that provision was allowed to remain. In the Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Congresses, with the Democrats in power, it was still continued. I do not think it ought to be changed now.

Mr. CRAIN. The question is not whether it ought to be changed, but whether my point of order is well taken.

Mr. FORNEY. One of the pertinent questions here is, whether there ought to be a change in the amount? Ever since the Forty-fourth Congress the salary at the amount named in this bill has been continued under both political parties. I do not think the gentleman from Texas should now rise here and ask a change, simply because the First Auditor is now from the State of Texas.

Mr. CRAIN. From two States, Kentucky and Texas both.

Mr. BURNES. Mr. Chairman, in determining the point of order raised by my friend from Texas, there is, it seems to me, but one consideration to be entertained by the Chair, and that is purely a question of law. Does the appropriation of $3,600 change existing law? The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that this is a proposition to change existing law; yet before he takes his seat he tells you that the courts of the country have decided that the failure to appropriate up to the amounts authorized by law does not operate as a repeal or change of the existing law, but that the law remains the same, and the officer may go into the Court of Claims and recover the difference between the amount appropriated and the amount authorized by law.

That is the sole question here; and I undertake to say that the Chair yesterday did not decide that question. On the other hand, other gentlemen when occupying the Chair have time and again decided that a failure to appropriate the full sum authorized by law to be paid is not subject to a point of order, is not obnoxious to the rule, because it does not operate as a change of existing law.

Mr. CRAIN. This is to be considered in connection with that provision in the opening paragraph of this bill, which says that the amounts appropriated in the bill shall be "in full compensation." There is, therefore, a change of existing law.

Mr. BURNES. The fact this provision is in, as stated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN], "that the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full compensation for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, for the objects hereinafter expressed, namely, etc.," is one thing. There has not been a chance for a point of order. If the point of order had been made against those words, "in full compensation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889"——

Mr. MCKENNA. The Chair reserved his decision upon the point of order until the proper application had been made. It would have been made by myself.

Mr. BURNES. What became of it?

Mr. MCKENNA. The Chair reserved the point of order until the committee reached the point when it would apply.

Mr. BURNES. When the Chair is called upon to decide on that proposition I shall have no hesitation in saying the Chair can well sustain the point of order against this provision. I do not think there is any question about it.

It has been held time and again, continuously from the Forty-fourth Congress up to this hour, that an item in one of the appropriation bills is not a change of existing law as to the salary of an officer, but that by the introduction of the words "in full compensation for the service of the fiscal year," it may be made so. And if the gentleman had made the point of order on that proposition I would not have said a word. Nor will I do so when the Chair is called upon to pass upon that provision in the bill. But so far as the pending provision is concerned, in my judgment it is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. FORNEY. I have before me the current law. It says that the salary of the First Auditor of the Treasury shall be $3,600. Section 3 of the act declares that all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama will send to the Chair the statute to which he has just referred.

Mr. FORNEY. That is the law fixing the salary of the First Auditor of the Treasury at $3,600 per annum.

Mr. CRAIN. This is the language of the bill: "For the First Auditor of the Treasury, $3,600, in full compensation for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889." That is the language of the bill. While the words "in full compensation" do not appear in line 9 on page 30 they are retained in the bill, unless the point of order is made against them in connection with any specific appropriation. I understand when the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] raised the general point of order against the retention of this language in the statute the Chair held he would decide that question when it came properly before the committee for action. I say, while the language does not appear in line 9 on page 30, the appropriation for the First Auditor of the Treasury is to be construed in connection with that language, because it applies to every appropriation in the bill, and is as much a part of the bill as any other portion of it.

It has been said by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURNES] that it has been uniformly held where a failure to appropriate the amount fixed by law was made by the Appropriation Committee of the House that did not operate as a change of existing law, but gentlemen will remember the Court of Claims has decided on this very point, that where the language "in full compensation" appears in the bill, that was a change of existing law, but where that language failed to appear in the appropriation bill then the claimant had his suit in the court against the Government.

The chairman of the Appropriations Committee yesterday said in response to the argument of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], in support of his point of order, that to sustain it would result in suits against the Government to the extent of $70,000. That is a poor argument against making proper appropriations for officers of the Government. If they receive too much, have the moral courage to bring in a general bill reorganizing the Department and pay them what you think their services are worth, but do not come in here and cut them off on the plea, because it happens to be an election year, we must go before the country with economical appropriations.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I understand when the fifth line of this bill was reached, "in full compensation for the service of the fiscal year," the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and the gentleman from California [Mr. MCKENNA] made the point of order against those words, but the Chair reserved the point of order until the question arose. It seems to me, having reached that point, the Chair should rule on the words in the fifth line, if they are to be retained. Obviously the point of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN] is well taken if those words remain.

Mr. CRAIN. But if the gentleman from Maine will permit me, that is not my point of order at all. My point of order is that under the bill as it now stands, with the words "in full compensation" in it, the appropriation of $3,600 herein contained is an absolute change of existing law.

Mr. DINGLEY. I call upon the Chair to rule upon the first point of order, that is the point made by the gentleman from Minnesota in the fifth line of the bill.

Mr. CRAIN. And I make the point of order upon the gentleman from Maine that there is a point of order pending before the committee.

Mr. DINGLEY. But the other was pending first.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit that no point of order will apply to the salary of the First Auditor, as fixed in this bill. Such a point of order could not be presented now, for the simple reason that the Committee on Appropriations can of course report a less sum, or recommend a less sum in their bill than the amount provided by the general law, and it is within the power of the House to adopt the lesser sum. It can not go beyond that and adopt a larger sum than that fixed by the law, because that is prohibited by the rule.

But I submit that no point of order can be made upon the sum of $3,600 fixed here. All the gentleman can do is to move to increase the amount from $3,600 to $4,000——

Mr. CRAIN. And then the point of order would be made upon it that it was an increase.

Mr. HOLMAN. And then the point of order, when made, if made, the reply of the gentleman would be that $4,000 is the salary fixed by law.

Mr. CRAIN. Will the gentleman pardon an interruption?

Mr. HOLMAN. The Chair can not strike out the sum fixed by the Committee on Appropriations on the point of order, because——

Mr. CRAIN. Didn't they do it in the case of the Doorkeeper on yesterday?

Mr. HOLMAN. I am addressing the Chair, if my friend will allow me.

Mr. CRAIN. Excuse me.

Mr. HOLMAN. Because a little reflection will show that the proper and the only mode of reaching the point that the gentleman suggests is to move an increase of the amount, and the answer then comes that the amount proposed by the bill is now the existing law.

In its present shape, therefore, the point of order simply presents nothing on which the Chair could rule.

And, Mr. Chairman, with reference to this question, permit me to say——

Mr. MILLS. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to yield to me for a moment in order to move that the committee rise. I will state that an agreement was entered into the other day, subject, of course, to ratification by the House, that we would allow our friends on the other side to have the use of the Hall to-day at 1 o'clock, and that our side would have the use of it at 8 o'clock.

Mr. HOLMAN. Just one moment and I will yield.

I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the first clause of this bill, the present law, contains the provision that the salaries provided in it shall be in full compensation.

Mr. CRAIN. What law?

Mr. HOLMAN. The language of the current law under which we are now operating. It provides—

That the following sums be, and are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full compensation, etc.

And amongst the salaries fixed, following the clause which I have just read, is that providing compensation for the First Auditor of the Treasury. Now, the last clause of the statute——

The CHAIRMAN. To what statute does the gentleman refer?

Mr. HOLMAN. I refer now to the law of the current year. The last clause is:

And all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. BURNES. That settles the matter.

Mr. HOLMAN. I undertake to say that the only legal construction that can be placed upon this language is that it repeals or suspends, giving the widest meaning to the use of the words I have quoted—it suspends the operation of the salary in any amount beyond that fixed in the bill itself; and the result is that there is no law now existing fixing the salary at $4,000.

Mr. PAYSON. No general law?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; but there is an appropriation act which fixes it at $3,600. I hope the gentleman will not forget, either, that for twelve years this sum has been appropriated both by Democratic and Republican administrations.

Mr. CRAIN. And then there have been general deficiency bills to come in and supply the deficiency afterwards.

Mr. HOLMAN. The point is clear——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule upon the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair finds on the first page of the bill under consideration the following language:

That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full compensation for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, for the objects hereinafter expressed, namely.

And amongst the salaries provided for in the bill is the one now under consideration, providing for the compensation of the First Auditor of the Treasury at $3,600. If this bill shall become a law the present statute fixing the salary of this officer at $4,000 would, under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, lapse for this year. Therefore the Chair holds that it is, and does operate as, a change of existing law, and sustains the point of order.

A statute has been sent to the Chair by way of answering this point; that is, the act making appropriations for the present fiscal year. The Chair desires to read the first clause of this act:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full compensation for the service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, etc.

And the last clause of that act provides—

That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent, etc., are hereby repealed.

Under the decision of the Supreme Court this is merely a suspension of that law for the fiscal year 1888, leaving the original statute standing.

The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. HOLMAN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BLOUNT reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9377) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFERENCE COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair appoints as conferees on the part of the House on the bill (H. R. 7263) for the erection of a public building at Bay City, Mich., Mr. DIBBLE, Mr. NEWTON, and Mr. POST.

And then, on motion of Mr. MILLS (at 1 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicatd below:

By Mr. FINLEY: A bill (H. R. 10167) to increase the pension of Nathaniel Crain—to the Committee on Pensions.

SENATE.

MONDAY, May 28, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of sundry citizens of McPherson County, Kansas, praying that certain amendments of the interstate-commerce law be made; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. MANDERSON. I present a petition of the executive board of the National Farmers' Alliance, representing organized bodies of farmers in the United States, comprising an aggregate membership of over 1,400,000 persons, praying for the passage of the House bill organizing a department of agriculture. This is an extremely short petition, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HARRIS. I object to printing memorials in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question then will be on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska that the petition be printed in the RECORD. It will be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Shall it be printed in the RECORD?

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of the Rock Island Business Men's Association, of Rock Island, Ill., praying that an appropriation be made for the immediate construction of a temporary dam to furnish water power for the Rock Island Arsenal; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a petition of the executive board of the National Farmers' Alliance, officially signed, praying for the passage of the bill to create a department of agriculture, with a Cabinet minister at its head; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of the Chicago (Ill.) Medical Society, having a membership of 435 physicians, praying for the removal of the import duty from all medicines, medical and surgical appliances, and everything used in the diagnosis and treatment of disease; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of John H. Smith, of Washington, D. C., praying that he be allowed a pension for disease contracted while in service on the United States steamer Brandywine in 1861–'62; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of Fred. W. Snell, of Columbus, Ohio, praying remuneration for services rendered as telegraph operator during the war of the rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CAMERON presented the memorial of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, Pa., remonstrating against any reduction in the duty on sugar as proposed by the Mills tariff bill, unless a corresponding reduction is made in the duty on molasses; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the repeal of that portion of the internal-revenue law which classes druggists as liquor dealers, and for a reduction of the tax on spirits; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE presented the petition of Charles Scott, president of Hope College, and 20 other male citizens of Holland, Mich., praying for better legal protection for womanhood and girlhood, and that the age of consent be raised to eighteen years; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of B. R. Hall, mayor of Taunton, Mass., Hanson & Sproad, D. H. Mason, Lowell A. Drown, and 34 other citizens of Taunton, Mass., praying that a pension be granted to John Carr; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DAVIS presented a petition of citizens of Ramsey County, Minnesota, and a petition of citizens of Pope County, Minnesota, praying that the interstate-commerce law be amended so as to allow the complainant the benefit of all fines and penalties imposed in cases arising thereunder; which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of ex-Union soldiers and sailors, citizens of Excelsior, Minn., praying for the passage of the per diem rated service-pension bill; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Duluth, Minn., remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill 1448 and House bill 4923, to dissolve the Corps of Army Engineers and to create a national bureau of water ways; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLUMB presented the petition of Cadmus Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Linn County, Kansas, praying for the passage of a bill providing for the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Manhattan, Kans., remonstrating against the passage of what is known as the Palmer bill, for the creation of a new bureau of animal industry; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PLUMB. I present the petition of a large number of citizens of Ottawa County, Kansas, setting forth that the interstate-commerce law is being systematically violated, and asking that an amendment of it as set out in the petition may be made. I may say in presenting this petition that I have no doubt the law is systematically violated by railroad companies in the country, and that some very drastic amendment to the law will undoubtedly become necessary. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McPHERSON. I present a petition of Labor Assembly No. 8219, Knights of Labor, in favor of the erection of a public building at Perth Amboy, N. J. The petitioners respectfully state that Perth Amboy was once the provincial capital of East New Jersey, and afterwards of the State, and is the largest seaport town, with the most commodious harbor of any in New Jersey; that the district of Perth Amboy was among the earliest established by the Federal Government, the first collector of the port and other officers having been appointed in August, 1789. They pray for a public building at that place for postal and other purposes. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL presented affidavits of James Walker, B. F. Thomas, Dr. W. W. Washburn, and Drs. Coe and Galbreath, to accompany the bill (S. 2836) granting a pension to William E. Taylor; which were rereferred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8191) to enlarge the powers and duties of the Department of Agriculture, and to create an Executive Department to be known as the Department of Agriculture, reported it with amendments.

Mr. MANDERSON. That is the bill for the passage of which I presented a petition of the National Farmers' Alliance a few minutes ago. I therefore ask that the petition lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

Mr. PADDOCK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8217) granting a pension to Raphael Fowler, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6531) to pension Leah Roark, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4423) relating to certain acts of the Twenty-seventh Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1951) to prohibit members of Territorial Legislatures holding office, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. 125) granting an increase of pension to William Bittinger, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1361) to provide for the reduction of the Round Valley Indian reservation, in the State of California, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. COKE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2831) for improving the mouth of the Brazos River, Texas, reported it with amendments.

CATLENA LYMAN.

Mr. FARWELL. The Committee on Pensions reported the bill (S. 2626) granting a pension to Catlena Lyman adversely, and it was indefinitely postponed. I move that that action be reconsidered, and that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the order of indefinite postponement will be reconsidered, and the bill recommitted to the Committee on Pensions. The Chair hears no objection, and that order is made.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

Mr. HISCOCK introduced a bill (S. 3052) granting a pension to George W. Durfee; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PAY OF CONGRESSIONAL EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. CULLOM. I introduce a joint resolution for immediate action.

The joint resolution (S. R. 87) authorizing and directing the payment of the salaries of the officers and employés of Congress for the month of May, 1888, was read the first time by its title.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like immediate action on that joint resolution, as the purpose is to pay the employés of the Senate and House of Representatives on the 29th instead of the 31st instant, in view of Decoration Day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the joint resolution will be read the second time at length.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to pay the officers and employés of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of May, 1888, on the 29th day of said month.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 21st instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 1877) granting a pension to Harriet L. Vaughan;
An act (S. 1912) granting an increase of pension to William Irving;
An act (S. 752) to grant a pension to Mrs. Elvira L. Johnson, widow of Commodore Philip C. Johnson;
An act (S. 555) to establish an additional land district in the State of Oregon; and

An act (S. 109) for the relief of Thomas H. Norton and James McLean.

The message also announced that the President had on the 24th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 354) to provide for the survey of certain historic grounds, locations, and military works;

An act (S. 316) for the relief of Edward Fitzgerald;

An act (S. 475) for the relief of the estate of Thomas L. Price, deceased; and

An act (S. 1795) for the relief of the First National Bank of Marion, Iowa.

The message further announced that the President had on the 25th instant approved and signed the act (S. 5261) to remove the political disabilities of John Rutledge, of South Carolina.

The message also announced that the President had this day approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 850) granting certain lands in the Territory of Wyoming for public purposes;

An act (S. 331) granting a pension to John Kalbfleisch;

An act (S. 805) granting a pension to Melvina Greenwood;

An act (S. 816) granting a pension to Amastasia Walter;

An act (S. 860) granting a pension to Stephen Singleton;

An act (S. 1096) granting a pension to James Lucas;

An act (S. 1717) granting a pension to Emma Von Bernewitz;

An act (S. 2419) granting a pension to Lemuel R. Rea;

An act (S. 801) for the relief of Basile Champagne; and

An act (S. 39) to grant an increase of pension to Frederick Beno.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. MORRILL. Several changes have been made in the amendments to Senate bills 2615 and 2919, relating to steam-railroads in the District, which make it necessary for me to change somewhat the substitute first proposed by me. I offer the amendment with certain modifications, and I ask that it be printed and laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. SHERMAN. I also offer two amendments to the same bill—the railroad bill for this city.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be received, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FAULKNER. I desire to submit two amendments intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. 5870) to amend the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia, for the protection of girls and for the punishment of the crime of rape, which bill I reported last Friday from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be received and laid on the table until the bill is reached for consideration.

Mr. CALL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. FRYE. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. 9859) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments.

I desire to state for the information of the Senate that the bill as reported proposes to appropriate $21,388,783.77. The bill as passed by the House of Representatives appropriates $19,605,783.13, making a net increase in the bill as reported of $1,783,000.64.

I wish further to say in relation to this bill that it will be some considerable time before it can be called up for action, for the reason that the report, which is required by order of the Senate, can not possibly be printed in less than a week from the present time. Whenever the report is ready I shall then call up the bill for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

THE VETO POWER—LAND-PATENT SUITS.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to call up Senate joint resolution No. 80, for the purpose of submitting some remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a joint resolution the title of which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. A joint resolution (S. R. 80) proposing an amendment to subdivisions 2 and 3 of section 7 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Mr. President, on the last day but one on which the Senate was in session, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], in the course of some remarks, nominally upon the joint resolution now under consideration, made some charges which I think, owing to the fact that they were delivered in the Senate of the United States, deserve some consideration at my hands. I send to the desk to be read certain of that Senator's remarks on that occasion. The Chief Clerk will please read the part marked.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

I do not desire in calling attention to the veto power to point out frauds on the revenue, but to show the almost unlimited discretionary power exercised by the Executive, and which he may use at his pleasure, to benefit his friends or to destroy his enemies. This power is not confined to the administration of the revenue laws.

Nearly all land titles in the United States were obtained from the Government, still the Attorney-General assumes the authority to bring suits to set aside any land patent issued by the Government, no matter when, and thereby and without a hearing cloud the title of any citizen to his land, and involve him in ruinous litigation, who shall incur the displeasure of the imperial power of the Administration. An example of this extraordinary power, and the more extraordinary manner of its exercise, is found in the action of the Attorney-General in farming out to private parties the privilege to bring suits in the name of the United States to set aside land patents in California which have been granted after years of litigation in tribunals created by Congress to carry into effect the terms of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. After thirty years of litigation the Mexican land grants in California have been settled and patents issued to land amounting in the aggregate to over 8,000,000 acres, now improved and inhabited by not less than 800,000 people.

Under such circumstances it would be supposed that the Executive would have allowed the matter to rest until Congress should authorize further proceedings. But the Attorney-General has assumed the responsibility to authorize a large number of suits to set aside patents, some of which were issued more than thirty years ago, since which time the lands have passed into the hands of innocent purchasers and are inhabited by thousands of people. These suits will involve enormous expense, cloud the title of innocent purchasers for many years, and the United States will be the loser and not the gainer by the proceedings, as it has been in several suits of like character authorized by the Attorney-General and decided against the United States in every instance by the courts. It may, however, be beneficial for some political purpose or design of which the public are not informed.

Another example of the exercise of Executive power is illustrated by the unsuccessful raid of the Attorney-General on the Bell Telephone Company. I have nothing to do with the motives of that distinguished officer in instituting these proceedings. I simply refer to this matter to show the growing tendency of the executive department to interfere with private rights.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Mr. President, if I had heard these remarks at the time they were uttered in the Senate, they would not have gone, as they did, into the RECORD unchallenged. The absolute refutation of every single imputation and aspersion that finds its place in the quotation just read by the Chief Clerk was in the hands of every Senator.

The Senator from Nevada himself had some weeks prior to that time introduced a resolution containing a number of questions addressed to the Attorney-General covering each one of these points. On Monday previous to the day on which his speech was delivered an answer from the Attorney-General had been received and the letter of transmittal had been read in the Senate. The document was not printed in the RECORD, but it was printed in document form and found its place on the desk of every Senator.

The Senator from Nevada, therefore, knew at the time he made these charges what the facts were in the case. I deem it due to the Attorney-General, due to the truth of history and to the dignity of the Senate, that the facts as they appear from the report of the Attorney-General shall go along with and as an antidote to the poison contained in the charges made by the Senator from Nevada.

With regard to the charge of suits brought by order of the Attorney-General for the purpose of clouding land titles, as made by the Senator, for the purpose, to use his own language, of involving "in ruinous litigation" those "who shall incur the displeasure of the imperial power of the Administration," the Attorney-General had given the truth, showing that there was absolutely no ground upon which it could stand, on page 2 of his reply, as follows:

It is to be remarked in this connection that all suits of the character referred to, and directed by this Department during the present Administration, have been begun after the request of the Interior Department.

But this fact did not deter the Senator from making the charge, and attributing evil motives to the Attorney-General.

The purposes, disgraceful in themselves, which the Senator from Nevada charges that the Attorney-General had in mind in organizing these suits must have originated with the Secretary of the Interior if at all, for each one of these suits, as reported by the Attorney-General, was brought by him at the request of the Secretary of the Interior. I presume that the Senator from Nevada would not in his place on last Thursday have charged that the distinguished gentleman who presided over the Department of the Interior from the inception of this Administration down to a short time ago could have been guilty of attempting to use his great office "to benefit his friends or to destroy his enemies," as the Senator from Nevada intimates the Attorney-General has done in this case, yet the fact remains that if there was any such purpose in the institution of these suits as the accomplishment of political ends, as the persecution of individuals, as the reward of friends, it must have originated with the Secretary of the Interior, who himself had in the first place recommended the suits to be brought.

Mr. President, whatever other Senators may do or say, the Senator from Nevada is estopped from charging that the Secretary of the Interior could have been guilty of any such motive. We all know that only a short time since the people of the United States were informed in a three-column interview published in a leading paper which went out from that Senator (and it never, so far as I have ever heard, has been denied by him), that there could be no more eminent man and no man better fitted for the discharge of the functions of a higher position even than the one he occupied at that time than the distinguished gentleman who was then Secretary of the Interior. This being true, he certainly can not say that the bringing of these suits was an unjust exercise of authority.

When the Senator made the broad charge in this Chamber that the Attorney-General had an ulterior and disreputable purpose in view in bringing these suits, he knew that the responsibility rested with a man of whom he had said that he was not only fit for a position as a constitutional adviser of the President of the United States, but was fit for a higher position, and one requiring the greatest purity of character. It seems to me that this is a sufficient answer to any imputation cast by that Senator on the Attorney-General.

While the Senator from Nevada knew under what circumstances these suits were instituted he charges that the Attorney-General had "assumed" the authority of bringing these suits for the purposes, as he implies, of accomplishing personal and partisan ends.

Mr. President, there was no member of this body who knew better than the Senator from Nevada when he made the insinuation that there had been an improper assumption of authority on the part of the Attorney-General, that it was not true and would not be borne out by the law as it stands. The Supreme Court of the United States, in deciding the San Jacinto case, in which, if I am not mistaken, the Senator himself was of counsel, had gone over the question of the power of the Attorney-General, and had distinctly held that he had the right, and it was his duty in certain contingencies, to bring suits of this class; and the Attorney-General, in the response which was on the Senator's desk when he made this charge, distinctly said that no suits had been brought during his administration under the Government except those that came within the letter of the law as laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States.

These things he knew well, but as the charges he made go out in the RECORD uncontradicted and find their way into homes and among men who perhaps are not so familiar with the facts and the law of the case as the Senator from Nevada is, I have deemed it proper and right that the attention of the country should be called as publicly to the facts and law of the case as were the charges made by the distinguished Senator.

Mr. President, this assault is a most remarkable one. If it had been made in any other place than in the Senate of the United States and by any other person than a Senator representing a sovereign State, I would for one have passed it by as utterly beneath the dignity of contempt; I should not have thought it necessary to open my mouth or to say one word in defense of a man whose public career has been such as to command the respect of all who knew him. I am glad to believe that there are but few men living whose estimate of mankind is so low that they can believe that a President of the United States or one who by his eminence and ability has been considered fit to be called in as a constitutional adviser of a President could so far forget his own honor, his own integrity, and what is due to a great office as well as to his own personal self-respect, as to be willing to prostitute his office to the low level of assuming an authority which he did not possess for the purpose of clouding titles to lands of individuals who had incurred the displeasure of the Administration, or could be guilty of "farming" out a great privilege and a great duty that belonged to the Attorney-General of the United States. I say I am glad to believe that there are but few men in the United States whose estimate of mankind is so low as to suppose that eminent characters of this kind could be so degraded as to be guilty of such conduct as this.

A charge of this kind, not to recoil upon him who makes it, ought to be sustained by some sort of proof. There ought to be something or other, some sort of foundation on which to base charges of this kind when made, and they ought not to be made in the Senate by a representative of a great State, as in this case, without a shadow or a scintilla of fact on which they are to rest. The Senator stated in the extract which has been read, among other remarkable charges made, that—

> After thirty years of litigation the Mexican land grants in California have been settled and patents issued to land amounting in the aggregate to over 8,000,000 acres, now improved and inhabited by not less than 800,000 people. Under such circumstances it would be supposed that the Executive would have allowed the matter to rest until Congress should authorize further proceedings.

Mr. President, I am not blessed with a very strong voice and am not much accustomed to speaking, and would be glad, if possible, to have order while I say what I have to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas is entitled to the floor. The Chair appeals to Senators to be seated and to abstain from audible conversation. The Senator from Arkansas will proceed.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. It would occur to an unbiased observer if the fact exists that an Attorney-General is "farming" out the right to bring suits, or authorizing suits to be brought for the purpose of accomplishing political purposes, "to benefit his friends or to destroy his enemies," if he is directing suits to be brought which are to cloud the titles to 8,000,000 acres of land in California "without a hearing" for the purpose of punishing his enemies or rewarding his friends—if these things are true, as they are intimated in the extract which has been read at the desk, it would strike an unbiased observer as a little singular that neither one of those gentlemen who are commissioned by the great State of California to represent her upon this floor has thought it necessary to rise in his place and protest against such unwarranted, unjust, and outrageous exercises of executive authority. If these things are so it has been left to a Senator representing another State, a State in which not a single one of the suits of which complaint is made has been brought, to call attention to them. This Senator is the first man, and, so far as I know, the only man who has discovered this state of things, and they exist in a State not his own, which has two able representatives upon this floor, two men his equals in point of ability, his equals in point of reputation, his equals in point of dignity and of standing in this body. I leave the Senate to imagine why these men should sit here silent all the day long while the defense of the great State of California is left to rest alone in the hands of the distinguished Senator who comes here to represent the State of Nevada.

Mr. President, I am not familiar with the history of land litigation in California and in the West, but there is an impression prevailing all over this country that the old Spanish grants have been the bases of the most monstrous frauds. Small tracts of land granted by the Mexican Government have been made by fraud and perjury to spread out and cover tracts of country which render insignificant the old-time performance that we read of, of the adventurer who bought as much land as he could cover with a bull's hide and made it cover enough on which to build a city.

Whether these things are true I know not; but we do know that the report of the Attorney-General shows that whenever these suits have been directed to be brought it has been done at the request of the Secretary of the Interior, after the fullest investigation, as we all know, and when he himself believed that the exercise of his duty in that great office required that suits should be instituted to set aside patents in which the Government of the United States was bound to interpose for the purpose of seeing that justice was done.

The Senator from Nevada says that one would suppose these things would be left for Congressional action. The Supreme Court decided, and the Senator knows it, that if there was to be any restraint upon the action of the Attorney-General it was necessary that Congress should interpose and restrain it. I read two or three lines of the language of the decision of the court in the San Jacinto case:

> But it has often been said that the fact that the exercise of power may be abused is no sufficient reason for denying its existence, and if restrictions are to be placed upon the exercise of this authority by the Attorney-General, it is for the legislative body which created the office to enact them.

Until Congress shall see fit to enact a law which will limit the power and the duty of the Attorney-General and restrain his action in these matters, it is absolutely necessary that he shall exercise his discretion in bringing those suits whenever he believes that the interests of the public demand that they shall be brought.

As a complete and sufficient refutation of every charge and every insinuation contained in the speech of the Senator from Nevada, I send to the Secretary's desk, with the request that it be read, the letter of the Attorney-General in response to the resolution which was introduced, I believe, by the Senator from Nevada himself. It is a complete answer in every point, as it occurs to me, and is a sufficient response within itself to all he has said without a word of mine.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, May 19, 1888.

SIR: I acknowledge receipt of the resolution passed by the Senate on the 26th of March last in the words following:

"Resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to inform the Senate—

"First. What suits to vacate land patents issued by the United States have been commenced by the direction of the Department of Justice, and are now pending in court, and the present status of the same.

"Second. What suits he has authorized to be commenced and which have not yet been entered in court.

"Third. What suits he has been requested by the Department of the Interior to commence, but upon which requests final action has not yet been taken.

"Fourth. What applications for the institution of such suits have been filed with him, and pending before him, or on reference to the Interior Department.

"Fifth. Whether any special counsel have been employed in the conduct of such suits or in any wise authorized to represent the United States therein; and if so, the names of such counsel, and whether the expenses of any such suits, in whole or in part, are paid by any parties other than the Government.

"Sixth. To what extent does the Department of Justice determine whether such suits ought to be commenced or whether they can be successfully maintained."

In reply thereto I beg leave to state that the inquiries contained in the resolution have required much examination and a great amount of labor, and no effort has been spared to make a prompt response, and a complete answer can not now be made, but I send such information as is at present in the possession of the Department.

The statement accompanying this communication, marked A, B, and C, will answer the first, second, and fifth interrogatories propounded in the resolution, except as to the compensation of special counsel by parties other than the Government, and upon this point I have no information.

In reply to the third inquiry, I would state that I have taken final action on all requests made by the Interior Department for the bringing of such suits.

In response to the fourth inquiry, as to what applications for the institution of such suits have been filed with me and are pending before me, or on reference to the Interior Department, I would state that there are no such applications.

It is to be remarked in this connection that all suits of the character referred to, and directed by this Department during the present administration, have been begun after the request of the Interior Department.

In answer to the sixth interrogatory, I reply that the Department of Justice, in passing upon the applications to bring such suits, gives much weight to the requests of the Interior Department, though it does not consider such requests as imperative or as conclusive, or that the Department of Justice is necessarily bound to bring such suits because of such requests.

The Department of Justice examines the case so far as to see whether the Government has an interest in the proceedings or a fraud has been practiced on the Government and operates to its prejudice, or the Government is under obligation to some individual to make his title good by setting aside the alleged fraudulent patent, or that the duty of the Government to the public requires such action; and if, upon such examination, the Department thinks there is just reason to believe that any or all of these things exist, the application is granted and the suit ordered to be brought.

The Department is not in possession of information in every case referred to sufficient to give the names of all the parties in possession of the lands and who claim to be innocent purchasers, and some of the suits have been delayed in part on account of the difficulty in getting the names of such parties.

Several letters from the Department to district attorneys, asking for information sought by the resolution, have not yet been answered, but replies are expected at an early day, and when received will be transmitted to the Senate to complete the response of the Department to such resolution.

Very respectfully,

A. H. GARLAND,
Attorney-General.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore of the United States Senate.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. One word more and I have done. The Senator continues, after what has been commented on, as follows:

Another example of the exercise of the executive power is illustrated by the unsuccessful raid of the Attorney-General on the Bell Telephone Company. I have nothing to do with the motives of that distinguished officer in instituting these proceedings. I simply refer to this matter to show the growing tendency of the executive department to interfere with private rights.

That is a fair illustration of the lack of accurate information, or of the failure to state correctly what the record shows, that characterized the remarks of the distinguished Senator on the occasion referred to, and there is not a Senator here and not an intelligent man outside of the Chamber who does not know that the Attorney-General directed posuit against the Bell Telephone Company. Whatever may have been done in that matter it must always be known here and elsewhere that he had nothing to do with bringing those suits; that he had no connection, direct or indirect, with them. He positively refused not only to act in this matter, but refused even to talk about it to any one, leaving his junior officer, upon whom the responsibility rested, to do what was required by law to be done as he understood his sworn duty. The Attorney-General had absolutely nothing to do with it, and this was known to the distinguished Senator when he made the charge here that the Attorney-General had made an unsuccessful "raid" on the Bell Telephone Company. It is absolutely refuted by the facts of the case, and it is not worth while to call the attention of the Senate or anybody else to the absolute want of foundation for this charge.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I regard the Attorney-General, as I believe correctly, as the responsible law officer of the Government, and the decision of the Supreme Court to which the Senator has referred clothes him with that authority, and holds that he may in a proper case, he being the judge, institute proceedings to set aside land patents. I would not have called attention to the conduct of an official in the manner I did unless I believed that great wrong was being perpetrated upon innocent people, and I now ask the Secretary to read, with reference to this matter, a letter of the governor of California to start with, so that some idea of the injury that is being inflicted upon the people of California may be had, and so that my following remarks may be more readily understood.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
Sacramento, Cal., September 27, 1887.

SIR: I herewith transmit for your consideration two petitions, one signed by one hundred and forty-three citizens, owners of and residents upon a Mexican land grant situated in San Mateo County, California, known as the Pulgas Grant, asking your Excellency to set aside an order of the Attorney-General permitting interested parties to commence proceedings to set aside the patent to said grant. The other is a petition to your Excellency, signed by the leading lawyers and law firms of California, stating various reasons, both of justice and of public policy, why certain suits, authorized to be commenced by the Attorney-General to set aside patents to Mexican land claims in California, should not be prosecuted.

By the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, whereby the United States acquired California and other territory, our Government undertook to respect and protect all property rights in the territory acquired. For the purpose of carrying this treaty into effect the United States created and selected its own tribunals, before which the owners of these titles were compelled to appear or forfeit their lands. The investigation of these titles before these tribunals occupied a period of about thirty years. The necessary expenses of these investigations imposed upon the claimants was such as to practically confiscate most of their lands. The United States was at all times represented by able counsel, and called to its aid settlers and others desiring to appropriate these lands. The parties now insisting upon reopening this investigation have already been heard and had their day in court.

There was great difficulty in arriving at an accurate determination in most of the cases on account of the lack of surveys and the imperfection of record descriptions of property during the period when these grants were made. A large portion of the evidence upon which the judgments and decisions of the courts confirming the grants, and of the Land Department in determining their location, were made necessarily rested in parol. Great difficulty existed in obtaining witnesses who could supply the necessary information in locating these grants. The inhabitants were few in number previous to the acquisition of the country. Many of these left rather than accept the changed condition of things; others were dispersed in the mines. From those that could be found all information was obtained that was possible at the time. It would be strange if, under such circumstances, all the decisions were correct. But it was necessary to determine these titles, and even an erroneous determination was better than no determination at all.

The treaty ceding this country to the United States was made in 1848, nearly forty years ago. Most of these Mexican grants were made many years prior to that time. Few, if any, of the persons who were familiar with the facts relating to the location of these Mexican grants are now living, and they must be old and infirm. The face of the country is changed from vast uncultivated stock ranges to cities, villages, vineyards, and farms. The ancient landmarks are generally obliterated. There is no possibility of relocating these grants by aid of oral testimony. The present occupants are purchasers in good faith from the patentees of the United States. More than half the population and at least two-thirds of the wealth of California are located upon these Mexican grants. By no possibility could a reinvestigation and redetermination of these titles result in any correction of errors in the former determination, but, on the contrary, would necessarily result in great injustice. The difficulties which attended the original investigations, as above stated, are certainly far greater at this time. An attempt on the part of the United States to reopen and relitigate these land claims has already created distrust in the stability of land titles in this State. The vast expenditures and unreasonable delays which paralyzed California for so many years in obtaining patents for these lands have made the people of this State very sensitive upon the question of land titles. The threatened renewal of this controversy is very damaging to the prosperity of California, and can by no means possibly result in any benefit to the United States or any citizen thereof.

I earnestly call your attention to the petitions herewith transmitted as expressions of the opinion of the most enlightened members of the bar of California, and also of the general facts involved in the proposed litigation.

Hoping that your excellency will give this matter special attention, I am,
Respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. W. WATERMAN, Governor.

To the PRESIDENT.

Mr. STEWART. I shall also print in my remarks the petition of the owners of the Pulgas grant, with their names, and also the petition of the members of the bar of California, so that the case may be made up in the RECORD:

PETITION OF OWNERS OF PULGAS GRANT.

To the President of the United States:

We, the undersigned, respectfully represent that we are the owners and occupants of lands within the grant heretofore surveyed and patented by the United States as the Las Pulgas grant, in San Mateo County, State of California; that the patent for said grant was issued by the United States on October 2, 1857, nearly thirty years ago; that upon the faith of said patent and the title granted thereby the undersigned have purchased and are now the owners of different parts of said grant; that we purchased lands in said grant without notice of any defect in said title, and have improved said land at great cost; that the towns of San Mateo, Redwood City, and Menlo Park are situated upon said grant, and that there are living upon the lands included in said grant about 5,000 people; that the taxable value of the property included within the limits of said grant is $5,572,880, as appears from the assessment-roll of said San Mateo County; that the improvements and personal property situate upon said grant are assessed for the purposes of taxation at the aggregate value of $1,764,640.

And your subscribers most respectfully represent that it is most unjust to the occupants and purchasers of lands in said grant to allow a suit to be brought in the name of the United States, as plaintiff, for the purpose of setting aside the survey of said grant upon which the patent was issued; that the United States has no interest whatever in such suit, and that said suit will be really brought in the interest of private persons for purposes of speculation.

And your subscribers further represent that even if facts existed which would justify any change in the survey of said grant as between the original owners of said grant and the owners of any adjoining grant, such reasons would in no event justify the disturbance of the Pulgas grant as against your petitioners, who are bona fide purchasers of the lands in said grant, without notice; that the bringing of said suit will cloud the titles to the lands in said grant, and will hinder and obstruct the further development of said lands, and will have a most depressing effect upon the general prosperity of the people now living upon and near said grant.

Your petitioners further represent that as appears from the papers on file in the matter of said Pulgas rancho, before the honorable the Secretary of the Interior, the survey of said rancho was made and its boundaries fixed by the surveyor-general of California, under the authority conferred by section 13 of the act of Congress entitled "An act to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California," approved March 3, 1851 (United States Statutes at Large, volume 9, page 631); that in pursuance of the provisions of the above-mentioned section 13, the owners of the rancho "Canada de Raymundo," adjoining the said Pulgas rancho upon the west (and the predecessors in interest of the persons who are now seeking to use the name of the United States in a suit to set aside the survey of said Pulgas rancho) made application to the district judge of the United States for the district in which said lands were situated for an injunction to restrain the issuance of the patent for said Pulgas rancho; that said injunction was refused by said district judge; that thereafter the owners of said Pulgas rancho brought a suit in ejectment against the owners of title under the grant of said rancho "Canada de Raymundo," to reject them from the western portion of the Pulgas rancho as surveyed, the said "Canada de Raymundo" owners being in occupation of the lands and asserting title thereto under their grant; that said suit was brought in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of California, and after a trial on the merits a judgment was therein entered in favor of the plaintiffs and owners of the Pulgas Rancho and against the defendants and owners of the Canada de Raymundo rancho; that upon writ of error said case was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States and there heard by said Supreme Court, which affirmed the judgment of the circuit court of California. The opinion of the Supreme Court is reported in 24 Howard, commencing at page 268. That in order to prevent the execution of the final judgment entered in the above-mentioned case, one James Morrison, having purchased an interest in the rancho Canada de Raymundo, brought a suit in equity in the United States circuit court for the district of California to restrain the marshal from serving the writ of restitution. Upon a full investigation and hearing the court refused the injunction.

Thereafter the above-mentioned suit in ejectment was commenced, and in order to finally quiet the title of said Pulgas rancho against the claims of the owners of the said rancho Canada de Raymundo, the owners of the first-mentioned grant brought a suit to quiet title against the owners of said rancho Canada de Raymundo in the district court of the Twelfth judicial district of the State of California; that in said suit all questions concerning the correctness of the boundary line between said ranchos were fully investigated and litigated, and that the trial of said suit resulted in final judgment in said district court in favor of the owners of said Pulgas rancho; that upon appeal to the supreme court of the State of California said judgment was affirmed; that the opinion of the said supreme court is reported in the twenty-sixth volume of Reports of California Supreme Court, commencing at page 616.

That in January or February, 1863, an application was made in the interest of the owners of said Canada de Raymundo rancho, addressed to the Attorney-General, asking for authority to use the name of the United States in a suit to be brought to set aside the patent of the Pulgas rancho. This communication was referred by the Attorney-General to the Secretary of the Interior, March 18, 1863, and by the Secretary of the Interior to the Land Department on March 21, 1863. On April 6, 1863, the Commissioner of the General Land Office made an elaborate report to the Secretary, upon which the Secretary of the Interior declined to recommend that the petition asked for be given, and thereupon the Attorney-General denied the application.

And your petitioners represent that the aforesaid application was made to and determined by officers who were familiar with Mexican land grants, and that the action of the then Secretary of the Interior and the then Attorney-General should now be regarded as a final adjudication upon the matters then determined, which determination should not now be set aside or disregarded; that in view of the above-mentioned litigation in the courts of the State and of the United States, and of the above-mentioned action of the Land Department of Government, your petitioners respectfully suggest that every presumption should be indulged in favor of the correctness of these decisions, and that they should not now be set aside after the lapse of nearly a quarter of a century, when many of the witnesses to the facts involved have died and much material testimony has been lost.

Your subscribers therefore respectfully request and petition that the President of the United States examine the papers on file in this matter before the honorable the Secretary of the Interior, and upon such examination that the President direct that no suit be brought in the name of the United States, as plaintiff, to vacate or set aside the survey of said grant, or change the boundary lines thereof in any way.

Your petitioners further represent that leave was granted to bring said suit on November 23, 1886, about six months ago, and that no suit has been commenced in pursuance to said leave; that the delay of commencing said suit after obtaining leave to bring the same in the name of the United States, as above stated, justifies the inference that the real object of the instigators of said suit is not to have a speedy or any determination of said suit, but to cloud the titles of lands in said grant for the purpose of speculation or compromise with the owners of said lands; that the delay which has ensued in bringing said suit is and ought to be sufficient ground for the vacation of the order which has heretofore been granted authorizing the bringing of said suit in the name of the United States.

And your petitioners will ever pray.

PETITION OF MEMBERS OF THE BAR.

To the President of the United States:

The undersigned, members of the bar of the supreme court of California, respectfully represent that the settlement and development of this State was, for a number of years after the Mexican conquest, greatly retarded by the unsettled condition of land titles, the larger part of the most accessible and valuable land being claimed under Spanish and Mexican grants; that after a litigation extending over a period of more than a quarter of a century, these grants were finally rejected, or confirmed and patented by the Government: that since their confirmation and patent we have regarded them as finally settled; that at this time probably more than one-half of the population of the State is located upon, and more than one-half the wealth embraced, in these grants; that the lands covered by them have almost entirely passed into the hands of purchasers under the patents; that any action on the part of the Government by which confidence in the stability of these titles is impaired, tends greatly to the injury of the people located upon them, and also to retard the prosperity of the State by preventing improvements and transfers of land.

We beg further to represent that Attorneys-General of the United States have during the past few years allowed the name of the United States to be used as plaintiff in suits brought to set aside a number of these patents; that five of these suits have already been tried and all decided adversely to the United States; that in three of which suits the decisions have been affirmed by the United States Supreme Court.

We beg further respectfully to represent that these Spanish and Mexican grants have been investigated on their merits by the land commission, a tribunal specially appointed to try them, and also by the United States Courts; that in the proceedings before these tribunals the United States were represented by able counsel, and that after confirmation these grants have been surveyed and patented by the sworn officers of the Government; that the witnesses whose testimony was given in these proceedings before the land commission and the courts are nearly all deceased or their whereabouts are unknown; that there is not at this time the same means of reaching a just decision as existed thirty years ago; that a relitigation of these cases at this time would, for the reasons above stated, most probably result in more error than could be discovered or corrected; that we believe, therefore, and most respectfully represent that the use of the name of the United States in these suits is against public policy, as it certainly is against the progress, prosperity, and happiness of the people of this State.

Evans.

Now, as is represented by the governor, by all the leading members of the bar of California, and by all the settlers, and it ought to be well known here, there has been nearly forty years of litigation to settle the land titles in California. Here are five cases reported by the Attorney-General wherein he authorized suits to be commenced some years ago and the suits have not yet been commenced, but he says he is going on with them, that he has authorized private counsel in California to commence the suits. There are many thousand people living on the lands which are bordering on San Francisco and some of the patents are more than thirty years old. The Attorney-General never has investigated the matter himself. He can not shift the responsibility upon the Interior Department. There is no time there to investigate. If the Secretaries have signed the recommendations of the subordinate officers, they have not examined them. There has been no notice to those people who are living on the lands and their titles are clouded by these suits brought thirty years after the patents were granted following long and laborious litigation.

There are over 8,000,000 acres of land patented, and suits may be brought against the whole. They were all contested, and there are plenty of men who will make complaints if they can get suits brought, because these suits are a terrible weapon. They cloud the title to the land, keep it out of the market, and destroy innocent parties who have invested their money and have their property tied up for a term of years. Here are five suits for five important grants immediately about San Francisco, named in this report. The proposed suits to be commenced, and which he says he is going to have commenced, are United States vs. San Raymundo Grant; United States vs. Las Pulgas Grant; United States vs. Rancho Corte de Madera del Presidio; United States vs. Buri-Buri Rancho; United States vs. Cañada de Guadalupe la Visitacion y Rodeo Viejo.

These grants include many of the most beautiful suburbs of San Francisco. The Attorney-General never has called on the citizens owning the grants to show cause why suits should not be begun. These protests have been sent in by the governor and by the leading members of the bar of California. The suits are delayed for years, and then the Attorney-General tells us he has authorized Wiggington, Stewart, and Van Shaick to prosecute free of charge, without compensation from the Government, without informing the Senate by whom or why they are compensated, and the United States is humiliated by going into court as a pauper, asking only to be saved harmless from costs. The Attorney-General has no right to place the United States in a position of calling for volunteer services of attorneys, and also of calling upon private parties to pay the costs if the United States has got any interest in the proceedings. The United States is able to employ its own attorneys and pay its own costs if its rights are involved.

The Attorney-General assumes that he is protecting the interests of the United States, because he required bonds for costs and secured the services of attorneys for nothing. It seems that any person who is willing to act as an informer and make a complaint against old land titles, against a community that has been settled on it for years, can get a hearing and have a suit brought against innocent parties and destroy them and tie up their property for years by giving bond to the United States that he will pay the costs. I say that in any suit which the United States ought to bring the United States is able to pay its own costs; and if it has not sufficient interest to pay its own costs it ought not to be used as an instrument of oppression to destroy the title of innocent parties.

I think there has been no outrage in the whole history of California equal to reopening this litigation. The title of every person who owns a foot of land derived from Mexican land grants is put in jeopardy. He does not know what day A, B, or C may be authorized by giving bond to commence suit and cloud his title. I say that the Attorney-General ought to have called on these parties and have given them some hearing before he proceeded in this arbitrary manner, and he can not shift the responsibility on the Interior Department. He is the responsible head of the Department of Justice. The Interior Department has no right or jurisdiction over the matter. After the patent has been granted the Interior Department has held over and over again that its jurisdiction has ceased. It has no more right to interfere after its jurisdiction has ceased and after patent has been issued than any other stranger to the proceedings.

A patent is the highest evidence of title that the Government of the United States can give. After patent issued and actual residence upon these lands for over thirty years, the question of title is not pending in the Interior Department. That Department has no right to communicate with the Attorney-General on the subject. He only has a right to listen to the Interior Department in matters where that Department has jurisdiction. That Department has ruled over and over again that it can do nothing after a matter has been finally determined and a patent issued under the authority of a former Secretary of the Interior. If it has no jurisdiction it has no right to advise in the matter.

It is only in those matters that are sub judice in the Interior Department that it has a right to call on the Attorney-General for advice. Where it has no jurisdiction it has no right to call for or give advice. The Attorney-General alone has the power to instigate suits, and with the power rests the responsibility. This the Supreme Court has decided. In a proper case where the interests of the United States are to be protected, in a case where it is for the interest of the United States, this great power is conferred upon him and him alone. He is the only party having this jurisdiction; and I say with such enormous jurisdiction as this, if he brings suit against any citizen of the United States who has received a patent from the Government, no matter in what State, Congress has a right to inquire why he does it. Having such enormous power, it is not presumed that any Attorney-General would abuse it. The Supreme Court would not presume such abuse possible, or that an Attorney-General would exercise it without due caution and investigation, consequently did not deny its existence. If the Attorney-General had examined these cases and prosecuted them himself, or ordered their prosecution by attorneys paid by the Government and responsible to the Government, and not farm them out to Wiggington & Co. to harass innocent purchasers, the question would be different and would be what the Supreme Court intended when it recognized the existence of the power.

In the list of cases returned in the letter of the Attorney-General it appears that sixteen cases to set aside land-patents have been authorized where the attorneys bringing and conducting the suits are to receive no compensation from the Government, but he does not inform us whether he has required security for costs in other than the cases located immediately about the Bay of San Francisco.

Some ten years ago the Attorney-General inadvertently authorized one John B. Howard to bring several suits; in fact, clothed him with a kind of roving commission to bring suit to set aside patents. He brought the celebrated Thockmorten and Flint suits and several others. The courts below decided against him; the Supreme Court of the United States also decided against him and reprimanded the unlimited exercise of such power; they condemned the practice in the strongest possible terms. There have been five or six other suits, and they have all been lost. The United States have never gained one, and how should they gain one after these cases have been tried in the tribunals created under the Government with able counsel to defend the rights of the United States?

There was in the beginning a commission appointed consisting of eminent men. It was a commission against whom there never has been a word of scandal. R. Augustus Thompson, Hiland Hall, Alpheus Felch, and others of the very highest character composed the commission. Men higher in character were never appointed in any instance. They heard and determined all these California land claims. The cases were then turned over to the district court of the United States, and whoever desired could appear there and defend his title.

All these cases were then brought to the Supreme Court of the United States unless the Attorney-General stopped the appeals. It took affirmative action on the part of the Attorney-General to prevent their being sent to that court.

They came here; they went through this tribunal sitting in the Capitol; they were carefully examined. After this the location became an important matter. Surveys and locations were determined for a time by the Interior Department. The matter was then turned over to the courts, and then again back to the Interior Department, and after final decision no patent was ever issued until after long delay in determining the location of the grant. The average delay after the final decision was from ten to fifteen years in securing a patent. And finally, when it was all done and California commenced to prosper and the people commenced to buy their titles, and after six or eight hundred thousand people became innocent occupants on these lands, relying on the patent of the Government as the highest source of title, John Doe or Richard Roe, or whoever he may be, comes to the Interior Department and that Department sends a letter to the Attorney-General and the Attorney-General proceeds to authorize strangers to reopen all this and throw that growing country into despair and cloud its titles. The people there have relied on these titles. If they have borrowed money on them, or are under the necessity of disposing of their property to meet obligations, they are destroyed. The titles have been clouded now for about two years by the threat of the Attorney-General to bring the five suits above named. Before they can be finally decided it will take from five to ten years more. These lawyers who charge nothing to the Government realize the advantage of clouding the title to thousands of acres of the most valuable land in California, including her most beautiful towns and cities, for this long period. Why did not the people owning these lands have an opportunity to show cause why this should not be done?

I say that the Attorney-General is very remiss in this matter, and whatever he or his friends may think here, the people who know the facts—the 800,000 people living on these lands, who have bought them in good faith on the strength of the patent of the United States, after thirty or forty years' litigation in the tribunals appointed by the Government—have just reason for complaint. I say if their titles are to be ruthlessly clouded in this way they will feel aggrieved, and it is an exercise of power that no officer of the Government ought to assume without further action of Congress. I alluded to this matter myself; I regarded it as one of the greatest abuses of the time; for if there is anything essential to the prosperity, peace, and happiness of a community it is the settlement and stability of land titles; but if the patents when issued by the Government are to be treated so lightly as this Attorney-General does, from the list presented to us, what security or safety is there in a country claiming to be a government of law? Verily the Attorney-General is converting it into a government of tyrannical discretion.

I do not know the merits of the other cases. I only know the merits of those affecting the Spanish land claims.

The Senator thinks that I ought not to speak of this because it does not happen to be in the State of Nevada. I have a right to speak of it anywhere when it affects any citizen of the United States, whether he be in my State or elsewhere, and the Senator assumes the same right. These persons are citizens of the United States, and this is the Senate of the United States, and it is our duty to see that the laws are properly guarded, and that further legislation shall be had if it is necessary, that inquiry shall be had into its necessity. I know about these land titles. I have seen all this litigation. I know how it has been conducted and that the Senators from California concur with me. They are in full accord with me, and the Representatives from California, of all parties, are in full accord with me. There is not a citizen of California that has any interest in that country who is not in accord with me. We all want the general prosperity of the country, and I say that if land titles can be clouded by a suit by the Attorney-General to land occupied by thousands of men after thirty years of peaceable possession, after thirty years' ownership, after patent granted, without a hearing, this is a Government of discretion and not of law.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada what he understands to be the interest of those persons who give security to pay the costs. What interest have they in these proceedings?

Mr. STEWART. They expect to get the land; or, if they do not get the land, they expect that the owners of the land will buy them off, so that they will allow the suits to be discontinued.

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator understand that these suits are instituted at the request of the persons who are now giving security for costs?

Mr. STEWART. Entirely at their request. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. How does the Senator understand that?

Mr. STEWART. Because their petitions in the Land Department show it, because the same attorneys appear, and in the San Jacinto case the petition for the suit was made and security and lawyers employed by one Baker, of Los Angeles. During the whole trial no secret was made of this. Frequent propositions of compromise came from the same source. The United States had no more to do with this case than any other private litigation until it reached the Supreme Court, when the Solicitor-General appeared to give color to the proceedings. Baker was finally beaten in the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court advanced that very case on my petition, because the questions involved in it affected such vast interests. The judgment of the court below against the United States was affirmed.

If the rule laid down by the Supreme Court in that case had been followed by the Attorney-General the contemplated suits of which I complain would have been abandoned at once, and not commenced. We were in hopes that the Supreme Court would deny the power of the Attorney-General altogether, but it did not; it only qualified it. But it did not sanction the policy of the Attorney-General in authorizing private parties to prosecute their neighbors in the name of the United States. It said the Attorney-General had the power in a proper case where the United States was interested. That was all. These suits are to set aside patents on account of mislocation by the courts and the Interior Department, after exhaustive investigations in both tribunals. The validity of the patents has been affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. They must be located somewhere. The United States has sold all the surrounding land, and has no other place to locate them. How can the United States have any possible interest, then, in disturbing the inhabitants residing upon these lands? And if the United States is interested, why do third parties pay costs and prosecute them for nothing?

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Allow me to interrupt the Senator for an explanation.

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I had the letter of the Attorney General read at the Secretary's desk some time since for the purpose of trying to impress the Senate with the facts of the case, and to clear up the circumstances that surround it. The Attorney-General adds, on this very point on which the Senator is now commenting:

The Department of Justice examines the case so far as to see whether the Government has an interest in the proceedings or a fraud has been practiced on the Government and operates to its prejudice, or the Government is under obligation to some individual to make his title good by setting aside the alleged fraudulent patent, or that the duty of the Government to the public requires such action; and if, upon such examination, the Department thinks there is just reason to believe that any or all of these things exist, the application is granted and the suit ordered to be brought.

And, of course, it means "and not otherwise."

Mr. STEWART. Ah, let me say that in every case which has gone to the Supreme Court they have decided that this Government had no interest. They decided so in the San Jacinto case. These cases are not different. It is impossible for the Government to have an interest in disturbing these people and be placed under obligations to give them other lands. The whole pretense that the United States is interested is a sham. The real parties in interest are the parties that pay costs, hire counsel, and prosecute these suits for the benefit of themselves, and not the United States. Is the United States so poor, helpless, and friendless as to accept the charity of strangers in conducting official business in which the Government is interested? The Department knows that there are other claimants who have been beaten in the courts after repeated hearings. They are the parties who claim this land, and they are the parties who are bringing these suits, either with the expectation of holding the rod over a vast number of people and making them buy their peace or suffer the consequences. That is the situation. The appeals of the governor and leading attorneys of California were not sufficient to secure for the people of that State, the titles to whose homes are to be clouded by unjust litigation, a hearing before these suits were commenced.

This is the "stand and deliver" process. These people who are willing to levy blackmail are placed by the Attorney-General in the position of the robber. "Stand and deliver; sacrifice your property for ten years or buy me off;" and if the Attorney-General means to say that he has considered this, he is mistaken. He has given the matter no consideration. It is impossible. The parties owning these lands have had no hearing, and he knows it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Nevada giving way, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BERRY. I hope the Senator will allow me to make a few remarks on this matter. I shall occupy but a short time, not over five or ten minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think that I can refrain longer from making the motion. I submit the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. This matter can come up again.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three hours and thirty-four minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to inquire whether we are in legislative or executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In open executive session.

Mr. MORGAN. We do not need any legislative clerks or stenographers then. They are not officers of that session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chief Clerk will read the resolution offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the injunction of secrecy be removed from all the proceedings of the Senate in reference to the treaty with Great Britain now under consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on agreeing to the resolution?

The resolution was agreed to.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment to the river and harbor bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to submit an amendment to the river and harbor bill. It will be received, if there is no objection.

Mr. MORGAN. As in legislative session?

Mr. HARRIS. This is not a legislative session.

Mr. MORGAN. The amendment can not be received then.

Mr. HARRIS. It is open executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky asked unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRIS. Oh, by unanimous consent it can be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair received it by unanimous consent.

Mr. BECK. I desire to have the amendment referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and printed.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent to ntroduce a resolution, and I ask for its immediate consideration. It is a resolution relating to an amendment to the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? If there is none, the resolution will be read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it would be better to object to the reading of the resolution. We are now in executive session. The treaty is pending. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] is seeking the floor.

Mr. FRYE. I rise to address the Senate on the pending treaty.

Mr. CULLOM. It is now a late hour of the afternoon. I take it for granted the Senator from Maine would prefer not to proceed with his address to-night. So I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator to allow this resolution to be referred.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to that, if it is in order.

Mr. CALL. I ask that it be read and referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the reception of a message from the House of Representatives?

Mr. HARRIS. Of course not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears none. The Senate will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. 87) authorizing and directing the payment of the salaries of the officers and employés of Congress for the month of May, 1888.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. CULLOM. I insist on my motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator withdraw the motion for a moment?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose in making up the Journal these matters which have passed by unanimous consent will be journalized as having taken place in ordinary legislative session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In legislative session.

Mr. HOAR. It will be so ordered by the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so recorded.

Mr. FRYE. Am I recognized as having the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine is recognized as entitled to the floor on the pending treaty.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CULLOM. Let us adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CALL. I understood the Senator from Illinois to consent that my resolution might be read and referred to a committee. I ask that that may be done. It will take but a moment.

Mr. CULLOM. If the resolution is before the Senate I have no objection to having it referred. I have no objection to anything being done in order.

Mr. MORGAN (to Mr. CULLOM). I wish to know whether we are to adjourn to meet in legislative or in executive session.

Mr. CULLOM. I suppose the Chair will state that. I suppose that when the Senate adjourns it will be to meet in legislative session to-morrow. I should like to inquire whether that will be the case or not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is for the Senate to take such action as it pleases.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Illinois to withhold his motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, May 29, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 28, 1888.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

RECOMMITTED.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks that the bill H. R. 6300, which has been reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions with an adverse report, be recommitted to that committee. In the absence of objection the bill will be recommitted.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WEAVER. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar for present consideration the bill——

Mr. FORNEY. I demand the regular order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to make a privileged motion. I desire to have a rule adopted assigning one hour each day after the reading of the Journal for the consideration of business by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. That is not a privileged matter. It is a change of the rules of the House. It would require unanimous consent, but may be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to offer a resolution making that change of the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send it to the desk.

Mr. FORNEY. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] will be pending. The regular order is the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and resolutions.

NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL INSTITUTE, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. FORNEY introduced a bill (H. R. 10177) to incorporate the trustees of the National Industrial Institute, in Washington, D. C.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Education, and ordered to be printed.

FELIX A. MATHEWS.

Mr. MCKENNA introduced a bill (H. R. 10178) for the relief of Felix A. Mathews; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES DAM AT ROCK ISLAND ARSENAL.

Mr. GEST introduced a bill (H. R. 10179) for the rebuilding of the Government stone dam at Rock Island Arsenal, and for the immediate construction of a temporary dam; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GEST also submitted a resolution of inquiry addressed to the Secretary of War, concerning the destruction of the United States dam at Rock Island arsenal; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LODGE introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 178) granting leave of absence without loss of pay to certain persons employed in the service of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and ordered to be printed.

LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

Mr. BUCHANAN presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of New Jersey, urging the enactment of a law providing for the relief of persons who lose their lives or become disabled in the Life-Saving Service of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, introduced a bill (H. R. 10180) to amend section 216 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

ATTORNEYS IN DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

Mr. CULBERSON (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. 10181) to equalize the pay of attorneys in the Department of Justice; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, and ordered to be printed.

ASSIGNMENT OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CULBERSON submitted a resolution providing for the assignment of business; which was referred to the Committee on Rules.

WITNESSES.

Mr. LEE (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. 10182) to amend an act entitled "An act to make persons charged with crimes and offenses competent witnesses in the United States and Territorial courts," approved March 16, 1878, which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

LIGHT-HOUSE AT GREAT ROUND SHOAL.

Mr. DAVIS introduced a bill (H. R. 10183) to establish a light-ship off Great Round Shoal, near Nantucket, Mass.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

CO-OPERATION.

Mr. MORROW introduced a bill (H. R. 10184) to encourage co-operation and to provide for the formation of associations in the District of Columbia for the purpose of conducting any lawful business and dividing the profits among the members thereof; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BROWER submitted a resolution to relieve the Committee on Ways and Means from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 1695) to repeal the tax on tobacco, and to set apart Tuesday, June 12, for the consideration of said resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BROWER also submitted a resolution to relieve the Committee on Education from the further consideration of the bill (S. 371) for the establishment and temporary support of common schools, and to set apart June 26 for the consideration of said bill; which was referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to offer for present consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections. But the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] has demanded the regular order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope the gentleman will not urge the regular order against this resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That after the reading of the Journal and the reference of business on the Speaker's table each day, there shall be one-half hour allowed for the consideration of measures on the Calendars by unanimous consent, and in recognizing members to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of business the Speaker shall proceed as follows: He shall call five names, beginning at the first name on the roll, and when they shall have been called he shall then call five names, beginning at the last name on the roll, alternating in this manner until every member shall have been called: Provided, That no member who has once been called shall be again recognized until every name shall have been called: And provided further, That the Speaker shall not entertain any motion for unanimous consent to consider any measure except during the half hour above provided.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MILLS. Let it go to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not want it to go to the Committee on Rules. I withdraw the resolution.

POST-OFFICE, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. RICHARDSON introduced a bill (H. R. 10185) to select a site and for the erection of a post-office building in the city of Washington, D. C.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

EX-SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

Mr. CHEADLE (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. 10186) to retire ex-soldiers and sailors who have been wounded in battle, after twenty-one years' service in the civil service, and providing salaries therefor; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. FORNEY. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of general appropriation bills, and I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen having reports to offer may be allowed to file them with the Clerk and have them referred in the usual manner.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I object. I tried all day Saturday to get a chance to report a bill which would not have taken more than a quarter of a minute, but I was knocked out in a way that savored more of brutality than anything else.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] accompanies his motion with a request for unanimous consent that members having reports to present may be allowed to hand them to the Clerk and have them referred to the appropriate committees.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I object. I offered to do that on Saturday, but I was refused an opportunity to present my report, and I insist now on the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] to dispense with the morning hour, which requires a two-thirds vote.

The question was taken by a viva voce vote, and the Speaker declared that he was unable to determine whether two-thirds had voted in the affirmative or not.

Mr. FORNEY. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 70, noes 25.

Mr. GROSVENOR. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] whether he will not withdraw his objection if consent is given that members may file their reports.

Mr. GROSVENOR. No, sir. I undertook on Saturday afternoon to make a report that I have been holding for more than a week, and I had been recognized by the Speaker for the purpose of presenting it, when the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] knocked me out as if I were a dumb brute rather than a man, and I then made up my mind that I would insist upon the regular order.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all members having reports to present may be permitted to file them with the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. That request was made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY], but the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] objected.

Mr. FORNEY. I withdraw my motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama withdraws his motion, and the Chair will call the committees.

WATER-RESERVE LANDS IN WISCONSIN.

Mr. GROSVENOR, from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 1880) declaring that certain water-reserve lands in the State of Wisconsin are and have been subject to the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States," approved March 3, 1875; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL CEMETERY, SALISBURY, N. C.

Mr. FORD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported, as a substitute for the bill H. R. 1706, to provide for grading and paving approaches to the national cemetery near Salisbury, N. C., a bill (H. R. 10187) to provide for grading and paving approaches to the national cemetery near Salisbury, N. C.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The original bill (H. R. 1706) was laid on the table.

PUBLIC BUILDING, TAUNTON, MASS.

Mr. SOWDEN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported, as a substitute for the bill H. R. 7746, a bill (H. R. 10188) for the erection of a public building at Taunton, Mass.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The original bill (H. R. 7746) was laid on the table.

ELIZABETH BAUER.

On motion of Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio, the bill (S. 981) granting a pension to Elizabeth Bauer, previously reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, was recommitted to the committee.

ARREARS OF PENSIONS.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, filed the views of the minority of the Committee on Invalid Pension upon the bill (H. R. 9161) in relation to arrears of pensions; which were ordered to be printed with the report of the committee.

MALINDA HARDIN.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 9729) granting a pension to Malinda Hardin; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RALPH P. WILBORN.

Mr. HUNTER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 9733) granting a pension to Ralph P. Wilborn; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SARAH RIDDLE.

Mr. HUNTER also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 9732) granting a pension to Sarah Riddle; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SECTION 4787, REVISED STATUTES.

On motion of Mr. MATSON, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7435) to amend section 4787 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MINOR CHILDREN OF JOSEPH SAWYER.

Mr. BLISS, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10126) for the relief of the minor children of Joseph Sawyer, deceased; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BENJAMIN HENDERSON.

Mr. BLISS also, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 8923) for the relief of Benjamin Henderson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM THOMPSON.

Mr. BLISS also, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 2222) granting a pension to William Thompson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. LAURA HOOPER DENBY.

Mr. BLISS also, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1760) to increase the pension of Mrs. Laura Hooper Denby; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUTTON, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back bills of the following titles; which were laid on the table:

A bill (H. R. 1585) to amend the act entitled "An act granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes," so as to dispense with the provision which requires that the claimant or widow of the officer or enlisted man shall be sixty-two years of age before they can claim the benefit of said act;

A bill (H. R. 1754) to amend an act entitled "An act granting pensions to soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war," approved January 29, 1887;

A bill (H. R. 2192) granting a pension to James M. Morgan's Iowa infantry and mounted volunteers;

A bill (H. R. 4371) to amend the pension laws by placing on the pension-rolls teamsters who were in active service during the Mexican war;

A bill (H. R. 4403) to amend section 2 of an act of Congress entitled "An act granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes," approved January 29, 1887;

A bill (H. R. 5036) to amend the act granting pensions to the surviving soldiers of the Mexican war;

A bill (H. R. 5620) granting pensions to teamsters employed in the Quartermaster's Department during the Mexican war;

A bill (H. R. 5678) amendatory of and supplementary to "An act granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes," approved January 29, 1887;

A bill (H. R. 6112) granting a pension to all persons who served as teamsters in the military service of the United States during the Mexican war;

A bill (H. R. 6830) to place upon the pension-roll members of Gray's Battalion of United States Volunteers of the Mexican war;

A bill (H. R. 7224) to extend to certain volunteers in the Mexican war the benefit of the act of January 29, 1887, granting pensions to soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 7741) to amend the act entitled "An act granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes," so as to dispense with the provision which requires that the claimant or widow of the officer or enlisted man shall be sixty-two years of age before they can claim the benefit of said act; and

A bill (H. R. 8379) to amend an act entitled "An act granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war," approved January 29, 1887.

PENSIONS.

He also, from the same committee, reported, in the nature of a substitute for sundry bills, a bill (H. R. 10189) amendatory of and supplementary to an act granting pensions to soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JESSE L. GARRETT.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on Pensions, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 3908) increasing the pension of Jesse L. Garrett; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

GERMAN LUTHERAN TRINITY CONGREGATION, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEMPHILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1727) to grant to the trustees of the German Lutheran Trinity Congregation, of Washington, D. C., the right to sell a portion of their cemetery lands; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DECISIONS ON PUBLIC LANDS AND PENSIONS.

Mr. RICHARDSON, from the Committee on Printing, reported back favorably the joint resolution (H. Res. 101) providing for the printing of the decisions of the Department of the Interior regarding public lands and pensions for sale; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF LIEUTENANT ROGERS ON PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. RICHARDSON also, from the Committee on Printing, reported back favorably a resolution introduced by Mr. WHITTHORNE February 17, 1888, providing for printing the report of Lieut. Charles C. Rogers, United States Navy, on the Panama Canal; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MAPS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. RICHARDSON also, from the Committee on Printing, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 6652) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be printed maps of the United States in book form; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF GEORGE M'DOUGALL.

On motion of Mr. FORNEY, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Appropriations was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1171) for the relief of the legal representatives of George McDougall, deceased; and the same was referred to the Committee on Claims.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF WAR.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 10190) providing for an Assistant Secretary of War; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, NORFOLK, VA.

Mr. SOWDEN, by unanimous consent, reported back favorably from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds the bill (S. 2164) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Norfolk, in the State of Virginia; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN C. FRÉMONT.

Mr. SPINOLA, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 9919) authorizing the President to appoint and retire John C. Frémont as a major-general in the United States Army; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEELE. I ask unanimous consent to file the views of a minority of the Committee on Military Affairs on the bill just reported.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, leave will be granted to file the views of the minority, to be printed with the report of the committee.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

REFUND OF NATIONAL DEBT.

Mr. PLUMB, by unanimous consent (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. 10191) to provide for issuing bonds to refund the national debt, and to amend the laws relating to national-bank issues; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FORNEY. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. BLOUNT in the chair).

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of general appropriation bills. When the committee was last in session it had under consideration the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; and the Clerk will report the pending paragraph.

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Chairman, when the committee was last in session, I had made a point of order against that portion of the bill appropriating $3,600 for the salary of the First Auditor of the Treasury. That point of order being sustained, I presume its effect is to leave a blank in the appropriation, and the object of the amendment I now send to the desk is to insert in that blank the sum which is fixed by existing law for the compensation of that official.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 9, page 30, insert "four thousand" between the words "Treasury" and "dollars;" making it read, "First Auditor of the Treasury, $4,000."

Mr. FORNEY. I move to amend by striking out "four thousand" and inserting "three thousand six hundred."

Mr. CRAIN. Against that I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, the House seems to be in a strange state of confusion in connection with this subject. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama, which is in harmony with the united judgment of the Committee on Appropriations, as far as we know, is to be debarred on the point of order from continuing the salary of the First Auditor at $3,600, which it has been since the Forty-fourth Congress. For more than twelve years the salary has been $3,600; but by ingenuity of points of order in this way we are compelled, as it were, against the judgment and recommendations of the Committee on Appropriations and, as I think, against public policy—we are driven to give $4,000 when we only desire to give $3,600. This is neither common sense, nor do I believe it is a logical construction of the rule.

Mr. DOCKERY. Before the gentleman from Pennsylvania takes his seat I wish to ask if the same point of order would not apply to all of these auditors?

Mr. RANDALL. It will, and not only to those but to some two hundred and thirty other salaries provided for in the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. It would refer to all the salaries under the Government.

Mr. DOCKERY. It increases the salaries of these officials to the same amounts fixed in the appropriation bills by Republican Congresses.

Mr. CRAIN. I make the point of order that there is nothing before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs the attention of the Committee on the point of order.

First, the Chair desires to call the attention of the Committee to the first paragraph embodied in this bill:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full compensation for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, for the objects hereinafter expressed—

Then, on page 30, one of the objects covered by the paragraph I have just read is expressed in these words:

For the First Auditor of the Treasury, $3,600.

Now, then, it is conceded in this debate that the general law prescribes what the salary of the First Auditor of the Treasury shall be, namely, $4,000. The effect of this provision of the bill, therefore, should it be adopted, for the next fiscal year will be to reduce the amount of that salary by the sum of $400 for the year.

The Supreme Court of the United States—and the Chair will simply refer to the decision without reading it—in the case of The United States vs. Fisher (109 United States Reports, page 143), presents this syllabus:

When Congress appropriates in full compensation for the salary of a public officer, the incumbent can not recover an additional sum in the Court of Claims, notwithstanding the prior statute fixes the salary at a larger amount than the sum so appropriated. In such case the earlier act is suspended for the time covered by the appropriation.

Now, then, the Chair understands that Rule XXI of the House prescribes that the Committee on Appropriations may not introduce legislation except with certain qualifications. In view of the fact that the rules of the preceding Congress permitted reductions in cases of salaries of employés, which reductions are inhibited by the present rules, the Chair can see no other purpose in the rule under which we are now operating than to restrain the Committee on Appropriations from increasing the salary of an official of the Government or decreasing it; and if, by reason of the rules of the House, there should seem to be something therein not strictly logical, or in the minds of some gentlemen, "wanting in common sense," the present occupant of the chair declines to be responsible.

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve the right to appeal from that decision on the point of order.

Mr. CRAIN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask the attention of the Chair for a moment, whether the words "in full compensation" have been stricken from the bill on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. They are yet in the bill.

Mr. CRAIN. And that is the reason I make the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. Now is not the decision of the Supreme Court, cited by the Chair, exactly in harmony with the idea entertained by the committee, that the committee has a right to fix these salaries?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands it exactly the other way. The Chair understands the Supreme Court to decide that you may suspend the operation of the salary for a given year, and that such suspension is binding upon the incumbent of the office, where the bill provides that the salary so fixed shall be in full compensation.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not understand that these words in the bill are subject to the objection that they change existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. That is exactly the reason. They do change existing law. If the gentleman will take the words "in full compensation" and apply it to the salary of the First Auditor as fixed in the bill, he will see that it not only reduces the amount of the salary covered by the general statute in this bill, but it declares that that compensation shall be in full compensation for the year, and to that extent this appropriation bill for the next fiscal year repeals the statute.

Mr. RANDALL. We have been doing that for twelve years.

Mr. WEAVER. This rule has not existed for twelve years.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been stated that this has been done for ten or twelve years, but the Chair will state in this connection that under the rules of the House it was competent to reduce a salary until the rules of last Congress prohibited even that.

Mr. DUNN. Will the Chair permit me to make a statement in that connection?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. DUNN. I do not understand that the language "in full compensation" standing alone is a violation of the rules of the House; but when coupled with a paragraph which changes the salary fixed by law it is a violation of the rule; and when you strike out a paragraph changing a salary you have relieved the words from any obnoxious violation of the rule, and it does not appear to me that it is necessary for those words "in full compensation" to go out.

Mr. CRAIN. I do not want them to go out.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOCKERY. If the point of order now made against the words "in full compensation" should be sustained and they were stricken out, my inquiry is whether or not a point of order such as the gentleman from Texas has made as against this paragraph would then obtain?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not decide a case until it arises.

Mr. DOCKERY. I want to suggest this, whether in the interest of real economy, if the words "in full compensation" were stricken out, the House could then fix any amount it chose?

Mr. TAULBEE. Allow me——

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Has the point of order been disposed of by the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has made a ruling.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Then would it be in order for me to call for the regular order? I do so.

Mr. TAULBEE. The question I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri is this——

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. TAULBEE. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. HOLMAN. In connection with that appeal let me say this: You can not reduce the appropriation below the amount provided by general law.

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a question of order. I was temporarily called out of the Hall. I would like the Chair to state again what the point was on which he ruled.

Mr. LONG. Before that is done may I make a parliamentary inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONG. At the beginning of the five minutes' debate the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] raised the point of order that the words "in full compensation" were a change of existing law. I understood the Chair to respond that he would consider that question and determine it at a later stage in the bill. Has the Chair disposed of that point of order raised by the gentleman from Minnesota?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not made any decision on that point of order.

Mr. LONG. May I ask if that point of order is now pending? And if it is now reached for the first time, may we not ask for a ruling of the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule upon that point of order directly, if the gentleman desires it.

Mr. LONG. I would certainly desire the determination of that point of order as being fundamental to the point of order now pending.

Mr. TAULBEE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG] whether or not in the event the point of order raised by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] to which he has referred in regard to the language in the first paragraph of the bill—whether, if that point of order should be sustained and those words should be stricken from the bill, then is it not a fact that under the ruling of the Chair heretofore the point of order raised by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN] would be overruled?

Mr. LONG. That is my impression.

Mr. TAULBEE. I desire to ask, as a parliamentary question, if this deprives the First Auditor of the Treasury of the power of collecting before the Court of Claims $400 of his salary?

Mr. LONG. Not at all.

Mr. TAULBEE. Then is it real economy to do this?

Mr. MCCREARY. I am in favor of economy, and as a general rule I go with the Committee on Appropriations, because they generally digest and thoroughly examine everything which they bring into this House. But the question now is upon an appeal taken from the decision of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole; and the question for us to determine now is whether the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole has decided the point of order correctly. I contend that the decision of the Chair is in accordance with parliamentary law. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN] made the point of order that the bill reported by the committee provides for a salary of only $3,600 for the next year as the compensation of the First Auditor. Now, sir, the general law, which I hold in my hand, provides that the pay of the First Auditor of the Treasury shall be $4,000 per annum.

That is, therefore, the general law. Now what are the rules of this House on that subject? Rule XXI, subsection 3, provides that—

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriation for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

This is a general appropriation bill which we are now considering, and the rules provide that no provision changing existing law shall be in order in any general appropriation bill. As the general law provides that the salary of the First Auditor shall be $4,000, I say that under the rules of this House the point of order made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN] was well taken, and was properly sustained by the Chair.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] holds that we can not reduce an amount in an appropriation bill.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word in reference to the ruling of the Chair, from which I understand there has been an appeal. I speak only of the ruling, not of the propriety of the rule, nor of the propriety of the point of order. We may differ as to the propriety of the rule, which was changed in the last Congress and readopted in this Congress. Unquestionably, prior to the last Congress, for substantially ten years, this provision in the bill was in order; but when you have the rule changed so as to prohibit legislation of all kinds upon an appropriation bill, whether it reduces or whether it increases expenditures, when you consult the law, which fixes this salary of $4,000, and then consult the bill, which fixes the salary at $3,600 "in full compensation," there can be no question but that upon the point as presented the ruling of the Chair is correct.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I am unalterably opposed to the effect of this point of order; but that does not blind me to the fact that the Chair is clearly correct in his ruling upon the point under the rules of the House as just cited by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY]. When you take the two together, the provision that this is "in full compensation," and the salary of the First Auditor, as fixed by law—when those two things are taken together as the Chair has taken them, it is clear that no amendment changing existing law is in order upon this bill.

Mr. LONG. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. DOCKERY. Yes, sir.

Mr. LONG. Suppose the Chair should decide upon the point raised by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] that the words "in full compensation" must be stricken out, would the gentleman then claim that the point of order of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN] should be sustained?

Mr. DOCKERY. In that case I do not think that the point of order would be well taken, and for that reason I made a parliamentary inquiry when the debate first began, not having been present when the House commenced the consideration of the bill, whether the Chair could not now decide the point of order raised by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], I understand, as affecting the words "in full compensation." If the words "in full compensation" are allowed to remain in the bill as applied to the salary of the First Auditor, I think the Chair is unquestionably correct, but if those words were struck out, I do not think the rule would stand.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, I agree fully with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], who has just taken his seat, as to the correctness of the ruling of the Chair. Furthermore, let me say the words "in full compensation" can not be struck out on a point of order, because they do not change existing law. Unless something follows those words which changes the compensation they are in accordance with existing law, because the presumption is that the committee will appropriate the amount prescribed by law. Suppose the committee had appropriated the amount provided by law, $4,000, and had also inserted the words "in full compensation," would those words have been subject to the point of order? Certainly not, because there would have been nothing in the bill changing existing law. In themselves, they are simply qualifying words, but being followed by the amount, "$3,600," the two things taken together do change existing law, and where the Chair, by sustaining the point of order, strikes out "$3,600," then they are in harmony and there is no change of existing law.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the appeal until the Chair decides on the first point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN].

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HERBERT. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry, in the first place, and to address myself to what I understand to be the pending point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no pending point of order. If the gentleman has a parliamentary inquiry to make, the Chair will hear him, but if he rises for the purpose of discussing the point of order, that matter has been disposed of.

Mr. HERBERT. I understood the Chair to say, in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LONG], that a point of order had been made upon the words just cited when they were reached, and that the Chair had at that time reserved the point to be decided at the proper time. Did the Chair answer in that way?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not care to take up that matter just here, but will do so when it is reached in its order.

Mr. HERBERT. But my inquiry is, did the Chair answer in that way?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair announced that whenever the Committee of the Whole reached any section or paragraph of the bill which, coupled with the clause "in full compensation," would operate as a repeal of existing law, the Chair would consider the question.

Mr. HERBERT. Now, then——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not desire the discussion to go on in this irregular way. The pending question is on the amendment.

Mr. HERBERT. I desire to insist that that point of order does arise at this time, and to address myself to it.

Mr. CRAIN. I make the point of order that the words "in full compensation" can not now be stricken out on a point of order, because my amendment is in accordance with existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT]. The question is now on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas. All in favor of that amendment——

Mr. HERBERT. I address myself then to that amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I understood the Chair to say that he would be ready to decide the point of order reserved as to the clause "in full compensation," whenever a decision should become necessary or desirable as bearing upon any point of order pending or likely to arise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so announced. The Chair thinks that he has in effect ruled already——

Mr. RANDALL. If the Chair has ruled on those words, will the Chair tell us whether they are left in or struck out?

Mr. HERBERT. What I insist is that this is the proper time——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order of the gentleman from Alabama. If, however, the House desires to understand the status of this matter the Chair will, notwithstanding it may not be exactly in order, state his views upon it.

Mr. HERBERT. But I desire to address myself to this point of order. I wish to insist—and I ask the Chair to hear me—that this is a proper time at which to decide upon the point first reserved by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] some days ago; and I wish the Chair to hear me on that point.

Mr. RANDALL. I understood the Chair to say a moment ago that he would make such a decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, if it be desired, will make an announcement at this time as to his views in reference to this matter.

Mr. PAYSON. I rise to a point of order. It is impossible to hear what the Chair is saying. This is an important matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that any opinion now——

Mr. HERBERT. I would like to be heard on this point of order before the Chair decides it.

The CHAIRMAN. The business of the House must proceed, and the Chair must exercise due discretion in the matter of hearing discussion.

Mr. HERBERT. I do not understand the Chair to have decided whether the words "in full compensation" shall be stricken out on a point of order or not. If the Chair has not decided that point, I wish to be heard upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. And the Chair is not willing to hear argument at this time.

Mr. TAULBEE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to know—and on this point I ask the attention of the gentleman from Alabama—whether the parliamentary status of this controversy is not that the point of order upon this clause of the bill fixing the compensation of the First Auditor at $3,600 was sustained by the Chair. Then the question recurred upon the amendment of the gentleman from Texas proposing to insert the words "four thousand dollars." I submit that that amendment is the pending business; and the words in the first clause of the bill, upon which the point of order of the gentleman from Minnesota was made, are not, when taken in connection with the pending amendment, obnoxious to the point of order, for they do not change existing law. Therefore the point of order insisted on by the gentleman from Alabama is not correctly taken.

Mr. HERBERT. The Chair has not heard my point yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asks gentlemen to hear him for a moment, so that this matter may be satisfactorily disposed of. The Chair is perfectly willing to hear the gentleman from Alabama in due time. If the question had been raised on the language "in full compensation" before the Chair had ruled on the amount, the Chair would have made a ruling as to that language in that connection. But that question was not presented for decision until after the Chair had made a ruling on the amount, and there is no change of existing law when the language "in full compensation" is used in connection with the amount of salary required by law. If, hereafter, when any salary shall have been reduced by the bill below the amount required by existing law, any gentleman shall see fit to raise that question of order the Chair will rule upon it. At present, there is nothing for the Chair to rule upon, and it would be a mere waste of time, when no question of order is pending, for the Chair to make a ruling.

Mr. DINGLEY. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Did I understand the Chair to say that no point of order was made against the words "in full compensation" until after the decision had been made on the question raised on the words "thirty-six hundred?" If that was the statement of the Chair, I desire to say that gentlemen made the point of order against the words "in full compensation," and the Chair reserved that point for decision until a particular salary should be reached.

The CHAIRMAN. The question was not raised in connection with this paragraph.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] made the point of order, and I renewed the point.

The CHAIRMAN. On this paragraph?

Mr. DINGLEY. On the words "in full compensation," as connected with this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman state that he made the point in connection with this paragraph as to the First Auditor?

Mr. DINGLEY. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not so remember; but, accepting the statement of the gentleman, the Chair is ready to rule on that question.

Mr. CANNON. I think the gentleman from Maine does not understand the position of the Chair. I believe the gentleman from Maine made the point of order on the words "in full compensation" when they were originally read.

Mr. DINGLEY. The point was made by the gentleman from Minnesota when the words were first read; but subsequently when the paragraph relating to the Auditor's salary was reached I called attention to the fact that the point of order had been made previously, and I then renewed it, because the Chair had intimated that he could not rule whether the words "in full compensation" were in order or not until the question was presented in connection with some amount named in the bill; and I asked for a ruling on the point of order thus presented.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not so remember the circumstances; but will, of course, accept the statement of the gentleman from Maine, and will now make a ruling on that question.

Mr. CRAIN. In connection with the statement of the gentleman from Maine, I wish to suggest that against the gentleman's point of order I made a point that the question of order raised by myself was the question before the House, whereupon the gentleman said that this point of order had precedence, because it had been raised originally by the gentleman from Minnesota. Therefore I say he has not made his point subsequently to the original point of order. That is about the correct statement, I believe.

Mr. DINGLEY. The point of order on the words "in full compensation for the service of the fiscal year" having been reserved until the first salary should be reached, when that was reached I asked the Chair to rule on the point of order raised against these words taken in connection with the salary reached.

Mr. CRAIN. I made the point of order when these words were first reached, as I think the gentleman from Maine will admit, because they were not in accordance with law, and the words "in full compensation" did not apply to them. I made the point that the law fixes this salary at $4,000 a year.

Mr. HERBERT. As I understand the Chair——

Mr. CRAIN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRAIN. The gentleman from Maine assuming he made the point of order——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will not make an argument on the point of order.

Mr. CRAIN. No; I do not propose to make any argument. Now, assuming for the sake of argument that the gentleman from Maine made his point of order not with reference to the point of order raised by the gentleman from Minnesota, he admits that his point of order was made after the one made by me, and therefore when the Chair decided mine the point of order raised by the gentleman necessarily fell to the ground, there being nothing left to which it could be applied.

Mr. DINGLEY. My point of order was raised by the gentleman from Minnesota before the gentleman raised his point of order.

Mr. CRAIN. You made your point of order subsequently to mine.

Mr. DINGLEY. I renewed it, or rather called the attention of the Chair to it, after you made your point of order.

Mr. CRAIN. Therefore when the Chair ruled upon my point of order yours necessarily fell.

Mr. DINGLEY. By no means.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maine state that his point of order was made subsequently to the point of order of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. DINGLEY. My point of order was made by the gentleman from Minnesota before that of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CRAIN. Your point of order was made subsequently to the point of order raised by me, and I think the record will show that to be the case.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the Chair will listen for a moment I will state the facts.

Mr. HERBERT. I believe I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend for a moment. The Chair wishes to understand the facts.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to state the facts as they occurred. When the amount of $3,600 was reached and the gentleman from Texas had made a point of order against it, I called the attention of the Chair to the fact that a point of order had been previously made by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] against the words "in full compensation," and that the Chair had reserved that point of order until a distinct salary should be reached, and I added that inasmuch as such a salary had been reached it was the duty of the Chair to decide the point of order raised by the gentleman from Minnesota and renewed by myself. Then the gentleman from Texas made the point that his point of order should be decided first. In the confusion which occurred I replied, but was not understood by the Chair, that my point had been raised by the gentleman from Minnesota and reserved, and therefore that it was the duty of the Chair to decide that point first.

Mr. CRAIN. The point raised by you?

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HERBERT. After I was taken off the floor I was about to make reference to the argument which the gentleman from Maine has made. I desire to restate that proposition. I understand these two propositions when taken together are subject to a point of order. They are separated in the bill. Neither standing by itself is subject to the point of order. When the first proposition was reached that these sums should be in full compensation, a point of order was made and reserved by the Chair until there should come a proper time for its consideration. In other words, the Chair said it would reserve the point of order until it reached some point of the bill which fixed a different salary. When such a portion of the bill was reached then the gentleman from Texas made a point of order. His point of order would have been made by itself. The point of order would have been made at either end of the proposition, but at that time the gentleman from Maine rose and called the attention of the Chair to the fact that the point had been already reserved at a previous stage of the bill, and that he had made it. It could only have been made because it was reserved when that part of the bill was reached. It was first in point of fact, and so the gentleman from Maine would have been in order in reference to the reservation of the point of order by the gentleman from Maine. Therefore, coming first in time, it is first to be considered.

That is the point made by the gentleman from Maine, and it seems to me there can be no possible answer to it. Therefore the Chair should decide the point on the first words which limited these compensations.

Mr. BLAND. I want to ask unanimous consent that this matter be postponed until we get through with the bill.

Mr. PAYSON. I object.

Mr. BLAND. But the point of order is reserved.

Mr. CRAIN. I object; let us finish it now.

Mr. PAYSON. If I can have the attention of the committee for a moment I should be glad to be heard on this point. It seems to me that this matter is very simple when the parliamentary condition of the question is fairly understood by the committee. If I understand that parliamentary situation—and if I am incorrect in my impression I shall be very glad if the Chair will correct me—all points of order originally were reserved upon the bill in a general way, and subsequently the point of order was specially reserved by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] as against the provision embodied in the first paragraph of the bill making the payments therein contained "in full compensation" for the salary. Do I understand the matter as the Chair does?

Mr. MCKENNA. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him? There is just where he makes his first mistake.

Mr. PAYSON. If I am in error in that respect I would be glad to be corrected by the Chair, because all of the discussion is based upon the assumption that the gentleman from Minnesota reserved the point of order against the words to which I have referred, "in full compensation."

Mr. MCKENNA. The point of order was made directly against it, not reserved. I repeat that is where the gentleman makes his mistake.

Mr. PAYSON. I should be glad to have a statement from the Chair.

Mr. MCKENNA. The Chair said when the point of order was made directly that it was not, in the opinion of the Chair, the proper place to make it; but that when some point in the bill was reached to which it was applicable the point could be made and would be decided. This is the first paragraph, as I understand it, to which it is applicable.

Mr. PAYSON. Well, that is the same thing.

Mr. MCKENNA. No, sir; I think not. As the gentleman states it they are substantially different.

Mr. PAYSON. Now, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the question of the reservation of this point of order and its bearing upon the remainder of the bill to which it is applicable. It is utterly immaterial whether or not the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] interposed his objection prior to or subsequent to the point of order raised by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN], and for the reason that the provision for the payment of the salary of the First Auditor is the first provision to which the point of order may properly be applied, in my judgment, in consequence of this language in the first paragraph of the bill.

Mr. MCKENNA. Now you are right.

Mr. PAYSON. Now, the Chair having reserved its decision on the point of order as against this provision in the first paragraph of the bill, to wit, the words "in full compensation," when a paragraph in the bill is reached against which that point of order can be made, the Chair is bound to consider all pending questions in reference to it. And if the decision of the question of order raised by the gentleman from Texas would be affected one way or the other by the point of order as against the first paragraph of the bill, then I hold that the Chair is bound to decide that question of order on the first paragraph of the bill, whether he be specially urged to do so or not; because, Mr. Chairman, if the provision of the bill—in full compensation—is retained in the bill, the decision of the Supreme Court to which the Chair has referred, and which is on the table before him, applies to the provision. If the words "in full compensation" are stricken from the bill, then the decision of the point of order would manifestly be based on a different ground, and another phase is presented. In either condition, therefore, I hold that the Chair is bound to decide the question of order which was reserved.

Mr. MCKENNA. I repeat that it was not reserved.

Mr. PAYSON. The Chair is bound to decide the point of order as a preliminary proceeding to the decision of any such question of order as the gentleman from Texas presents.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that we may avoid any controversy about what is an issue of fact by postponing this question until we reach the next item to which the point of order is applicable.

Mr. PAYSON. But this item is under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has disposed of the item so far as the amount is concerned.

Mr. PAYSON. Then let me make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PAYSON. Is it not in order when any point of order is reserved upon a paragraph that has been passed to ask the Chairman to rule upon the reserved question?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has just stated that he did not care to get into any controversy on a question of facts. The Chair did not understand it to be a reservation of a ruling upon the paragraph.

Mr. PAYSON. Does the Chair understand that any point of order is reserved?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the question of order was raised by the gentleman from Minnesota, but stated in response to the point that it would be better to leave it until some point was reached in the bill to which it applied.

Mr. PAYSON. I am not asking the judgment of the Chair as to what would be better, but I am asking as a matter of right, in order to avoid complications later on in the bill, as to whether it is not in order for any member of the committee to ask the judgment of the Chair, as a matter of right, at any time in the consideration of a bill, upon any reserved point of order? Upon that point I would like very much to have a statement from the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not consider this to be a matter of a reservation of the point of order——

Mr. TAULBEE. I desire to rise——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend for the present. The Chair did not understand it to be a reservation of the question of order. But the gentleman from Minnesota made a point of order on the first paragraph, and the Chair, by way of suggestion, intimated that it might be better to leave that matter alone until some point in the bill was reached where the question in connection with the language there used might be brought up on a point of order.

Mr. WEAVER. I call for the regular order.

Mr. CRAIN. I desire to make a statement. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] will admit he made his point of order after mine was made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to conclude his statement about this matter.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the Chair will permit me, I call attention to the fact that the point of order had been reserved on the words "in full compensation;" and when the gentleman from Texas raised the point of order as to this salary of $3,600 I suggested that the point of order which had been reserved should be decided first.

The CHAIRMAN. The question of order was decided in regard to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas; and the Chair thinks the committee may get out of any embarrassment in this matter, inasmuch as there are several other paragraphs to which this question would apply.

Mr. CRAIN. I ask for a vote on my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN].

Mr. DINGLEY. I would like to have it reported.

The CHAIRMAN. It is an amendment simply restoring the salary to the amount fixed by law.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is, to $4,000?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. I want to say a word on that amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to debate.

Mr. DINGLEY. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether $3,600 has not been the amount for ten years?

Mr. RANDALL. For twelve years.

Mr. DINGLEY. This is practically a proposition to pay this officer a salary of $400 more than has been paid hitherto.

Mr. CRAIN. And it is in accordance with existing law. The Committee on Appropriations have reduced the amount $400 below what is provided by law. I call for the regular order.

Mr. DINGLEY. I believe I have the floor, and I want to say, in order that the House may fully understand the question, that there are twenty or thirty officers for whom a salary of $4,000 is provided by law, but for more than ten years the amount appropriated and paid has been only $3,600. I remember some years ago, when we reached one of these items, the amount being $3,600, I made the point of order that the law provided $4,000. The point of order was overruled and the House voted to retain the salary at $3,600. I think we should either retain all those officers at $3,600 or advance them all to $4,000.

Mr. CANNON. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. CRAIN. I make the point of order that the committee was dividing and debate is not in order.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Texas was heard on this question, and I want to be heard for a moment also.

I want the committee to understand what this proposition involves. I hold in my hand a list of all the officials for whom appropriations are recommended in this bill less than what is provided by law. The amount in the aggregate reaches $67,102. I want the committee to understand another very important fact that in this statement there are office-holders who receive salaries to-day and under the terms of this bill in the aggregate $8,200 more than is provided by law.

Let me give them to you. These Auditors were reduced ten years ago from $4,000 to $3,600. The Democratic economists did this in the Forty-fourth Congress, and the papers were full of illustrations showing the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], as a great economist, in the act of making this legislation, cutting down the salaries of wicked Republican office-holders.

Mr. RANDALL. And I have not changed since.

Mr. CANNON. Since that time the gentleman from Pennsylvania has sat still in this House and seen creep back gradually restorations of the salaries of some of these men, but not as to the salaries of others. Let me give you a few of them. The Public Printer, according to the recommendation in this bill, will receive $500 more than the law provides; the Assistant Secretary of State, $1,000 more; the chief clerk in the State Department, $250 more; the receiving teller of the Assistant Treasurer, $200; the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, $1,000 more; the Commissioner of Pensions, $1,000 more; the chief clerk in the Land Office, $200 more; and so on.

I do not say they are getting too much; I do not think they are getting too much; but I want the committee to understand what the bill does as to all these salaries, so that you can act understandingly. If the gentlemen on the other side of the House have a mind to come and say now that the cut of ten or twelve years ago was ill advised, and that the campaign was mere thunder without any lightning, well and good; let them say it.

Now, before I sit down I call attention to one additional fact, namely, that the purchasing power of a dollar in the necessities of life is greater to-day than it was when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] won his victory throughout this country upon that reduction of $67,000. But, Mr. Chairman, I do not say that these men are getting enough. There is the law on the one hand, there is the practice of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the Democratic party on the other, which, however, is honored in the breach along the line as to many of these officials who are getting now $1,000 more than the law provides, and some of whom by this law get less than the law provides. It is your administration. They are your officials from the party standpoint, although officials for us all in point of fact, and it is for you to do what you please.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, I am quite certain that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] does not desire to do me any injustice, and he will remember very distinctly—what I have a right to say here—that my action in the Committee on Appropriations as long as he and I have been there together has been almost uniformly in harmony with my action on this floor during the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, with one exception, I think, where the salary of an officer of the Treasury Department was increased $400 upon the recommendation of four Secretaries of the Treasury. Therefore if there are increases of salaries in this bill, I do not think I ought to be held responsible, because I have been repeatedly outvoted in that connection in the committee, and I do not know whether the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] was not one of those who helped to outvote me. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. I do not think I was.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Chairman, this debate has taken a very wide range, and it is well, I think, for us now to come back to the real question before the committee. As I understand it, the bill reported by the Appropriations Committee did provide $3,600 as the salary of the First Auditor, and upon a point of order that has been stricken out, and now the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN] offers the amendment to give the Auditor $4,000, for the next year. Now, why does the gentleman from Texas offer the amendment to give the Auditor a salary of $4,000 for the ensuing year? He offers it, sir, because it is in accordance with the general law. I have in my hand the eighteenth volume of the Statutes, on page 397 of which I find it provided that the First Auditor of the Treasury shall receive a salary of $4,000.

Mr. RANDALL. That is conceded.

Mr. McCREARY. Now, Mr. Chairman, if we do not adopt this amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, where does that leave the First Auditor? It leaves him without any salary.

Mr. FORNEY. It leaves him where he ought to be, without any salary.

Mr. CRAIN. He is just as well worth his salary as you are worth yours.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I rise——

Mr. McCREARY. I hold, Mr. Chairman, that it is the duty of the Appropriations Committee, under the general law, to bring in a bill making an appropriation for each officer authorized by law, and when you leave an officer without a salary at all you have not complied with the general law. Therefore, sir, I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. FORNEY. But we have complied with the law that has existed ever since the Forty-fourth Congress. We have given him the same salary that the First Auditor has received in every Congress for the last ten years.

Mr. HOLMAN. For the last twelve years.

Mr. McCREARY. I want to say to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] that I do not blame him or the committee at all. I am not here to blame the committee. True, the committee did bring in a proposition to give this officer a salary of $3,600, but that is not in accordance with the general law. They have brought in a proposition which they say is in accordance with what has been done for several years back, and that is undoubtedly the case; but here we have the rule of the House and there we have the general law, and the proposition of the committee is not in accordance with the law. I do not blame the committee, but I hold that it is our duty as members of this House to stand by the general law and to stand by the parliamentary law which governs this House.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand that there is any question of order remaining to be decided at this time; but if there is, I hope the Chair will make the announcement and that this committee will deliver a vote which will clear the atmosphere of all the confusion that has arisen in this case.

As I understand the matter, these gentlemen whose friends here are clamorous for an increase of salaries accepted their offices—not only accepted but sought them—knowing that for several years past the appropriation bills had fixed the salaries at the rates contained in this bill. If there ever was an implied contract between appointee and Government it exists in this case. The effort made here is simply to increase the salaries of these officers by a technical ruling, which is forced upon the Chairman of the committee. Now the Chair has ruled correctly, and the effect of his ruling has been to strike out words changing a salary and to leave in the bill words providing that the sums appropriated herein shall be compensation in full. Thus the matter will stand all the way through, and if the friends of these officers insist on having the diminished salaries stricken out, I hope the Committee of the Whole will take them at their word and leave out the salaries.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, it is apparent that this law fixing the salary of the First Auditor at $4,000 per annum has been upon the statute-book for more than twelve years, and, as my colleague from Illinois has just stated, the Democratic party of the Forty-fourth Congress went before the country upon the issue of representing an economical principle in cutting down this salary from $4,000 to $3,600, and in making similar reductions of other salaries.

My colleague has expressed surprise at the attempt to restore the salary to $4,000. I confess I do not share that surprise. To my mind the case is perfectly clear; in other words, this is an illustration of the old couplet—

> When the devil was sick, the devil a monk would be;
> But when the devil grew well, the devil a monk was he.

[Laughter.]

The Democratic party in the Forty-fourth Congress was sick; that party desired to come into power, and it commenced clamoring for a reduction of the salaries of all these officers, from the First Auditor all along the line. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] was then in power; and, as he has just stated, he has been consistent from first to last. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania is no longer the Democratic party. A new generation of Democratic politicians has come upon the field, and in view of the restoration of their party to power they desire to have these salaries appropriated up to the highest legal limit, as indicated by various speeches which have been made here this morning.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Chairman, when the present office-holders——

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I understand that the Committee of the Whole had commenced voting upon this amendment, and I make the point that discussion is out of order.

Mr. HERBERT. The discussion has been going on for some time, and if we had commenced voting that proceeding has been waived, and I am not to be taken off the floor by any such point.

Mr. Chairman, when these office-holders——

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, my question of order has not been decided.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was made, but the Chair did not understand it was insisted on at the time.

Mr. HERBERT. I hope the Chair will not take me off the floor.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have to sustain the point of order. The question is on the amendment——

Mr. HERBERT. Does the Chair rule that I am out of order after all the discussion which has been going on for half an hour?

The CHAIRMAN. The discussion proceeded without the point of order being pressed. It is now insisted upon, and the Chair is compelled to rule upon it. The Chair has no desire to cut off the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama; but the point of order being insisted upon, the question is now on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN].

The question being taken on the amendment, there were—ayes 18, noes 78.

Mr. CRAIN. No quorum.

A MEMBER (to Mr. CRAIN). Do not raise that point.

Mr. CRAIN. I will raise it. This officer is entitled to what the law allows him.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CRAIN and Mr. FORNEY were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 64, noes 99.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FORNEY. I ask unanimous consent that this salary be put in the bill at $3,600.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that $3,600 be inserted in the bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Second Auditor: For Second Auditor, $3,600; deputy auditor, $2,250; six chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; ten clerks of class 4; forty-two clerks of class 3; additional to one clerk of class 4 as disbursing clerk, $200; fifty-five clerks of class 2; forty-eight clerks of class 1; three clerks, at $1,000 each; one messenger; three assistant messengers; eight laborers; and two charwomen; in all, $249,610.

Mr. TAULBEE. I make a point of order upon these words in lines 10 and 11, on page 30:

Four chiefs of division, at $2,000 each.

This is a reduction, I understand, of $100 in each case.

The CHAIRMAN. That paragraph has been passed.

Mr. TAULBEE. I did not so understand.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has read the next paragraph.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to some remarks made on Saturday last by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE]. That gentleman challenged me to produce a certain letter which I said had been published, a letter issued on the 6th of October last by the chairman of the State central committee of the Democratic party of Iowa. I desire to have that letter read as part of my remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

HEADQUARTERS DEMOCRATIC STATE COMMITTEE OF IOWA,
Hawkeye Club Rooms, Des Moines, Iowa, October 6, 1887.

MY DEAR SIR: Our committee is now actively engaged in perfecting our organization, arranging to send speakers, documents, and workers into different parts of the State, more especially in the close counties. You, as an intelligent Democrat, certainly must realize the importance of sustaining us in this work.

As you are receiving some of the fruits of our victory in 1884, I take the liberty to call on you for a voluntary contribution. Such a contribution at this time will be very acceptable and will be instrumental in a large degree in aiding us in paying obligations already contracted and carrying on campaign work that we have laid out.

There is also other important legitimate campaign work that we should do, provided we are furnished the requisite funds. You have undoubtedly observed that the Republican State committee are endeavoring to overwhelm us with speakers and workers, hoping thereby to regain their lost prestige in the State.

While you hold a Federal office it is not expected that you will engage in politics in an offensive way or to the neglect of your official duties; but, in the language of President Cleveland, "individual interest and activity in political affairs are by no means condemned. Office-holders are neither disfranchised nor forbidden the exercise of political privileges."

The question will naturally arise, how much should be contributed. Presidential postmasters are generally contributing from $25 to $50. Fourth-class postmasters, from $2 to $25; railway postal clerks, $10 to $15; members of pension examining boards, $10 to $15; and other Federal office-holders if proportion to the amount of salary received as compared with the officials named above. We make no demands nor assessments. Will you kindly reply to this communication at an early day?

I am, sincerely, yours,

EDW. H. HUNTER, Chairman.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have that letter published in connection with the recent letter which was sent by Don M. Dickinson, Postmaster-General, to Alexander Charles, of Cedar Rapids, in my district, in which he said that attending conventions and partisan work was not prohibited. And I wish to say, in addition, that this Mr. Charles who received this letter from Mr. Dickinson was secretary for the Democratic party in Iowa in the campaign of 1886, and that it would be as utterly impossible to tie the tide as to prevent Mr. Charles being an active partisan in any political campaign. These assessments if paid, and I presume they were, gave that party a campaign fund of from sixty to one hundred thousand dollars for the campaign of 1887.

I publish this letter in order to show the construction placed upon the duties of the Democratic office-holder, as shown by this letter of Mr. Hunter, are very similar to those permitted by the letter of Mr. Dickinson, in which the only restraint upon the Democratic officer is one of taste merely.

Mr. WEAVER. Well, what is there wrong about that?

Mr. KERR. The gentleman from Iowa asks what there is wrong about that. I do not think there is anything very wrong about it, only it ought to be considered in connection with the recent increase of salaries by the majority of this House and in respect to the false pretense which has been kept up by the Democratic party in this country since the inauguration of Mr. Cleveland, as it was in the campaign in which he was the candidate for President, in which there was the same profession of devotion to civil service-reform and universal denunciation of Republicans for favoring practices that they now follow without hesitation.

Mr. HOLMES. I will take the floor and yield my five minutes to my colleague.

Mr. KERR. I only wish one minute more in which to complete what I intended to say.

Mr. HOLMES. I will move to strike out the last two words, and yield the floor to my colleague.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] on the right of the Chair was first recognized.

Mr. WEAVER. I have no objection to my colleague proceeding for a minute longer. I will yield one minute to him for that purpose out of my time.

Mr. KERR. I wish to say further in connection with this matter that the internal-revenue offices of the State of Iowa are held by men who run the Democratic party in my district; and that those officers, their deputies, and their clerks, who are Government officers by appointment of the President of the United States, do more to control conventions and in getting the people out than any others in my district.

Mr. MCKINNEY. And so they ought to.

Mr. KERR. The gentleman from New Hampshire, another civil-service reformer, says it is all right. I am glad these pretenses are being brought home to men on the other side of the House, and gentlemen like the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] are saying they have no regard for any such doctrine. I ask that the country's attention may be called to it in order that the Mugwumps in New York, who determined the last election and gave the Presidency to the present incumbent of the Presidential chair, may not again deceive the American people through any false pretenses.

Mr. WEAVER. I wish to say in reply to my colleague there is nothing in the civil-service rule or law that prohibits a Federal office-holder making a voluntary contribution to the party to which he belongs. Nor is there any impropriety in the chairman of a State committee writing a letter to Federal office-holders informing them if they are willing to contribute he would like to receive such contribution. And it comes with bad grace from the Republican party, which has in the last twenty-five years assessed every Federal office-holder and every State officer in Iowa peremptorily, and compelled them to make contributions under the penalty of quitting their offices unless they did—I say it comes with bad grace from the Republican party after such a record to make the objection they now do. In my judgment it is right to have these officers inform them they may or may not contribute, just as they please, to the expenses of their party at the election. It is right, and I defend it here without regard to the civil-service law. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. STEELE. Does the gentleman say it is right to tell these men their political heads will be cut off if they do not?

Mr. WEAVER. Certainly not; and there is nothing in the letter referred to of the kind indicated by the gentleman from Indiana. If I had the control of the machine, and had the authority, I would be far from retaining any one if he would not contribute his fair share of the election expenses. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. I renew the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I rather like this "experience" meeting we are having here. I suppose our friends on the other side would call it a "love feast." I am glad to know that at last they have been permitted to testify according to their loves. I have heard in former years so much of hypocrisy upon this subject come from that side of the House, and I have also heard upon the stump so much of hypocrisy during the last campaign from that side of the House, emanating from their great chief, that I am very glad now to know they are testifying according to their loves.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] first says that he thinks it but right and proper that a Democratic official should have the right to contribute or not, just as he pleases, and without compulsion; and then goes on to say that if he had his way, no man should be appointed who would not contribute. Now, everybody who can read between the lines of these circulars knows that when a circular comes to an office-holder he understands, whatever its language may be, or whatever may appear upon its face, that he must contribute if he expects to hold his place. I am frank to say that I do not believe it is right; I believe it is bad policy, and when you made the allegation against the Republican party, and when in former years the Republican party made it against you when you were in power, there was some foundation in what was alleged, and there is some foundation to-day in what is alleged. True, an American citizen ought to have the right to contribute of his own free will to uphold those principles and policies that are close to his heart. Yet the contribution should not be wrung from him by a polite threat which amounts to "Your money or your office."

The mask is now thrown off, and Democrats and Mugwumps, under the lead of Cleveland, being in possession, propose to utilize all the Federal machinery in every way possible to stay in. And it is at least some gratification to know that in the campaign upon us this summer and fall that will be honest, or at least free from hypocrisy, touching these and, I hope, other matters.

Mr. BLAND. I want to move to postpone action on these political matters until the campaign begins. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Oh, the gentleman need not be afraid, he will have enough of this when the campaign does begin.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MCCREARY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution (S. R. 87) authorizing and directing the payment of salaries of the officers and employés of Congress for the month of May, 1888.

Also, that the Senate disagreed to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1851) providing for an international marine conference to secure greater safety for life and property at sea, and asked a conference with the House thereon, and had appointed Mr. EDMUNDS, Mr. FRYE, and Mr. MORGAN as conferees on the part of the Senate.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. COMPTON. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to say a word upon this subject, but when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] takes up the question of hypocrisy and charges it upon the Democratic party, as well as Democrats of this House, I feel, sir, that I owe it to my party and to myself and to his party to retaliate by saying that if there is a concern within the limits of this country, and a record made by any party within its history, which shows, when its condition is compared with its professions, hypocrisy and deceit and everything else unbecoming to a party, it is the record of the Republican party upon the question of civil-service reform.

Now, let us look back for a moment and make a little investigation. Where did this new love of which the gentleman from Illinois speaks—where did this grand spirit which took possession of the American people and demanded this civil-service reform come from, and when did it come?

Mr. STEELE. It came from the Democratic party.

Mr. COMPTON. No, sir; it came from the fact that, under Republican administrations of this Government, the civil service had become so notoriously corrupt and vile that public sentiment rose demanding reform, which demand resulted in the passing of the so-called civil-service law.

Mr. STRUBLE. Why do you denominate it the "so-called civil-service law?"

Mr. COMPTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, as is so often the case, public sentiment ran wild upon this subject, and out of that grew your civil-service law. I have no concealment. The hour never has been, from the time that bill was first put upon the Calendar and I read it, that I have not been heartily opposed to it. I have said so here and elsewhere. I am opposed to it on principle.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. COMPTON. No, sir. In the last twenty-four hours you had an evidence of what we said would be the result of the civil-service law. Here they are to-day demanding—what? Demanding additional clerks, demanding additional appropriations, enlarging their power; and the other result will come inevitably as this has done, namely, a civil pension-list, or you will fail to march up to the true consequences of the act itself.

Let there be no mistake about this. I speak for myself and not for my party. I say to you to-day I oppose the thing on principle. I will allow no man to say to me that he is more honestly in favor of an honest administration of the civil service than I am. I claim to be as much in favor of an honest administration of the civil service as any man living in this land. But I do not believe this is the road to reach that result. And I say to the Republican party that when they shall have done works mete for repentance, when they shall have wiped out their record while they had control of the Government in the matter of the administration of the civil service, when they shall have done away with that blot on the escutcheon of the country, men blazoning it from one end of the country to the other in the campaign which resulted in the seating of Hayes, when civil-service reform was the issue and it was said that in the event of seating Hayes and the continuance in power of the Republican party they would reform the civil service—let them show that they have kept faith and been true to their promises before they charge hypocrisy on my party; and let them wipe out from their records the fact that every scoundrel whose hand was black with perjury and with forgery, and by virtue of whose conduct Hayes was seated, was rewarded for his services. Not till then can the Republican party claim to be the party in favor of civil-service reform. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL. Now that we have had each side heard respecting civil service, I trust that civil service will be promoted by the prompt passage of this bill.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to say one word. I never do a member on this floor an injustice by a remark that I do not make haste to rectify it at the first opportunity, and so now I wish to say to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. COMPTON] that I did accuse the Democratic party of hypocrisy in its professions concerning the civil service, including the Executive, clear down. That was too broad a statement. The State of Maryland, so far as the Democratic party is concerned, does not deserve to be so accused, because I know in Maryland they have spit upon, denounced, and trampled under foot the civil-service law in a defiant, unlawful, but manly way right under the nose of the President. The chiefs of the party in Maryland, standing highest in his counsels while he was professing devotion to the civil-service law, were spitting upon it in the presence of the whole country, and with impunity. So I except the Democratic party in Maryland from my charge of hypocrisy. [Applause.]

Mr. PETERS. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question. I would like to know if the appropriation made for the Second Auditor's office is equal to the estimate made by that official?

Mr. FORNEY. Yes. It is made in accordance with the wishes of the Second Auditor in every particular.

Mr. PETERS. Then if there is not sufficient force to bring up the work of that department the responsibility rests upon the head of that department himself.

Mr. FORNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. PETERS. I want to say in relation to all these investigations as to bounty and back pay that office is far behind. It is impossible to get a claim through and allowed by that department inside of nine to twelve months. It was for that reason that I called attention to the inquiry if the appropriation was equal to the estimate. And I now understand if there be any delay in that department the party who made the estimate must be held responsible. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Fourth Auditor: For the Fourth Auditor, $3,600; deputy auditor, $2,250; three chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; two clerks of class 4; eleven clerks of class 3; seven clerks of class 2; seven clerks of class 1; three clerks, at $1,000 each; five clerks, at $900 each; two clerks, at $800 each; one assistant messenger, and two laborers; in all, $62,390.

Mr. FORNEY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 32, in line 14, strike out "eleven" and insert "thirteen;" strike out "seven" and insert "eight;" in line 15, strike out "seven" and insert "nine," and, in line 18, strike out "sixty-two" and insert "sixty-nine."

So that it will read "thirteen clerks of class 3, eight clerks of class 2, nine clerks of class 1; in all $69,390.

Mr. FORNEY. A recent decision of the Supreme Court requires this additional force.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of construction of standard weights and measures: For construction and verification of standard weights and measures, including metric standards for the custom-houses, other offices of the United States, and for the several States, and mural standards of length in Washington, D. C., the following, while actually employed, namely, one adjuster, at $5 per day; one mechanician, at $4 per day; one watchman; in all $3,546.

Mr. FORNEY. I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 40, strike out all after the word "Columbia," in line 21, down to and including line 25, and in lieu thereof insert "one adjuster, $1,500; one mechanician, $1,250; in all $3,470."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Director of the Mint: For one Director, $4,500; examiner, $2,300; computer, $2,200; assayer, $2,200; adjuster of accounts, $2,000; two clerks of class 3; two clerks of class 2, one of whom shall be a stenographer; three clerks of class 1; one translator, $1,200; one clerk, at $2,000; one copyist; one messenger; assistant in laboratory, $1,000; one helper, at $500; in all $28,240.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Chairman, I send to the desk an amendment which I desire to offer to that paragraph.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Page 41, strike out "three," in line 18, and insert "five," and in line 19, strike out "two" and insert "five."

Page 42, line 3, strike out "two" and insert "seven."

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Chairman, these proposed changes are in accordance with the estimates contained in the Book of Estimates, and also with the recommendations of the Director of the Mint, and they also have the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. I ask the Clerk to read what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Extract from letter of Director of the Mint of October 10, 1887.]

To the Secretary of the Treasury:

1. Bureau of the Mint: Increases have been submitted of $200 and $300, respectively, in the salaries of the examiner and computer, so as to fix the salary of each at $2,500 per annum, the same as in the case of the chief clerk of the assay office at New York, and of the principal mints. The efficiency of both officers, each in his own division of highly technical work, has been acquired by many years of arduous and faithful service.

[Extract from letter of Director of the Mint of October 22, 1886.]

To the Secretary of the Treasury:

I recommend that the salaries of the examiner and computer of this bureau be fixed at $2,500 per annum. In mint affairs these officials are to be regarded as experts, whose present salaries are not only unduly small, but are less than the salaries of the principal clerks of the mints, whose responsibility is far less.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF THE MINT,
Washington, D. C., March 11, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to invite your attention to my recommendation of November 5, 1885, namely, that the salaries of the examiner of mints and the computer of bullion of the bureau be increased from $2,300 and $2,200, respectively, and fixed at $2,500 per annum.

The duties of these officers of the Department are technical and arduous, and require such a knowledge of the business of the mints and assay offices as can be acquired only through experience and long service.

Both of the officers referred to have honorably served the Bureau of the Mint from near its organization, and for still longer periods in the Department.

The compensation recommended is the same as that received by the principal clerks of the larger institutions under the jurisdiction of this bureau.

I have the honor to urge upon your favorable consideration that this matter be brought to the attention of Congress.

Very respectfully,

JAMES P. KIMBALL,
Director of the Mint.

Hon. DANIEL MANNING,
Secretary of the Treasury.

[Extract from letter of Director of the Mint of November 5, 1885.]

To the Secretary of the Treasury:

A decrease of $1,000 is submitted in the estimate for the expenses of the Bureau of the Mint, from the discontinuance of one clerk. An increase of $200 in the salaries of the examiner and $300 in that of the computer is submitted so as to render the salaries of both these faithful and experienced officers $2,500.

Very respectfully,

JAS. P. KIMBALL, Director.

Mr. FORNEY. Mr. Chairman, I make no point upon those amendments. The Director of the Mint was very anxious that the increase should be made, but the committee did not feel that they had authority to make it. The committee had not the power, but of course the House has the power.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FORNEY. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN], who is not present at this moment, desires to offer an amendment to this paragraph, and I ask unanimous consent that he may be permitted to return to it for that purpose.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Supervising Surgeon-General Marine Hospital Service: For Supervising Surgeon-Genera', $4,000: one surgeon, $3,000; one passed assistant surgeon, $1,800; one clerk, $1,800; five clerks, at $1,600 each; one clerk, $1,200; one hospital steward (employed as chemist), $1,200; six copyists; one messenger, at $600; one laborer, $480; and one laborer, $360; in all, $27,840, the same to be paid from the permanent appropriations for the Marine Hospital Service.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to that paragraph.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 43, line 3, strike out "one." at the end of the line, and insert "two." Add "s" to the word "laborer," in the beginning of the fourth line. In lines 4 and 5, strike out "and one laborer, $360."

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. FORNEY. Yes, Mr. Chairman, the point of order is made on that.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The same point was made the other day and was overruled.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to state that it is perfectly competent under the rule to increase or decrease the number of employés in any of the Departments upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say for the information of the committee that the other day I went carefully over this bill and found at the end of it a provision that where the pay of a laborer is not specifically stated in the bill it shall be $660, or, in round numbers, at the rate of $2 a day. I also found it provided in other places in the bill that the pay of some laborers should be $460 and of others $380. I draughted a series of amendments applicable to all those cases, and I offered one on Saturday, which was voted down. These amendments provide for transferring all the $360 men to the $480 class; and the reasons which I gave in support of the amendment I offered the other day I reiterate now. It is only a dollar a day that the bill proposes to give to these men, and the amendment would give them less than $1.50 a day for every working day. In opposition to my amendment it was stated that no estimates of this kind had been submitted. My answer to that is that the men occupying these very subordinate positions never get the ear of the gentleman high above them who makes out the estimates, but their complaints have come to other committees of this House, and these men have stated to us, and we believe it to be true, that it is impossible for them to live and support their families on $360 a year. There are only about a dozen of them included in the bill, and this good and great Government will spend only about a thousand dollars more for the next fiscal year if these amendments are adopted. Only about a thousand dollars more, and these men will be to that extent relieved from the most pinching kind of poverty.

It was also said here that men in private occupations, farm hands, receive less compensation than the bill allows these laborers; but it must not be forgotten that living in Washington is very expensive as compared with country places. House rent is double and treble what it is in rural communities, and these men have not the opportunity, which farm hands have, to buy their provisions at farmers' prices, but are compelled to purchase of the corner grocer at the highest retail prices. I happen to know from direct information that a number of men thus situated are on the point of actual starvation, and I stand here to-day to ask that this slight increase in their wages be given, and that this Government shall no longer set the example of paying less than a dollar a day for its labor. On the way to the Capitol this morning I interviewed a man who was working in the grounds. I asked him, "What is your pay?" He said, "Nominally I get $1.25 a day, but I am on only half the time, and they take out rainy days from that."

Sixty-two and a half cents a day on an average, and wet days deducted even from that! I say that it is not right. It may be economy, but it is not statesmanship, to crowd labor down to a point like that; and in the long run it is not even economy.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. I move to strike out the last word, for I want to say a little more on this question.

That this policy is not statesmanship is evident from other parts of the bill. In looking over the bill I find an appropriation for the Public Printer $500 per annum more than the statute law gives him; and that has been passed unobjected to. I find an appropriation for the Commissioner of Indian Affairs $1,000 in excess of what the statute law gives him. I find an appropriation for the Commissioner of Pensions $1,000 in excess of what the statute law gives him. I find an appropriation for the Deputy Commissioner of Pensions $1,100 in excess of what the statute law gives him.

If this committee can in these instances go above the point provided by the statute law, why may it not extend its helping hand to these unfortunate men who are so low in the scale of public employment?

Mr. RANDALL. Just one word. The Public Printer in this bill receives the same salary which he received last year. The Senate of the United States, during the time when Mr. Rounds held the office, in the Forty-seventh Congress, I think, insisted upon the salary being fixed at this amount. As to the salary of the Commissioner of Pensions, that was raised some time ago, and the committee simply appropriated what the officer had been receiving.

Mr. FORNEY. In addition to what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has just stated, I wish to say that the money from which this payment is made is a trust fund. The gentleman will observe at the end of the paragraph the words "this sum to be paid from the permanent appropriations for the Marine Hospital Service." The money for the purposes contemplated in this paragraph is raised by levying a tax or assessment upon the poor, unfortunate sailors, who receive even less money than the persons whom the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] is so anxious to provide for. I think, therefore, it would be wrong to make the increase proposed. We are not appropriating the money of this great Government, but money raised from the poor sailors. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. BUCHANAN. This amendment raises the wages of only one laborer, and I am sure that no sailor with a sailor's heart would object to it.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, in view of what was stated the other day upon a question similar to this, I wish to say one word. If there be a man, with a family or without a family, who is working for the Government for $360 a year, and who in return for that salary puts in all his time, I am frank to say that we are paying such a one less than the ordinary pay for a laborer. If, however, the person employed at this rate be a boy, or if he be a man who gives only part of his time to the work of the Government, having the remainder of the time as his own, and suffering no deduction of pay because working only part of the time, then this compensation may be sufficient. I do not know what the facts are. These estimates, like all other estimates, are made by the heads of bureaus or divisions, who certify them to the Secretary of the Treasury. If the facts which the gentleman from New Jersey supposes to exist are really the facts, then this employé ought to receive larger wages. What the fact is I do not know.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BUCHANAN, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 39, noes 55.

Mr. LAWLER. I move that the pay of the laborer named in the pending paragraph be fixed at the rate of $2 a day.

Mr. FORNEY. This money does not come from the funds of the Government, but is paid by the sailors. If it were paid from Government funds, the gentleman's proposition might be all right.

Mr. LAWLER. I take it upon myself to say that if the truth were known it would be found that the laborer put down here at the lowest compensation is doing, most likely, the hardest labor in the institution.

Mr. FORNEY. Will the gentleman from Illinois inform us what this laborer does?

Mr. LAWLER. I ask the gentleman who reported this bill to state what this laborer does.

Mr. FORNEY. The Supervising Surgeon-General, Dr. Hamilton, has stated that this is all these laborers ought to receive. We give him in this bill every laborer he asks for and the amount that he asks for each. He is certainly disposed to take care of the interests of the institution. There may be some old lady or some boy who performs these duties as laborer. In that case, of course, the pay ought not to be "$2 a day and roast beef." [Laughter.]

Mr. LAWLER. The gentleman's information is not satisfactory. The very officer whom he has cited as making recommendations on this subject to the Committee on Appropriations recommends very gracefully that his own salary be fixed at $4,000 a year.

Mr. FORNEY. If the gentleman is not satisfied on that point, let him move to cut the salary down.

Mr. LAWLER. I am not asking to cut down salaries. My position is that $1 a day is not enough for a man with a family to live on in a city like this.

Mr. FORNEY. This laborer may be a boy.

Mr. LAWLER. I claim that now is a proper time for this House to increase items of this kind, and not be content with merely accepting the recommendation of a gentleman who asks that for his own salary $4,000 a year be appropriated. In the face of that recommendation in his own behalf he asks that this laborer be allowed but $1 a day.

I assume that gentlemen of the House, in a matter of this kind, mean to do justice. No one of us can refuse to admit that it is impossible for a man to live on $1 a day in this city. I am following on this bill a general principle. I do not think that any man in the employ of the Government to-day ought to be asked to live on a smaller sum than $2 a day.

We are told by men who are provided for in this bill that they can not get along on $2,800 and $2,200, and that is the ground upon which they ask for an increase, and yet when we ask in a purely humanitarian point of view that these laborers shall receive $2 a day objection is at once raised that it is wrong. I wish to say to gentlemen on this side of the House, as well as to gentlemen on the other side of the House, that if they really meant what they have said in their speeches, then they ought to vote for my amendment. I insist for one on making the wages of these laborers $2 a day.

Mr. FORNEY. This comes out of the sailors' fund.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the assistant treasurer at Boston: For assistant treasurer, $5,000; for chief clerk, $2,500; paying teller, $2,500; assistant paying teller, $2,200; vault clerk, $2,000; receiving teller, $2,000; first book-keeper, $1,800; second book-keeper, $1,400; specie clerk, $1,800; assistant specie clerk, $1,500; money clerk, $1,500; coupon clerk and redemption clerk, at $1,400 each; receipt clerk and general clerk, at $1,200 each; assistant redemption clerk, $1,100; three clerks at $1,000 each; one clerk, $840; messenger and chief watchman, $1,060; two watchmen and janitors at $850 each; in all, $37,060.

Mr. FORNEY. I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 48, in line 2, strike out "two" and insert "three," and in line 4 strike out "and sixty" and insert "nine hundred and ten;" so it will read: "$37,910."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of assistant treasurer at Chicago: For assistant treasurer, $4,500; cashier, $2,500; paying teller, $1,800; book-keeper and receiving teller, at $1,500 each; three coin, coupon, and currency clerks, at $1,500 each; five clerks, $1,200 each; one messenger, $840; one janitor, $600; and three watchmen, $720 each; in all, $25,900.

Mr. LAWLER. In the Forty-ninth Congress efforts were made to increase this salary to $5,000 per annum, but they did not succeed. I now move that this salary be made $5,000.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of assistant treasurer at New Orleans: For assistant treasurer, $4,500; cashier, $2,250; receiving-teller, $2,000; book-keeper, $1,500; one clerk, at $1,200; one coin and redemption clerk, $1,200; two clerks, at $1,000 each; porter, $500; one day-watchman, at $720; one night-watchman, at $720; in all, $16,590.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to call attention to the fact that here is a salary which has been increased $500 over what it has remained for the last ten years.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman can not hold me responsible for that.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I make the point of order against this salary.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois state that this is an increase of $500 over the present year?

Mr. CANNON. That is my impression.

Mr. RANDALL. That is so.

Mr. CANNON. The law, as I understand it, fixes the salary at $4,000, and this increases it to $4,500. I had the honor a few moments ago to submit some remarks about increasing these salaries beyond what they were fixed at by the Republican party when it was in power in this House.

Mr. FORNEY. What salary is the gentleman talking about?

Mr. CANNON. I am talking about the salary of assistant treasurer at New Orleans. This is an increase over the salary provided in the Forty-fourth Congress, and it has remained at that sum up to this hour. I am not saying this sum should not be $4,500 a year, but merely refreshing the minds of our friends on the other side of the House by calling their attention to the figures included in this bill and to ask them if they can explain to themselves and the country, if they desire to do so, why it is correct to pay the Sixth Auditor $4,000 a year, which is the salary provided by law, and the assistant treasurer at New Orleans $4,500, which is $500 more than is provided by the law.

Mr. FORNEY. The idea was to put the official here on an equality with St. Louis. It was simply an attempt to equalize these salaries, and we followed the Republican precedent for doing that. Philadelphia was put up on a par with Boston for the same reason.

Mr. RANDALL. And I opposed both of them.

The CHAIRMAN. There has been a question of order raised, and the Chair will be glad to have information from the gentleman as to what the law is on this point.

Mr. FORNEY. It is the statute. We have not gone beyond that.

The CHAIRMAN. The amount in the bill, the Chair understands, is in accordance with the general law fixing the salary?

Mr. FORNEY. It is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. KERR. Then I move to strike out the $500, so as to let the salary stand at $4,000, just as it has been for a number of years.

The question was taken; and the Chair decided that the amendment was adopted.

Mr. GAY. I demand a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 39, noes 32.

Mr. TRACEY. No quorum.

Mr. CLARDY. I would like to have the amendment stated.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York insist on the point of order?

Mr. TRACEY. I will withdraw it.

Mr. GAY. I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being made, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. GAY and Mr. KERR were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 53, noes 45.

So (no further count being demanded) the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of assistant treasurer at Philadelphia: For assistant treasurer, $5,000; for cashier and chief clerk, $2,500; book-keeper, $2,500; chief interest clerk and chief registered-interest clerk at $1,900 each; assistant book-keeper, $1,800; coin-teller, $1,700; redemption clerk and assistant coupon clerk, at $1,600 each; assistant registered-interest clerk, $1,500; assistant cashier and assistant coin-teller at $1,400 each; receiving teller, $1,300; assistant receiving teller, $1,200; superintendent, messenger, and chief watchman, $1,100; four female counters at $900 each; seven watchmen at $720 each; in all, $37,040.

Mr. FORNEY. I move to strike out, in line 4, the words "five thousand dollars" and insert "four thousand five hundred dollars." That increase was made on the same principle as the one at New Orleans, and on the same principle I think it should be stricken out as the other was.

Mr. RANDALL. I voted in committee against the increase in both cases.

Mr. FORNEY. This reduces the appropriation to what it is in the current law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of assistant treasurer at St. Louis: For assistant treasurer, $4,500; chief clerk and teller, $2,500; assistant teller, $1,800; book-keeper, $1,500; assistant book-keeper and one clerk, at $1,200 each; assistant coin clerk, at $1,000; messenger, $1,000; three watchmen, at $720 each; in all, $16,860.

Mr. FORNEY. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 52, line 3, after the word "each," insert "one clerk at $1,000," and in line 5, strike out "sixteen" and insert "seventeen."

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of assistant treasurer at San Francisco: For assistant treasurer, $4,500; cashier, $3,000; bookkeeper, $2,500; one chief clerk, $2,400; assistant cashier, receiving-teller, and assistant bookkeeper, at $2,000 each; coin-teller and one clerk, at $1,800 each; one clerk, $1,400; one messenger, $840; and four watchmen, at $720 each; in all, $27,120.

For compensation of special agents to examine the books, accounts, and money on hand at the several subtreasuries and depositaries, including national banks acting as depositaries, under the requirements of section 3649 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, also including examinations of cash accounts at mints, $4,000.

Mr. FORNEY. I move to amend, on page 52, line 24, by striking out "four" and inserting "five." This is recommended by the Department.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mint at San Francisco, Cal.: For salary of superintendent, $4,500; assayer, melter and refiner, and coiner, at $3,000 each; chief clerk and cashier, $2,500 each; bookkeeper, abstract clerk, weigh clerk, and warrant clerk, assistant assayer, assistant melter and refiner, and assistant coiner, at $2,000 each; register of deposits, $2,000; cashier's clerk, $1,800; assayer's computing clerk, assistant weigh clerk, and superintendent's computing clerk, at $1,600 each; in all, $40,900.

For wages of workmen and adjusters, $170,000.

For incidental and contingent expenses, $40,000.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I desire to insert an amendment after the clause read by the Clerk, so as to precede the appropriations for the various assay offices. This is to provide for an assay office at St. Louis, Mo., which is omitted from the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assay office at St. Louis, Mo.: For assayer in charge, $2,500; one clerk, $1,000; in all $3,500; for incidental and contingent expenses, including labor, $2,400.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. This, Mr. Chairman, is the present law which the officer in charge of this particular office is endeavoring to amend by omitting to include any appropriations for it. It is very remarkable that while the assay office at St. Louis, established about 1882, has continued year after year to increase its business from about $15,000 in 1882 to about one hundred and twenty-odd thousand dollars now, that notwithstanding this fact we have this same effort made every year to omit it from the appropriation bill. It is most extraordinary. There is no demand for such legislation. It is a matter of great convenience to our people; it serves the miners of New Mexico and Colorado (Southern), is provided for by law, and yet year by year the Representatives from that section must stand up here and demand a restoration for that assay office.

It is a little remarkable to find an officer in one branch of the Government so assiduously endeavoring to cut the throat of one division under him. It may be for the good of the service, but it is the most remarkable case of misplaced energy that I have ever known of in my life. [Laughter.] I repeat, it is the law; the Appropriations Committee should have provided for the law, and if Congress in its wisdom desires to dispense with this important branch of the service there should be a bill introduced in the regular way for a repeal of the law creating the assay office there.

It is in harmony with the decisions of the Chair. I do not understand that the committee object at all to this proposition. They have restored it before. I do not blame the committee for not inserting in the bill what was omitted by the Department. I am certain the House will not permit this injustice to the people of the Mississippi Valley.

Mr. FORNEY. I will read from the report of the Director of the Mint the reasons stated by the Department for the omission of this item:

Whatever may have been the purpose in establishing an assay office in St. Louis, this institution has failed to be of any considerable practical benefit to the mint service. Not being located in a mining section, it has likewise proved of little practical advantage to the mining industry of the United States.

The following table shows the business of the United States assay office at St. Louis since its establishment:

Operations of the United States assay office at St. Louis.

Fiscal year.	Earnings.	Expenditures.	Percentage of expenditures to deposits.
1882	$111.16	*$11,880.65
1883	414.32	5,372.03
1884	676.82	5,338.51
1885	783.65	6,500.01
1886	703.67	5,381.43
1887	696.28	5,339.30
Total	3,385.90	39,811.93	†9.1

*Includes $6,896.11 for fixtures. †Average.

In will be noticed that the value of the deposits during the six years ended June 30, 1887, was $438,041.58, of which the sum of $260,212.85 consisted of deposits of old jewelry, old coin, and miscellaneous material, and only $177,828.73 of new bullion of domestic production. About 60 per cent. of all the deposits consisted of old material of the class mentioned, and only 40 per cent. of new bullion.

The business of the present assay office is mainly of a character which pertains to private refineries, such as are found in all large cities.

The continuance of this assay office has long been considered by this bureau as an expenditure of public money, if not contrary to the purpose for which similar institutions are maintained by the Government, at least as an expenditure without corresponding benefit either to the mining industry or to the mint service of the Republic.

I have therefore deemed it my duty to omit an estimate of appropriations for the fiscal year 1889 for the support of the assay office at St. Louis. And it seems to be my present duty to suggest that the Department take the regular course to recommend that this assay office be abolished.

I do not think we should indulge in that luxury.

Mr. CLARDY. This assay office was established, as has been stated by the gentleman from Alabama, in 1882 through the intelligent and well-directed effort of my colleague [Mr. BLAND]. At each session of Congress since that time an appropriation has been made for its maintenance, not always, however, at the instance of the Committee on Appropriations. The omission of the item from the present bill is, I presume, pursuant to the suggestion, as has been said, of the Director of the Mint, which accompanies the annual report of the Secretary. This is not the first time that that officer has asked that that appropriation be withheld from this office and that the office be abolished.

In 1884 he appeared before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations and insisted that the office should be discontinued, and that committee undertook to give practical effect to his suggestion by reporting a bill to the House with that item left out; but the Committee of the Whole, not thinking there was any fairness or justice or good sense in requiring the people of New Mexico and Arizona and other countries contiguous to St. Louis to send their gold and silver bullion to the city of Philadelphia to be assayed before it could be sent to New Orleans for coinage, overruled the action of the Committee on Appropriations and restored this item to the bill.

At that time, and I trust I may have the attention of the committee, this office did seem to be a very inconsiderable one. In 1883 there had been deposited of gold and silver bullion at St. Louis only the sum of $32,000, in round numbers. The amount deposited last year at this same office, in round numbers, was $111,000, and yet the Director of the Mint again asks that this office be discontinued. According to my friend from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY], this office is not self-supporting. The same argument, if carried out, would abolish nearly all these assay offices.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Would it not abolish this House?

Mr. CLARDY. Perhaps it would. It would abolish the assay office at Charlotte, N. C. I think it would abolish the office at Boisé City, Idaho. It is not expected the Government will make money out of these offices.

I want to say, recurring to a ruling of the Chair this morning on another question, we have a rule which precludes me from offering an amendment appropriating money for an office which has never been created. The object of that rule, if it has an object, is to prevent the enactment of immature legislation upon appropriation bills. The spirit of the rule would require the committee to report to this House and the House to make appropriations to sustain offices already created. In other words, I do not believe that the policy of that rule or the spirit of that rule would countenance a proposition to repeal a law creating an office by starving the officers.

If I have any time left, I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND].

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARDY] has expired.

Mr. BLAND rose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask that, for the information of the committee, the extract read by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] be read again.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order at this time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask that the Clerk read it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not the floor for that purpose.

Mr. BLAND. I hold in my hand the act of 1881, which established this assay office at St. Louis. It was established in the old custom-house, a building belonging to the Government, which cost the Government no rent and no expense for the building or the office. The plant is all there; there is no expense for that, and the establishment was created by law and continued by law up to the present time.

There was a reason for the establishment of this assay office at St. Louis at the time the law was passed. The Director of the Mint at that time, Mr. Burchard, had great difficulty in procuring bullion for the New Orleans mint at the same price as he procured silver bullion for the Mint at Philadelphia. In other words, the bullion-holder charged the Government the extra cost of exporting the bullion from New York to New Orleans. Mr. Burchard told our Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures that with an assay office at St. Louis he could save the cost of transportation, the difference of cost being equivalent to the difference between the distance from St. Louis to New Orleans and the distance from New York to New Orleans; in other words, about $6,000 on every million of dollars coined. Now, there were $11,000,000 coined at New Orleans, and according to that estimate there would be a saving of $66,000 in the purchase of silver dollars by having this assay office. The fact that this assay office was located there has compelled bullion-holders to deliver at New York for the same price as at Philadelphia. That office was established there by recommendation of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures upon the recommendation of Mr. Burchard, Director of the Mint.

There was also a favorable report to this House of a proposition to establish a mint at St. Louis; and that is why these gentlemen are so hostile to the St. Louis assay office, especially the present Director of the Mint, who seems to be in the interest of Pennsylvania or the Philadelphia mint, as against the great Mississippi Valley. Twice these recommendations have come from the Committee on Appropriations, and once from the present Director of the Mint. I say when that assay office is abolished it will be time enough to refuse appropriations for it. But there is no proposition pending before Congress to abolish that office. This is a proposition to leave out the appropriation to continue the office in existence simply because it does not pay expenses. There is but one assay office in the country that does pay expenses, and that is the assay office at New York. The Office at Charlotte, N. C., does not pay expenses by $4,000.

The earnings at the Boisé City office are only $1,000, and the expenditures are over $7,000. The earnings at Charlotte are only $1,131.23, and the expenditures are $4,315.85. At St. Louis the deposits are $112,000, the earnings $666.28, and the expenses $5,339.

Mr. WARNER. Can my colleague inform the House whether the other two assay offices which those statistics show fail to pay expenses are provided for in the bill?

Mr. BLAND. Every one of them, except the St. Louis office.

Mr. WARNER. Can my colleague tell the reason why the St. Louis office should not be provided for as well as those others?

Mr. BLAND. There is no reason in the world, except that the Director of the Mint argues in favor of establishing more facilities for coinage in Philadelphia as against coinage in the great Mississippi Valley. It is a mint in the Mississippi Valley that he is striking at. He desires that the mint at Philadelphia shall be provided for and extended in order to do more coinage, and recommends the abolition of the St. Louis assay office because he fears there may be some conflict between the Mississippi Valley and the Atlantic seaboard on this question.

Mr. CLARDY. Let me remind my colleague that the assay office at Helena, Mont., pays only $3,000 in round numbers, while the expenses are $25,000.

Mr. WARNER. And that Montana office is provided for in the bill?

Mr. BLAND. Certainly. Every one of them except the St. Louis office.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, I want to free the mind of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] from any apprehensions about the Philadelphia mint. I represent that mint in part, and I assure him I have never heard a whisper of opposition from that quarter to the St. Louis assay office. The committee omitted the appropriation for the St. Louis assay office because the persons who are charged with the administration of the laws and with the expenditure of money for these purposes have from year to year for several years past told us that there was no earthly use in having an assay office at St. Louis.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. And yet the business increases every year.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is mistaken. I want to correct his statement. No Director of the Mint has ever recommended this change to Congress except Mr. Kimball.

Mr. RANDALL. It has been recommended every year for four years past.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman can not find any such recommendation from any Director of the Mint except Mr. Kimball.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, I think he is about as competent a man as any that has preceded him, and I do not believe he has any prejudice whatever against the St. Louis assay office. I am sure I have not, and I am sure no member of the Committee on Appropriations has any such prejudice. But there was no estimate for that office, and how could the Committee on Appropriations undertake to recommend an appropriation for this purpose when the men who are charged with the administration of the laws in relation to the mints have told us that it would be a waste of money?

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, I am at a loss, as is intimated by the question I asked my colleague a few moments ago, to understand why, if the other offices which have failed to pay expenses and which are located in much less important places financially, commercially, and geographically than St. Louis—I am at a loss, I say, to understand why they should be included in the bill and St. Louis be omitted. I had supposed, sir, that when the Congress of the United States created an office and fixed a salary for that office, and the office was filled by the appointing power, all the Appropriation Committee had to do was to appropriate the necessary money to carry on that office. I assume, Mr. Chairman, as to the gentlemen who have been appointed to the assay office in St. Louis, and whose salaries are fixed by law, that if there is a failure of appropriation by this bill they will have cause of action against the Government, and can go to the Court of Claims and enforce that action. I am glad to learn from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that there is no disposition to injure St. Louis or the West or the great Mississippi Valley.

It has been charged, Mr. Chairman, and with some show of reasonableness, that some parts of this administration have been carried on so as to favor New York and Pennsylvania and the other Eastern States as against the great Western States; and it is charged now that an important measure pending before this House strikes out every leading industry in the great State of Missouri while it protects those of other States. I have heard no good reason given why the assay office in the city of St. Louis should not be provided for.

Mr. HERBERT. There has a proposition come here, not recommended by the Committee on Appropriations, not asked for by the executive department of the Government, to spend some $25,000 for the benefit of the city of St. Louis.

Mr. HERBERT. A proposition is made here—not recommended by the Committee on Appropriations and not asked for by the Executive Department of the Government having this matter in charge—to spend some $25,000 in the city of St. Louis——

Mr. CLARDY, Mr. DOCKERY, and others. Oh, no; $6,000.

Mr. HERBERT. To spend $6,000 or $7,000 in the city of St. Louis. I can see a reason—whether a good one or not—why the Representatives from the State of Missouri, Democrats and Republicans, should rush forward in solid phalanx, and, although this office is of no use in the world according to the opinion of the Department, express their desire that this money be spent there. But I can not see any reason why the Representatives of other States than Missouri should vote away the people's money in this manner. It does seem to me——

Mr. CLARDY. The gentleman will permit me to say that we have there a building which is dedicated to this use—a building which cost a considerable amount of money; and the furniture and other appurtenances of the office cost alone some ten or twelve thousand dollars.

Mr. HERBERT. Notwithstanding all that, the Secretary of the Treasury, having no doubt taken all the facts into consideration, sends in here approvingly this recommendation of the Director of the Mint in favor of discontinuing the office. Yet the gentlemen here ask us to vote this money for a purpose which is utterly useless, according to the estimate of the appropriate administrative department of the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS obtained the floor.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. It is a piece of reckless——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIAMS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to call the attention of the committee to a report in regard to the business at the St. Louis assay office during the last five or six years. In 1882 the earnings of that office were $111.16; the expenditures $11,880.65.

Mr. CLARDY. That was for the purchase of furniture for the office.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the gentleman will keep quiet. It is the wounded dove that flutters.

In 1883 the earnings of the office were $414.32; the expenditures $5,372.03. In 1884 the earnings were $676.82; the expenditures $5,338.51. In 1885 the earnings were $783.65; the expenditures $6,500.01. In six years the earnings of that office have been $3,385.90; the expenditures $39,811.93.

Mr. CLARDY. Now will the gentleman read the earnings and expenditures of some of the other assay offices?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not yield to the gentleman. The difference between the earnings and expenditures of that office during six years is more than $36,000. I read these figures in reply to my friend from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], whose clarion voice, ever since the assembling of this Congress, has been raised in favor of "retrenchment and reform." In view of the previous speeches of the gentleman and his present position, I am led to realize that "consistency is a jewel;" but it is not found in the lexicon of the gentleman from Missouri. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAND. The same argument used by the gentleman who has just taken his seat would abolish every other assay office except the New York assay office. The St. Louis office comes as near paying expenses from its receipts as any of these offices. Let us abolish all of them, if we are going to abolish one.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I merely want to say to the committee that at the New York assay office, which has been mentioned here, the deposits last year were $61,000,000. The deposits at the St. Louis office last year were $112,000; the expenditures $5,300, and the earnings $696. At Helena the deposits were $1,449,000; the earnings, $3,600; the expenditures, $25,000.

It has always been the policy in mining regions of the country—at Helena, at Boisé, at Denver—to maintain these assay offices as a matter of convenience to the Government and also to the miner. This much encouragement has been believed to be due to the mining interests. I do not know whether there are mines down in the vicinity of St. Louis or not.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The gentleman should know that the ores from all the New Mexico mines come to St. Louis.

Mr. BLAND. And the refiners at St. Louis refine over $4,000,000 worth of ores every year.

Mr. CANNON. The deposits at the St. Louis office in the year 1887 were $112,000 all told.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Is not that a great deal?

Mr. CANNON. The expenses in the same year were $5,300, and the earnings $696.

Now, I think there is good reason for continuing this assay office at St. Louis. I want to be fair. I rather like my friend from St. Louis [Mr. O'NEILL]. I am told that within the last few weeks there has been a change at that office; that the old assayer—I do not know whether he was a "blasted Republican" or not, but I suppose he was—has resigned or been removed, and that a new assayer, who, presumably, will conduct the office in the interest of the Democratic party, has been appointed. Now, if we do not make this appropriation there will not be a place for that man!

I live within a couple of hundred miles of St. Louis, and while most of my business relations are with Chicago, I once in awhile go down to St. Louis. What are we to do with this new official unless we continue this appropriation? It is true that Mr. Kimball, the Director of the Mint, says there is no use for this office; it is true that the earnings of the office last year were only $696; it is true there are no mines in the vicinity of that office; but it occurs to me that in the Mississippi Valley (speaking kindly of my Democratic friends) that office is needed in their interest, at least in the interest of the assayer who holds the place.

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not wish to consume time further than to reply briefly to what might seem to be a very proper inference from the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT]. From that gentleman's observations, unless they were humorous (and I am advised that they were), he would appear to be impressed with the idea that the members of the delegation from the State of Missouri, regardless of politics, are supporting this item because of the fact that the assay office is located in Missouri. Now, as I understand, the members of our delegation are not mere politicians, but are imbued with the spirit of statesmanship. I am sure we would not insist upon a continuance of this office if we did not feel that the public service demands it. I sincerely hope the Committee of the Whole will vote to continue the appropriation.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, there were—ayes 40, noes 16.

Mr. RANDALL. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL.]

Mr. RANDALL. I will not insist on the point of no quorum if we can have a vote in the House.

Mr. BLAND. Let us have a vote now; we might as well settle it now as at any other time.

Mr. RANDALL. If members do this they must do it on their own responsibility.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will take their places.

Mr. DOCKERY. I suggest that the point of no quorum be withdrawn, as one-fifth of the House will certainly be in favor of ordering the yeas and nays.

Mr. HERBERT. We ought to have a yea-and-nay vote, so as to show that those who wish to put this increase upon us come from the Republican side of the House.

Mr. DOCKERY. I beg pardon, this proposition did not come from the other side of the House.

Mr. HERBERT. The votes in favor of it come from the other side of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I repeat my proposition, that if we are allowed a yea-and-nay vote in the House on this proposition I will withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I do not see why this should be an exceptionable case.

Mr. RANDALL. It is because it should be an exceptionable one.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Two-thirds are in favor of it.

Mr. RANDALL. I insist on my point.

Mr. BLAND. We will have a vote in the House on this proposition anyhow, and I ask my colleague to withdraw his objection and agree to a yea-and-nay vote in the House.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Does the gentleman withdraw his point of no quorum?

Mr. RANDALL. No, and I do not intend to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman to withdraw his point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not. If we are allowed to have a vote upon this proposition in the House I will withdraw it. That is what I said in the beginning and that is what I have said all along, and I now repeat it.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The gentleman can demand a yea-and-nay vote when we get into the House.

Mr. BLAND. We are willing to leave that to the House when the time comes.

Mr. RANDALL. I want a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. CLARDY. I suggest to my colleague to accept the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL].

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. It only takes one-fifth to order the yeas and nays, and if there are one-fifth opposed to this, they can order the yeas and nays in the House.

Mr. DOCKERY. We are not afraid of going upon the record.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. Let the gentleman withdraw his point of no quorum.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 119, noes 55.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Territory of Dakota: For salary of governor, $2,600; chief-justice and five associate judges, at $3,000 each; and secretary, at $1,800, $22,400.

For legislative expenses, namely: For per diem and mileage of twenty-four members of the council and forty-eight members of the house of representatives of the Legislative Assembly, $31,750; compensation of officers of Legislative Assembly, $3,060; printing, $3,750; stationery and blanks for secretary's office and for Legislative Assembly, fuel and lights, messenger and porter, and care of Government property, clerk in secretary's office, repairs and purchase of furniture, and incidental expenses, $4,300; in all, $42,860.

For contingent expenses, to be expended by the governor, $500.

Mr. GIFFORD. I wish to submit some remarks in response to what was said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] the other day.

The CHAIRMAN. What amendment does the gentleman move?

Mr. GIFFORD. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand there are a number of gentlemen who wish to be heard in reference to the provisions for the Territories contained in this bill, and I ask, by unanimous consent, the debate be limited to twenty minutes.

Mr. GIFFORD. I only wish to occupy a moment. I do not wish to occupy any more time than is necessary, and if I can secure unanimous consent to print my remarks in the RECORD I will be content.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER. I also ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a reply to what the gentleman has to say.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. I now move that twenty minutes be allowed for debate on this Territorial question.

Mr. WARNER. I object. I do not think I will require more than ten minutes, but it may be that I shall need fifteen minutes or twenty minutes. I do not want to be cramped by any limitation.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest, then, that the debate be limited to twenty minutes, ten minutes of which shall be given to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER].

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. WARNER. I am content if I may be permitted to occupy ten or fifteen minutes myself; but I believe that there are other gentlemen who desire to be heard.

Mr. RANDALL. I want, if possible, to limit debate on this whole Territorial question.

Mr. WARNER. I could not consent to that.

Mr. DOCKERY. How much time do you want?

Mr. WARNER. I will say fifteen or twenty minutes, although it is possible I may not use more than ten minutes; still I would like to have that much time at my disposal.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, then, say thirty minutes in all—twenty minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. WARNER. That is entirely satisfactory to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the request to the committee. Is there objection to limiting debate on all paragraphs relating to the Territories and amendments thereto which may be presented to thirty minutes, of which time twenty minutes shall be allowed the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. CAREY. Do I understand that that applies to all the Territories?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir; to all.

Mr. CAREY. I think that ought not to be done, then.

Mr. KERR. Do I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to mean that the total time be so limited, or that there is to be that much time to each of the Territories?

Mr. RANDALL. For all the Territories.

Mr. GIFFORD. Before any motion is made limiting debate, I wish to make a point of order upon the first proposition embodied in this paragraph.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I submit to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he had better confine his suggestion to Dakota and limit the debate upon that, as I believe we will save time by it.

Mr. RANDALL. I am willing, then, to fix thirty minutes for Dakota and ten minutes to the other Territories.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. But there are gentlemen here who desire to call attention to some matters connected with their Territories. I have no doubt we will save time by according to them a certain consideration in the matter and giving them some time in the discussion. I would suggest that the gentleman from Pennsylvania agree to fix thirty minutes for Dakota.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Dakota rises to a question of order.

Mr. GIFFORD. I want to make the point of order upon that provision of the bill providing for the salary of the governor of the Territory of Dakota $2,600.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Dakota.

Mr. GIFFORD. My point of order is this: that the provision in the first paragraph which has been read, providing for the salary of the governor of Dakota at $2,600, is not in accordance with the existing law, and hence I make the point of order upon it. The law governing the salary of that official, permit me to call the attention of the Chair, will be found on page 327 of the Revised Statutes, section 1845, in the following words:

On and after the 10th day of July, 1873, the annual salary of the governors of the several Territories shall be $3,500.

And then goes on to provide for the salaries of secretaries, etc.

Now I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the sum of $2,600, as provided in this bill for that salary, is not a sufficient sum. The people of the Territory through its Legislature have appropriated the sum of $1,000, in addition to what was appropriated as a salary for the governor by the laws of Congress, not because they specially appreciated his services, but because they found that it was absolutely necessary, in order to properly conduct the business of the office, that he should have a private secretary; and if the statutory amount, fixed as the salary of the governor, is appropriated, it will obviate the necessity of our people paying for a private secretary for the governor.

I state that substantially as the point of order.

Mr. BREWER. What does the existing statute provide?

Mr. GIFFORD. Thirty-five hundred dollars is his salary.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to know of the gentleman from Alabama what the existing law provides on this subject. The question of order is raised that the amount here fixed is not in accordance with the statute. Is that correct?

Mr. FORNEY. I understand that the salary, as provided by law, is $3,500, but it has been fixed at $2,600 for the past twelve years, and the committee did not propose to change the policy of the Democratic and Republican parties in that respect.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that this salary may have been put below the figure fixed by the statute in the appropriation bills for several years past, and placed there correctly, under the rules existing prior to the Forty-ninth Congress, which allowed amendments or provisions in appropriation bills to reduce expenditures in the manner suggested here, that is, by cutting down salaries; but the last Congress took from the Committee on Appropriations any authority to repeat that proceeding, and the Supreme Court of the United States have held that the several appropriation bills within the last ten years reducing the amount fixed by a permanent law are simply reductions pro tanto, and leave the general statute remaining. Therefore the Chair must determine under the rule of the House that this is new legislation and subject to the point of order.

The effect of the ruling will be to strike out the sum of $2,600.

Mr. GIFFORD. I move to fill the blank by inserting $3,500.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 44, noes 40.

Mr. FORNEY. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. FORNEY and Mr. GIFFORD were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 47, noes 61.

So, no further count being demanded, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FORNEY. I ask unanimous consent to fill the blank with the sum of $2,600.

Mr. GIFFORD. If I have the right of objection, I shall object to that.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I object on behalf of the Delegate from Dakota.

[Mr. WARNER withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. SPRINGER rose.

Mr. RANDALL. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not think I will need more than five minutes to answer everything the gentleman has said.

Mr. RANDALL. I will allow the gentleman five minutes with the understanding that when he has finished, the further discussion on this subject foreign to this bill shall then be closed.

Mr. STRUBLE. That is the way in which we inaugurate the tariff discussion.

Mr. CANNON. Wait until my colleague has concluded what he wishes to say and then we can tell about the closing of debate. I object until I have heard my colleague.

Mr. RANDALL. It is only right to give gentlemen time to reply.

Mr. CANNON. I think so, and therefore I think the debate should not be closed now.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. CANNON. Yes, I do for the present.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, this is the first time that I have ever heard it urged here on the floor of this House that the number of bushels of wheat or corn which might be raised in any particular locality was to be the test of the right of such locality to admission as one of the States of this Union. That, however, is the argument my friend from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] makes, and the reason he gives for opposing the admission of New Mexico as a State into the Union is that that Territory does not raise as much wheat and corn as Dakota does.

Mr. DORSEY. One of the reasons.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, one of the reasons; and he goes on to make a comparison between New Mexico and Dakota in regard to the amount of wheat and corn raised in these two Territories respectively.

If that is to be the standard adopted here, I will refer the gentleman to the State of Maine; and he will find that there were fewer bushels of corn raised in Maine in the census year 1880 than in New Mexico, and therefore on that ground Maine should be put out of the Union and allowed to remain out until she had increased her corn crop.

Mr. STRUBLE. That is heavy logic.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does that exhaust the mental effort? [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. No; but it exhausts the argument of my friend from Missouri.

Mr. REED. No doubt the gentleman from Illinois would like to keep Maine out. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Oh, no; not so long as the distinguished gentleman from Maine is sent here as a Representative from that State.

Mr. WARNER. I trust the gentleman will not misstate my argument.

Mr. REED. Oh, you can stand it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Of course; anybody who could have stood the gentleman's argument on the tariff bill for an hour and a half the other day could stand my five minutes' talk, I am sure.

Now, then, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri, and of gentlemen on the other side of the House generally, to the fact that thirteen years ago every member upon that side of the House, with one or two exceptions, voted to admit New Mexico into the Union as a State. Every Republican in the other end of the Capitol at that time also voted for her admission.

During the Forty-third Congress a bill to provide an enabling act for New Mexico passed the House, May 21, 1874, by a vote of 160 yeas to 54 nays, a majority of nearly three-fourths. At the second session of that Congress, on February 24, the same bill passed the Senate, with slight amendments changing the time for the elections, by a vote of yeas 32, nays 11, a majority of nearly three-fourths. It received almost the solid Republican vote of both Houses at that time.

Now, if you will look at the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 3, 1875, you will find that a motion was made to suspend the rules, concur in the Senate amendments to the bill, and thus to pass the bill to admit New Mexico into the Union as a State. The motion was made in this House on the last night of the session, and a yea-and-nay vote taken upon it, and every Republican in the House at that time, with only one exception, I believe, voted to admit New Mexico into the Union. The vote on suspension was—yeas 154, nays 87, not voting 47. It required a change of but 6 votes to have given the necessary two-thirds to adopt the motion.

Mr. STRUBLE. On thirty minutes' debate?

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir; there was no debate——

Mr. CANNON. How did the Democrats vote?

Mr. SPRINGER. They generally voted in the negative, but a great many voted in the affirmative, of course, or the motion to suspend the rules could not have come within six votes of the number required to make the necessary two-thirds. Among those who voted in the affirmative, that is in favor of the admission of New Mexico into the Union, on the several votes in the House and in the Senate were every Republican Senator and Representative in that Congress with one or two exceptions, a very few exceptions at least. Among the Republicans in this House who voted in the affirmative were such well known leaders of the party as Messrs. Burchard, of Illinois; Benjamin F. Butler, of Massachusetts; Roderick R. Butler, of Tennessee; Conger, of Michigan; DAWES, of Massachusetts; Dunnell, of Minnesota; FARWELL, of Illinois; HARMER, of Pennsylvania; Hubbell, of Ohio: Casson, of Iowa; William Lawrence, of Ohio; Maynard, of Tennessee; McCrary, of Iowa; McNulta, of Illinois; Monroe, of Ohio, and many others.

Amongst those, also, who voted for the proposition at that time to admit New Mexico as a State I find the name of my genial friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]. I also find voting in the same way my genial friend and colleague from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. [Laughter.]

At the next session of Congress—the Forty-fourth Congress—a bill for the admission of New Mexico passed the Senate by a large majority, but failed in the House.

Mr. Chairman, New Mexico was thought worthy by the Republicans in that Congress to be admitted into this Union thirteen years ago, and received nearly a two-thirds vote, and almost the total vote of the Republicans of the House of Representatives. Why was she then deemed worthy of admission? I will tell gentlemen. The reason was because she had sent a Republican Delegate here, and gentlemen supposed therefore that she was reliably Republican. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] And yet gentlemen are entirely non-partisan. They never have any party feeling in the admission of a State into the Union. Oh, no; it is entirely a non-political matter with them. There is no element of politics entering into it. Partisanism is the last thing they ever think of when considering the admission of new States into the Union. It is the last thing that ever occurs to the minds of our friends on the other side. But yet thirteen years ago the Territory of New Mexico, which raised so few bushels of wheat and corn and has so few school-houses now, was deemed well worthy of admission as one of the sisterhood of States. Why is she not now?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, she has gone backwards since then.

Mr. SPRINGER. She has not gone backwards since then, because the census shows that she has nearly doubled her population, and the minority of the committee in their views show that great advance has been made in recent years.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. They had no railroads then.

Mr. SPRINGER. No, they had no railroads then. But the Republicans are now all interested in keeping New Mexico out of the Union. The trouble with New Mexico is that the land titles there have been in dispute for many years and they are still in dispute. And some provision will have to be adopted by Congress to remove the clouds upon the titles which have rested upon them ever since the settlement of the Territory. That is the great impediment to its growth and development. Let us remove this impediment and the growth of New Mexico will compare favorably with the growth of any other Territory in this Union, and you will find that she will not be backward in development of her resources, but worthy to take her place in the sisterhood of States as a great and powerful State. But the gentleman has said that a great portion of the land in New Mexico will not produce without irrigation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND took the floor and yielded to Mr. SPRINGER.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understood that I was to have ten minutes in my own right, according to the agreement. But I repeat, the gentleman said that a large portion of this land was valueless for agricultural purposes without irrigation. I concede it. But what of that? It is a fact that fully one-half of the inhabitants of the globe live and gather sustenance on lands that will not produce crops without irrigation; and in New Mexico in a very few years they will have an extensive system of irrigation; they will have reclamation of these vast wastes of arid lands, and then she will produce cereals not only for sustenance for her own population, but a surplus for exportation to foreign nations.

Mr. Chairman, I have no patience in listening to any person who tries to decry or belittle any portion of these United States, any portion of its people, or any portion of its territory. It is all good. It is all better than you will find anywhere else in the world. I am proud of it. I am proud to be a citizen of a country like this, and I want to hasten the time when all these Territories will be brought into the Union on an equal footing with the other States.

I am in favor of that, and I assert the only party in favor of the admission of Dakota into the Union as one State at this time is the Democratic party. And I am satisfied of this, for when it is proposed to admit Dakota as one State every member on the other side will vote against it. I know I am right in making that assertion. And yet gentlemen say we are keeping Dakota out of the Union. We are simply resisting her division into two parts, and in doing that we are carrying out the wishes of the people of the Territory.

Mr. STRUBLE. Oh, no.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir; we are carrying out the wishes of the people of Dakota. Every county except two in North Dakota gave a majority against being set off by themselves; and we have as much right to regard the wishes of the people of North Dakota as we have to regard the wishes of a portion of the southern part of the Territory that desires now to be set off by itself and secede from the other.

Mr. REED. Secede! Does the gentleman understand the difference between the secession of the Territory and the secession of the Southern States?

Mr. SPRINGER. Precisely the same principle is involved.

Mr. REED. You are sincere in that statement?

Mr. SPRINGER. I am sincere and the gentleman from Maine is not. The gentleman from Maine is never sincere on a question of this kind. I never saw him sincere on a question where the interests of his party were involved. Nevertheless, he always assumes a sincerity which he denies to anybody else, especially on this side of the House.

The fact is that less than half the number of counties in the Territory of Dakota desire to be set up as a separate State by themselves, and three-fourths of the area of the whole Territory is resisting that movement. The Democratic party in this House is resisting that movement, and the Democratic party in the country will resist that movement at the election in November and in the next Congress.

I say to gentlemen on that side of the House and to the people of Dakota that never, so far as I am concerned and if I can prevent it, shall that Territory be dismembered and divided into two separate parts. It is the policy of the Democratic party to keep the Territory united; and in that policy we will be sustained not only by the people of Dakota, but by the people outside of Dakota. Those who shall resist her dismemberment will in after time be regarded as the benefactors of that State, and the people who shall hereafter inhabit that great and powerful State will rejoice in their union as we now rejoice in the Union of these States.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON. My colleague [Mr. SPRINGER] has made one of the most effective speeches I have heard from him during all the long years of our service here. Let us see wherein lies the strength of his argument. He wanders back to the first Congress in which I served, in 1874, and speaks of its work. He says I voted to admit New Mexico at that time to the sisterhood of States. I recollect it very well. Colorado then knocked at the door for admission and was admitted, and well has she proven the wisdom of our action. At the same session New Mexico, substantially as well qualified then as now, knocked for admission. Upon the single proposition of admitting her I voted ay. Therefore, my colleague argues that his omnibus bill to admit New Mexico, Washington, Montana, and Dakota should pass.

Mr. SPRINGER. Oh, no; I did not say that at all.

Mr. CANNON. If my colleague's statement means anything, it means that. I did so vote. I may have been right or I may have been wrong; but I stand ready to vote in this Congress upon the question of the admission of New Mexico when she comes on her own merits and knocks singly for admission; when she comes saying, "Let me in; I attach no conditions to my admission." But when New Mexico comes and says, "I not only demand admission, but I also demand that the whole of Dakota shall only constitute one State, and I will tie myself onto that proposition and link with it the admission of Montana and Washington, and you shall take that proposition or nothing," I say by my vote no, no; let every tub stand on its own bottom; let each Territory stand upon its own merits.

Mr. Chairman, let us talk a minute about the proposal of my colleague in insisting that Dakota shall be admitted as one State or not admitted at all. Dakota is a magnificent body of land. Its area is 149,100 square miles, an area equal to that of New York, Connecticut, Delaware, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Vermont, New Jersey, Rhode Island, and one-fourth of Pennsylvania. These States send twenty Senators to the Congress of the United States and have twenty Senatorial electors in the electoral college. The greatest strain upon the Union in the near future is to come from the representation of the small States in the Senate being equal to that of the large States. Delaware, with but one Representative and no prospect of any more, is equal in the Senate to Illinois with her twenty Representatives, which are to constantly increase. I have an interest in the matter of the admission of Dakota. The whole Mississippi Valley has an interest in it. I say that Dakota shall not be admitted as one State only by my vote with but two representatives in the United States Senate, while the south half of that Territory alone has now, still in her swaddling clothes, a greater population than Rhode Island and Delaware combined, and has the capacity in the near future to support a population equal to all New England.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] has spoken of the wonderful development of Dakota, her production of wheat, corn, and oats. Her material progress has been wonderful, but I call my colleague's attention to the fact that Dakota's territory is situated in the latitudes where in all time men, strong, intelligent men, have been produced; men who have founded states and maintained civilizations.

Sir, the territory within Dakota should be so carved into States when admitted that each State in the near future will have something near an equal strength in the Senate of the United States with others of the larger States. The south half of Dakota, with the great Sioux reservation still wholly unsettled, has a population large enough for three Representatives. This population in every respect is equal to any population in the States. It is the very cream of the population from the States. Yet Dakota sits silent without representation. My colleague and his party have determined in caucus that she shall remain silent and without representation, in any event, until after the coming Presidential election, and even after that, unless she consents to come in as one State and at the same time drag with her the other three Territories. I am willing to go to the country with my colleague upon that issue. The Republican party is willing to go to the country upon that issue, and we will take the verdict of the country as to whether or no that kind of bulldozing shall obtain in the American Congress. [Applause on the Republican side.]

[Mr. JOSEPH withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph be closed.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Territory of Idaho: For salary of governor, $2,600; chief justice and two associate judges, at $3,000 each; and secretary, at $1,800, $13,400.

For legislative expenses, namely: For per diem of president and members of council, and of speaker and members of house of representatives, $8,880; per diem of employés of council and house of representatives, $3,000; mileage of members of council and house of representatives, $5,900; printing the laws and journals and incidental printing for Legislative Assembly, $3,200; stationery for use of Legislative Assembly, lamps, oils, brooms, and dusters for legislative halls and committee-rooms, rent of legislative halls and committee-rooms, extra clerk-hire for secretary's office during session of Legislature, fuel for secretary's office, extra messenger during session of Legislature, new files and desk, official printing and stationery, rent of office for secretary and clerk, library, department, and storage rooms, furniture for secretary's office, ice, clerk-hire, messenger, and porter, carpet and furniture for clerk's office, oil, lamps, brooms, and dusters, postage and rent of post-office box, seals, repairs to furniture, and incidental expenses, $5,815; in all, $26,855.

Mr. DUBOIS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend lines 1 and 2, page 60, by striking out two thousand six hundred and substituting three thousand five hundred.

Amend lines 4 and 5 by striking out one thousand eight hundred and inserting two thousand five hundred.

Amend lines 3 and 4, page 61, by striking out five hundred and inserting one thousand.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr Chairman, the salaries of the governers of the Territories, as fixed by law of Congress, is $3,500, and the salaries of secretaries of Territories is $2,500 per annum. This bill appropriates $2,600 for salary of governor, and $1,800 for salary of secretary.

For what particular reason the law has been disregarded it seems hard to determine. The cost of living in the Territories is greater than in the States, the Territory to be governed is much larger in extent, the traveling expenses are at least twice as great, and it does certainly seem as if Congress should appropriate the salaries as fixed by statute. The contingent fund of the governor, formerly $1,000, has been reduced to $500.

This sum is entirely inadequate. Out of the $500 the governor of my Territory has to pay clerk-hire, janitor, postage, lights, stationery, and all other expenses of the office. The statement which I have made is applicable to every other Territory except Alaska. For some reason the committee have seen fit to give the governor of that Territory $3,000, and $2,000 for a contingent fund. I do not object to this, and think the sum not too large, but contend that it is an additional reason why the governors of the other Territories should have the amount fixed by law. It is not a fair argument to say these officers can sue the Government in the Court of Claims. It is not fair or just to compel them to go to this trouble and expense. They earn the salary named in my amendment, which is given them by statute.

The law of Congress gives only $28,000 per annum for the support of the Territory of Idaho, including the pay of the officers appointed by the President, and it occurs to me that Congress can fairly do nothing less than appropriate this sum.

The fact that the governor of Idaho is a Democrat makes no difference to me. By some mistake or oversight, or because the politicians from Kentucky, Indiana, and the "Sunny South" were not as alert as usual, he was appointed from the Territory, and in consequence is entirely satisfactory to all our people. His twenty years' residence in the Territory make his services peculiarly valuable to Idaho, as he understands her wants, and takes a pride in her prosperity. He surely should have the salary voted him, which Congress has deemed proper to fix by statute.

The secretary of the Territory is one of the few relics of civil service left in the country, and stands conspicuous as an illustrious example of that somewhat neglected policy. His political life will end, however, before he can enjoy the benefits of this amendment, if passed, and in candor I am contending for fairness toward his Democratic successor.

Mr. FORNEY. I only wish to say that we have given the Territory of Idaho all that is asked in the estimates.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. DUBOIS, there were—ayes 41, noes 53.

Mr. DUBOIS. No quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. DUBOIS and Mr. FORNEY were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 41, noes 61.

Mr. DUBOIS. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next paragraph.

Mr. FORNEY. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BLOUNT reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9377) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HATCH, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported a bill (H. R. 10233) making an appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I reserve all points of order on the bill just reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All points of order will be reserved.

MILITARY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. 10234) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I desire to reserve all points of order on the bill just reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey reserves all points of order.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

The message further announced that the following bills had been presented to the President May 8, 1888, and not having been returned by him to the House of Congress in which they originated within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution, they had become laws without his approval:

An act (H. R. 1697) for the erection of a public building in the city of Asheville, N. C.; and

An act (H. R. 2664) for the relief of Francis Daniels.

The message further announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 8464) for the relief of Merchants' National Bank of Poughkeepsie, N. Y.;

An act (H. R. 7348) granting to the city of Grand Forks, Dak., the right to build two free bridges across Red River;

An act (H. R. 7319) for the relief of Emory R. Seward;

An act (H. R. 6831) to detach the county of Audrain, in the State of Missouri, from the eastern and attach it to the western judicial district of said State;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 148) to print 12,500 copies of the eulogies on Seth C. Moffatt, a Representative in Congress;

An act (H. R. 671) for the relief of the heirs of John S. Fillmore, deceased;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 95) to enable the President of the United States to extend to certain inhabitants of Japan a suitable recognition of their humane treatment of the survivors of the crew of the American bark Cashmere;

An act (H. R. 1473) authorizing the President of the United States to arrange a conference between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico, Central and South America, Hayti, San Domingo, and the Empire of Brazil;

An act (H. R. 7936) to restore to the public domain a part of the Uintah Valley Indian reservation, in the Territory of Utah, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. 4358) to increase the limit of cost for the public building in course of erection at Charleston, S. C.;

An act (H. R. 1645) to limit the hours that letter-carriers in cities shall be employed per day;

An act (H. R. 2699) for the relief of the heirs of the late Solomon Spitzer;

An act (H. R. 639) to authorize Commander John W. Philip, United States Navy, to accept a silver pitcher from the Government of the United States of Colombia;

An act (H. R. 5683) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to complete a contract for the sale of certain real estate of Job Barnard;

An act (H. R. 9793) authorizing a loan of arms and equipments to the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company; and

An act (H. R. 2928) granting a pension to William Lemons.

PAY OF CONGRESSIONAL EMPLOYÉS FOR MAY.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a Senate joint resolution (S. R. 87) authorizing and directing the payment of the salaries of the officers and employés of Congress for the month of May, 1888.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read, subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and are hereby, authorized and directed to pay the officers and employés of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of May, 1888, on the 29th day of said month.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered, read three times, and passed.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES OBRION.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 6602) for the relief of James Obrion, and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to James Obrion, late a deputy collector of the first Tennessee district, the sum of $210.10, the amount paid by him under the direction of the collector in suppressing illicit distilleries in said district, as is fully shown by the records in the Internal-Revenue Office.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being read the third time, was passed.

Mr. BUTLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OBSTRUCTION TO NAVIGATION, BROAD CREEK, DELAWARE.

Mr. PENINGTON. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the bill (S. 2123) to authorize the removal of an obstruction to the navigation of Broad Creek, in the State of Delaware, and put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the bridge over Broad Creek, a navigable stream upon which improvements have been made by appropriations authorized by Congress, erected and maintained by the Delaware Railroad Company and its lessee, near the town of Laurel, in the State of Delaware, is hereby declared to be an obstruction to the navigation of said Broad Creek and detrimental to the commerce thereof.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to serve upon the said Delaware Railroad Company and its lessee, in the manner prescribed by the laws of the State of Delaware for the service of papers upon corporations, a notice in writing, requiring said company or its lessee, within three months from the time of such notice, to remove said obstruction by placing in said bridge and maintaining therein a draw of sufficient width and dimensions to admit the free and easy passage of all steam-boats and other vessels navigating said stream; and in case of refusal or neglect of said railroad company or its lessee to place in said bridge a suitable draw as required by the aforesaid notice, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to cause a draw to be placed therein, and the cost and expense of such draw shall be a legal charge against the said railroad company and its lessee.

SEC. 3. That such sum of money as may be necessary to execute the provisions of this act by the Secretary of War is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to be paid out on the requisition of the Secretary of War.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would like to know if that has been reported by any committee of this House.

Mr. PENINGTON. It has been reported by the Committee on Commerce. I ask that the report be read.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not demand the reading of the report; I only wanted to know if it had been reported by a committee.

Mr. PENINGTON. It has been reported by the Committee on Commerce, and has the indorsement of the Engineer-in-Chief of the War Department.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading, and being read the third time, was passed.

Mr. PENINGTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FORTS ROBINSON AND NIOBRARA, NEBR.

Mr. DORSEY. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5654) to provide for the completion of quarters, barracks, and stables at Fort Robinson and Fort Niobrara, in the State of Nebraska.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

JOHN H. MARION.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up for present consideration the bill (S. 1772) for the relief of John H. Marion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That John H. Marion, of Prescott, Ariz., is hereby relieved from the payment of $1,042.45, claimed to be due from the said John H. Marion to the Government of the United States on account of the non-fulfillment of a contract for hay made with the chief quartermaster, Department of Arizona, dated Whipple Barracks, May 15, 1884.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report be read.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. I think if the gentleman will permit me I can make a brief statement that will satisfy him.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. This bill relieves this contractor from the difference in price between a lot of hay he undertook to furnish to the quartermaster and the price paid by the latter in open market for a different and better quality.

Marion contracted to deliver a quantity of gramma hay at a certain price; but owing to the drought he was unable to do so. Hay of the same quality could not be bought in the market for the same reason; and the same quantity of a better quality was bought, and he was charged with the difference in price. It is usually understood that owing to the difficulties of getting this hay in that arid region, all contracts reserve the exception that they will be complied with unless the act of Providence prevents their fulfillment. In this case it was impossible to comply with the contract, owing to the drought; and this bill is to relieve him from the payment of a sum claimed to be due on account of the non-fulfillment of the contract.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, was passed.

Mr. HERBERT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then (the hour of 5 o'clock having arrived) the Speaker pro tempore declared the House adjourned.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (H. R. 6602) for the relief of James Obrion; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 1772) for the relief of John H. Marion; and
A bill (S. 2123) to authorize the removal of an obstruction to the navigation of Broad Creek, in the State of Delaware.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 1978) for the erection of a public building in Paterson, N. J.;
A bill (S. 401) granting a pension to Jeannie Stone; and
Joint resolution (S. R. 87) authorizing and directing the payment of the salaries of the officers and employés of Congress for the month of May, 1888.

PUBLIC BUILDING IN YOUNGSTOWN—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I return without approval Senate bill No. 347, entitled "An act to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Youngstown, Ohio."

By the census of 1880 the population of Youngstown appears to be 15,435. It is claimed by those urging the erection of a public building there that its population has nearly doubled since that date. The amount appropriated in the bill herewith returned is $75,000. There does not seem to be any governmental purpose to which such a building could be properly devoted except the accommodation of the post-office.

I have listened to an unusual amount of personal representation in favor of this bill from parties whose desires I should be glad to meet on this or any other question. But none of them have insisted that there is any present governmental need of the proposed new building even for postal purposes. On the contrary I am informed that the post-office is at present well accommodated in quarters held under a lease which does not expire, I believe, until 1892. A letter addressed to the postmaster at Youngstown containing certain questions bearing upon the necessity of a new building failed to elicit a reply. This fact is very unusual and extraordinary, for the postmaster can almost always be relied upon to make an exhibit of the great necessity of larger quarters when a new public building is in prospect.

The fact was communicated to me early in the present session of the Congress that the aggregate sum of the appropriations contained in bills for the erection and extension of public buildings which had up to that time been referred to the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was about $37,000,000.

Of course this fact would have no particular relevancy if all the buildings asked for were necessary for the transaction of public business, as long as we have the money to pay for them. But inasmuch as a large number of the buildings proposed are unnecessary, and their erection would be wasteful and extravagant, beside furnishing precedents for further and more extended reckless expenditures of a like character, it seems to me that applications for new and expensive public buildings should be carefully scrutinized.

I am satisfied that the appropriation of $75,000 for a building at Youngstown is at present not justified.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 28, 1888.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the people of the county in which Youngstown is situated, and the people of the State of Ohio, and I think of the whole country, will be very much surprised at the contents of this veto message. What our people like is impartiality. Here is one of the most flourishing, rapidly growing towns in the United States, full of thriving industries, with a large postal revenue, containing now probably 30,000 inhabitants, in the midst of a rapidly developing country, in a region where the people have many natural facilities, such as natural gas and other advantages for manufacturing, a population composed of all classes of producers, mechanics, miners, manufacturers, farmers, actively employed in a great diversity of industries, with a post-office yielding about $30,000 a year in actual receipts.

I venture to say that the President of the United States has signed over and over again bills providing for post-offices in cities of comparative insignificance. He has allowed bills to pass without his signature. He allowed a bill to pass to erect a public building at Portsmouth, in the State of Ohio, which does not contain the population of Youngstown.

The reasons given seem to me to be paltry, to use perhaps not a very polite phrase, but they are. He says he addressed a communication to the postmaster, and the postmaster did not reply. Why did he not turn out the postmaster, then, for failing in proper respect to his superior executive officer? Because the postmaster did not reply and give the information, therefore he vetoes a bill which affects the interests of every citizen of Youngstown. I have no doubt they can survive it; but I believe myself in the policy, and I am told the President favors a line of policy which will build post-offices in every town of four or five thousand inhabitants.

He has been quoted as being in favor of a bill reported by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, for which I intend to vote whenever it is amended and put in proper form. I would vote for such a bill; but the President vetoes a bill for a post-office building in this large and flourishing community, more than twice the size of many of the cities for which he has been willing to provide post-office buildings.

Mr. President, I do think that where the veto power is asserted on these local matters not affecting any question of constitutional power, not even affecting any question of discretionary power, in mere matters of detail like a bill providing for a post-office building or the like—when the veto power is asserted for the purpose of arresting the action of Congress on this class of bills, both Houses of Congress ought to rise and assert its power. Both Houses of Congress have by a unanimous vote passed this bill. They sent it to the President. The views which he utters in his veto message will not find weight with members of either House of Congress, because both Houses of Congress are committed to the policy of erecting public buildings in reasonable and proper places, and they have exercised that power over and over again.

Let Congress assert its power; and I speak in the utmost kindness for the President of the United States, for I feel nothing but kindness for him; I like him in many respects; but when he undertakes to put his veto power against both Houses of Congress, where the vote was unanimous and where the principle is clear and no mistake has been made, and where no reason is given for the veto, then Congress abnegates its power and surrenders its authority to pass laws if it sustains him, and the constitutional veto might as well be the absolute veto of a Roman emperor or the No of the Russian Czar, a perpetual veto rather than a mere motion to reconsider a bill, which the Constitution provides for doing, so that both Houses of Congress may, upon that reconsideration, with perfect kindness and sincerity, pass the bill notwithstanding the objections of the President.

I therefore ask that the bill lie upon the table unless some Senator wants to have it referred. There has been a full report giving all the details. I should like to have it lie on the table, and at some proper time I shall call it up in the hope that the Senate will pass it notwithstanding the veto.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, the course usually pursued in regard to vetoes sent us from the President of the United States is that the bill should go to the appropriate committee——

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to a reference if the Senator thinks fit.

Mr. VEST. And then let the bill be reported back to the Senate; and it seems to me the proper time for discussion would be then and not now.

I wish to say a word in reply to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. Upon that point will the Senator allow me?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. There have been very many such debates, and it is very common to have a veto message promptly debated, and indeed the Constitution contemplates that a bill so returned should be acted upon promptly.

Mr. ALLISON. The vote should be taken.

Mr. SHERMAN. The vote should be taken. I think that is the proper way.

Mr. VEST. I am not raising any point of order upon the remarks of the Senator from Ohio. Under the peculiar rules of the Senate, or rather the fact that there are hardly any rules to govern the Senate, the Senator from Ohio could discuss this question at any time after the bill was presented here. But it seems to me—and that is what I meant to say—that the appropriate time for discussion would be after the bill had gone back to the committee, and then was reported with their judgment upon it to the Senate for its action.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say a word in regard to this veto. I do not know whether I was present in committee when the bill was passed through the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and I do not undertake to say how I voted upon it. I know, and I make the confession very frankly, that I have voted or consented to the favorable report of bills like this from that committee under solicitation, strong solicitation, from my colleagues both in the other House and in the Senate.

I assert here to-day that the President of the United States has not been partial in the exercise of his vetoes in regard to public buildings. I say this the more frankly and freely because he exercised the veto in regard to a bill of this same character in my own State of Missouri, and he did it upon the express ground which he sets forth in this veto message, that the only claim for such a building was the fact that there was a post-office there, and the same reason applies to towns of the same size in every State in the Union.

If we are to assert the principle, if we are to establish the rule that every town of considerable size in the United States which has only a post-office is to have a public building, there is no necessity for reducing the tariff taxation of this country in order to get rid of the surplus in the Treasury.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to inquire of the Senator what is the principle upon which the bill is based that the Senator reported, I believe, or which his committee reported the other day, to build post-offices generally in every town where the postal receipts are $3,000 or over?

Mr. VEST. That bill is based upon the idea that in order to get rid of the present log-rolling system as to the construction of public buildings in the United States, we propose to give to the Post-Office Department the power to construct in all towns and cities of the United States where the gross amount of the postal revenue has been for three years preceding $3,000 an edifice for the use of the post-office which shall not cost more than $25,000.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to continue the inquiry.

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. Would it not appear, then, that this veto rests upon a difference in method between enacting this law on its merits and enacting a general law?

Mr. VEST. I take it that no proposition is clearer than that the President of the United States is equally responsible with ourselves for the legislation of this country.

Mr. DAWES. That is not the inquiry. Nobody doubts that. Nobody doubts the power of the President——

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Ohio seemed to doubt it.

Mr. DAWES. If he deems it his duty to exercise that power, and he exercises it within his constitutional functions whenever he sees any reason; but the question is whether it is a proper exercise of the power of the veto simply because the method in which this bill has reached him is different from a method which he might prefer in a general bill that would bring them all in.

Mr. VEST. It is not a question of method; it is a question of the expenditure of the public money. Here is a bill that appropriates $100,000 for a post-office building alone, with no internal-revenue department even, with no accommodation needed for the judiciary, with nothing but simply postal accommodations in view.

Mr. PADDOCK. Seventy-five thousand dollars is the amount named in the bill.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Ohio advances the extraordinary doctrine that the President of the United States, where both Houses of Congress have acted unanimously, should acquiesce in their action and in their judgment without inquiry upon his part, and he speaks of the Czar of Russia and the Sultan of Turkey and other examples of a similar character. The President of the United States is as much a portion of the legislative power as we are, and is as much responsible to our constituents. In the autonomy of our Government the Senate of the United States is a portion of the appointing power and the President of the United States a portion of the legislative power.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator mean to say that the President is as much a part of the legislative power as Congress, which can originate measures and can pass them in spite of him? Is he just as much a part of the legislative power as these two bodies who must, and who alone can, originate every legislative act that exists, and who have it in their power to pass it in spite of him? Is he just as much a part of the legislative power?

Mr. VEST. I commend to the Senator from Massachusetts his criticism in regard to method: I am discussing the question of power. It is true that the Congress of the United States originates legislation, but it is true that that legislation can not become effective without the approval of the President of the United States under the Constitution.

Mr. DAWES. Yes, it can.

Mr. VEST. How? We can pass it over his veto.

Mr. DAWES. Then would it not be effective?

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course, but that is another exercise of power under the Constitution. I am speaking now of the original action of the President in regard to the approval or disapproval of an act of Congress, and under the constitutional limitations he is as much a portion of the legislative power of this country as we ourselves.

Mr. DAWES. Does not the Senator observe the difference between a power to stop legislation and a power to legislate?

Mr. VEST. I recognize that to the fullest extent, and yet so far as the effect upon the people and their interests is concerned, the President of the United States by his approval of a bill becomes as much a portion of the legislative power as either House of Congress.

Mr. COKE. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that he can not only approve and veto, but he can recommend legislation.

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course, he can originate to that extent by recommendation, and it is his constitutional duty to do so.

But I am not here to engage in any hair-splitting or refined arguments in regard to the difference between originating a bill and exercising the veto power against it. When the President approves a bill he joins in the legislative functions which we are exercising here to-day.

Under the theory of the Senator from Ohio the veto power is absolutely nullified. If both Houses of Congress concur with any unanimity in the passage of a measure, then the Senator from Ohio says that if the President vetoes it he becomes the Czar of Russia or the Sultan of Turkey.

Sir, the President of the United States is responsible to the people and to his oath of office as much as we are. In this particular case he thought the appropriation of $100,000 would be a waste of public money. He would have been a dishonest man if with that conviction he had put his executive approval upon the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Missouri is all wrong in his idea about the proper mode of dealing with a veto message. The old custom was when a veto message was sent to us to lay it on the table or to proceed to its immediate consideration. The Constitution seems to imply that that is the duty of the two branches, and when it was first proposed to refer a veto message to a committee it was considered as a substantial departure from the courtesy due to the President of the United States.

Mr. VEST. We have been doing it. All the pension vetoes were referred.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know, but only latterly. Here is what the Constitution provides:

> If he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their Journal, and proceed to reconsider it.

Undoubtedly we may reconsider it through a committee in the ordinary forms of legislation, but that formerly was not the usual way, and very commonly the vote was at once taken, as the Constitution provided might be done.

Now, let me say another thing. I did not complain about the President so much, but I complained of Congress as giving a force to the President's veto which the Constitution did not contemplate. What is a veto? It is not what is considered a veto in Russia, or Austria, or countries of a despotic character, a veto, "I will not," or "I forbid," and that is the end of it. That is not the veto contemplated by the Constitution of the United States. It is simply a motion on the part of the President to ask Congress to reconsider a measure and pass again upon it, requiring a little greater majority to carry it over the veto, and that is all. It is nothing but a motion to reconsider. The President has no veto in the sense of a Russian or autocratic veto, but Congress has of late given to the President's veto superior power. The veto comes back here and then every Democrat is expected to rally around the standard of that veto, as if the veto message was a political document. That is what I object to.

I say now, that as this bill passed through both Houses of Congress after full consideration upon facts disclosed upon a report, a much stronger bill than dozens which have been signed by the President and others which have been passed by without signing, it is our duty to consider it upon its merits and not upon the merits of Grover Cleveland; and I say that upon the reasons given in that message considered by a Senator on the other side of the Chamber, he would not give them the weight of a straw. His talk about the sending to a postmaster and failing to get information—his talk about there being only a certain amount of population, 15,000 or 17,000, when there is now a population of 30,000 agreed on all hands, and it is an office that yields $30,000 a year to the postal revenues of the country, in the midst of a large suburban population, with a great population engaged in many industries all around it, tributary to it for postal service.

Sir, there are more people within four miles of Youngstown, fivefold, than there are in Asheville, N. C., and Asheville has a post-office building. I do not know what the population of Asheville is, but I will venture to say that within the immediate postal delivery of Youngstown there are probably 30,000 people, among the most active and enterprising population on the globe, engaged in all branches of industry. Therefore, when it is the desire of these people to have a suitable place to carry on their postal service, and Congress responds to that demand upon reasons given, and the President overrules it, it seems to me the Senate of the United States ought to consider itself bound to decide that question upon its merits and not upon any political view it may take of Mr. Cleveland's right to make his veto final and conclusive or to give the constitutional veto, which requires only a few more votes than a majority to overthrow it, the force and finality of a ukase of the Czar of Russia.

Mr. VEST. If any additional argument were necessary in order to show the impropriety of these remarks on the part of the Senator from Ohio, he has just furnished that argument. He speaks now of Asheville, N. C., as a parallel case with this. The Senator ought to know that there are at Asheville, N. C., the United States courts and the internal-revenue department besides, neither of which is found at Youngstown, in the State of Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the population of Asheville?

Mr. VEST. About 8,000 or 10,000.

Mr. VANCE. I will inform the Senator, if he will permit me, that the population of Asheville is 8,000. The President vetoed the first bill, passed by the last Congress and sent to him, and at this Congress the bill has been permitted to become a law without his signature.

Mr. PADDOCK. The gross postal receipts of Asheville for the last fiscal year were $10,135.89.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How much were the receipts at Youngstown?

Mr. PADDOCK. I do not know that I have the figures for Youngstown before me.

Mr. VEST. There are the United States courts and an internal-revenue department at Asheville. There is no parallel between the two cases. Let me say in regard to my own State of Missouri that we passed a bill here during the last Congress for the erection of a public building at Springfield, Mo., a place of 25,000 inhabitants, rapidly increasing, the metropolis of Southwest Missouri, considered to be advancing in population and wealth more rapidly than any other section of my State. The President vetoed the bill, and he vetoed it upon the ground that there was no necessity for a public building there except for postal accommodations. The Representative from that district then had passed a bill through the House of Representatives establishing a United States court there, and the bill became a law. The President at this session of Congress signed the same bill, because the objection that he made to it in the last Congress had been removed by the action of Congress itself.

I do not choose to waste my time, or that of the Senate, which is much more valuable, in answering epithets. I treat with contempt the allegation that I belong to the President of the United States or that I vote from political considerations to sustain him. I have opposed some of his appointments, but I take no credit for it. I am a Democrat, but I observe as far as I can my oath to support the Constitution and to preserve the interests of my constituency. I shall enter into no argument, but treat with the contempt it deserves the insinuation that I vote upon this bill or any other bill under the dictation of the President or from political motives. It is not true. The President of the United States is, I believe, an honest officer. He is entitled to his opinion. I endeavor to do my duty, and he endeavors to do his.

I might retort by pointing to the solid vote of the other side of this Chamber against the President at every opportunity. We are told that we vote to support him, and if I wanted to go into children's talk I would say "and you oppose him." But this sort of thing is unworthy the Senate of the United States.

I move that the bill and message be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves that the bill, with the accompanying message, be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I have no hesitation in voting to overrule the President's veto in a case which addressed itself to my judgment, either upon a public-building bill or in any other respect, but I do not think these criticisms of the President are well founded in this instance. I think the President is to be commended for the expression of his honest opinion and for his firmness in doing that which meets the approval of his judgment.

Now, what is the President required to do? To approve, to express his approval as the Executive of the country, uniting in its legislation, of the particular act of Congress. If in his honest judgment he does not approve it he is performing his constitutional duty in disapproving it; and although I might differ from him in opinion in the particular instance, I commend and admire him for his strong and honest and faithful performance of his duty according to his own opinion and his own judgment.

Mr. President, here is a question not of one public building but of $34,000,000 appropriated to the construction of public buildings. It is a policy in regard to which the President expresses his opinion, the policy of erecting public buildings in particular places according to population, or according to business. Who can defend or justify any policy for the appropriation of public money for the erection of a public building except upon the ground of the amount of public business to be transacted at the place?

These propositions are idle. If you regard population as the condition, you can have no public buildings in one-half of the cities of the Union. Many States are sparsely populated, others densely, and you can not administer a policy of this description in the erection of public buildings upon any other basis than in reference to the amount of public business which shall be done. Some limitation should be attached; and therefore there can be no propriety in this criticism of the President, and no force in the objection that we should not give proper and intelligent consideration to the reasons which he submits to us, and a fair judgment upon the objections which he has made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] that the bill and accompanying message be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to.

DAVID A. SERVIS—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I return without approval Senate bill No. 820, entitled "An act granting a pension to David A. Servis."

The beneficiary named in this bill enlisted August 14, 1862, and was discharged June 8, 1865.

It is alleged that about the month of January, 1863, a comrade, by way of a joke, put powder into a pipe which the beneficiary was accustomed to smoke and covered it with tobacco, so that when he lighted it the powder exploded and injured his eyes. The report of the Senate committee states that it does not appear that "any notice was taken of this wanton act of his tent-mate."

There is no mention of any disability or injury in the record of the soldier's service. He seems to have served nearly two years and a half after the injury. He filed an application for a pension in May, 1885, more than twenty-two years thereafter.

Whatever may be the extent of the injury sustained, in regard to which the evidence is apparently quite meager, I can not see that it was such a result of military service as to entitle the applicant to a pension.

The utmost liberality to those who were in our Army hardly justifies a compensation by way of pension for injuries incurred in sport or pastime, or as the result of a practical joke.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 28, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the bill pass notwithstanding the objections of the Executive? Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. PADDOCK. I move the reference of the bill and the message to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

ELISHA GRISWOLD—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I return without approval Senate bill No. 835, entitled "An act for the relief of Elisha Griswold."

The beneficiary named in this bill, which awards him a pension, enlisted in January, 1864, and was discharged February 12, 1866.

His claim for pension as developed in the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions is based upon the allegation that in January, 1866, he fell from a swing which had been put up in the building occupied as a barrack and struck on his head and shoulder.

The committee report in favor of the bill upon the grounds that the soldier was injured "while engaged in recreation," and that "such recreation is a necessary part of a soldier's life."

The beneficiary filed an application in January, 1880, and in support of such application he filed on the 16th day of July, 1886, an affidavit in which he testifies that at the time of the injury he was in prison at San Antonio, Tex., upon charges the character of which he could not ascertain, and that the swing from which he fell was erected by himself and others for pastime and exercise.

It will be seen that the injury complained of is alleged to have been sustained less than a month before his discharge. There is, however, no record of any disability.

His claim based upon this injury was, in my opinion, properly rejected as having no connection with his military service, and I think the facts in his case as herein detailed do not justify the award of a pension to him by special enactment.

On the 23d day of March, 1888, after the introduction of the bill herewith returned, the beneficiary, apparently having abandoned the claim upon which the bill is predicated, filed another application for a pension in the Pension Bureau, alleging that he contracted diarrhea and malarial poisoning in the service. This application is still pending.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 28, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. PADDOCK. I move that the bill, with the message, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

ANNA MERTZ—VETO MESSAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I return without approval Senate bill No. 1237, entitled "An act granting a pension to Anna Mertz."

The beneficiary named in this bill is the widow of Charles A. Mertz, who served in the Army as captain from April, 1862, to June, 1863, when he resigned on account of impaired health. It is stated in the committee's report that after his return from the Army he worked occasionally at his trade, though subject to attacks of very severe diarrhea, accompanied with acute catarrhal pains in the head and face, which he constantly attributed to his army service.

It is alleged that he had several times taken morphine under medical advice to allay pain caused by these attacks.

He did not apply for a pension.

On the 1st day of December, 1887, more than twenty-one years after his discharge from the Army, he died from an overdose of morphine self-administered, for the purpose, it is claimed, of alleviating his suffering.

I do not think that in this case the death of the soldier was so related to his military service as to entitle his widow to a pension.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 28, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. PADDOCK. I move the reference of the bill, with the message, to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLAIR. I merely wish to observe with regard to the merits of that bill, assuming them to be the same as stated in the veto message, that in a great many instances Congress has granted relief in just such cases.

The motion to refer the bill and message to the Committee on Pensions was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War in response to a resolution of May 25, 1888, calling for information in relation to the destruction of the Government dam at the Rock Island Arsenal by the recent floods in the Mississippi, etc.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the communication be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, in response to a resolution of May 22, 1888, calling for information as to the probable cost of a breakwater in the bay of Santa Monica, California; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SABIN presented a petition of citizens of Chippewa County, Minnesota, praying for the passage of an amendment to the interstate-commerce law, providing that in case of all prosecutions commenced under it against any person or corporation for a violation of the act by a citizen of the United States, the complainant shall receive the benefit of any fines and penalties resulting therefrom; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. REAGAN presented a petition of citizens of Mason County, Texas, praying for legislation to prevent the manufacture and sale of adulterated articles and the use of misleading brands on food, medicines, and liquors; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Madison County, Texas; a petition of citizens of Precinct No. 7, Fannin County, Texas; a petition of E. Martin and 15 citizens of Mason County, Texas; a petition of citizens of Johnson County, Texas; a petition of James Johnston and 15 citizens of Uvalde County, Texas, and a petition of the Asbury Farmers' Alliance No. 283, containing 60 members, of Hood County, Texas, praying that the work of the eradication of pleuro-pneumonia be continued under the Bureau of Animal Industry as at present organized, with a chief who shall be a veterinary surgeon; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DAWES. I present resolutions of the Boston Turnverein, an association of highly respectable citizens and residents of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts of foreign birth, protesting against the passage of the bill pending in this body to restrict immigration. I do not know the exact status of that bill, whether it has been reported or is still in committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is before the Committee on Foreign Relations, the Chair is informed.

Mr. DAWES. Then I move the reference of the resolutions to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE presented a petition of nine local assemblies of Knights of Labor of the State of Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of any bill granting civil pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, presented a petition of citizens of White County, Arkansas, and a petition of citizens of Franklin County, Arkansas, praying that in view of the public disclosures of gross violations of the interstate-commerce law by the railway companies of the country, Congress will pass the necessary amendments to that law which will protect the public from such violations; which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Arkansas, praying for the passage of a bill which will appropriate at least the amount placed in the river and harbor bill of the House for snagging operations in the Arkansas River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a letter of Harvey Lewis, of Little Rock, Ark., a practical steam-boat man, asking that an appropriation be made for the purpose of carrying on snagging operations in the Arkansas River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon; which were agreed to, and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 2847) granting a pension to Albert F. Jones;
A bill (S. 2689) granting a pension to Mrs. Sadie Scott;
A bill (S. 2853) granting a pension to Mary J. Mahoney;

A bill (S. 2817) for the relief of J. W. Mackey;
A bill (S. 2859) granting a pension to Alfred G. Romine;
A bill (S. 1429) granting a pension to Jane B. Dunn; and
A bill (S. 2812) for the relief of Eliza Douglass.

Mr. QUAY, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 103) authorizing and directing the Department of Justice to transfer certain rooms which have been occupied by the United States courts and officials to the city of Utica, N. Y., reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 79) permitting the public building authorized by act of Congress approved May 8, 1882, at Denver, Colo., to be located not less than 16 feet from any other building, instead of 40 feet, as provided in said act, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2539) to authorize and direct the purchase of part of a lot adjoining the Senate stables for their ventilation, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon

Mr. QUAY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 1002) granting a pension to Thomas Todd;
A bill (S. 2880) granting an increase of pension to Adam Dennis; and
A bill (S. 2910) to increase the pension now paid to Elizabeth B. Smith, widow of Bvt. Maj. Gen. Thomas Kilby Smith, United States Volunteers.

Mr. QUAY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 33) for the relief of Thomas J. Miller, of Washington Territory, submitted an adverse report thereon.

Mr. DOLPH. That bill has twice passed the Senate. I ask that it be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 2675) granting an increase of pension to Lieut. James R. Durham;

A bill (S. 2275) granting a pension to Mary Calvert Truxtun; and
A bill (H. R. 7097) granting a pension to Edmund Ryan.

Mr. PADDOCK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2593) granting a pension to Mrs. Sarah McNamara, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. 2549) for the relief of Belle R. Clements, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2874) granting a pension to George W. Padgett, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2742) to incorporate the Brightwood Railway Company of the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. 1138) to reimburse the depositors of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company for losses incurred by the failure of said company, reported it with amendments.

Mr. BLODGETT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2838) granting an increase of pension to Betsey A. Mower, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 4735) for the relief of Douglas Chapman;
A bill (H. R. 7642) granting a pension to Abbie R. Brown; and
A bill (H. R. 4864) to place the name of Jacob Behr on the pension-roll.

Mr. BLODGETT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. 2344) granting a pension to Minnie A. Bailey, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to, and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 2770) granting a pension to Mary Peckham Rodman;
A bill (S. 2814) granting a pension to John O'Donnell;
A bill (S. 2834) granting a pension to Rebecca Craig; and
A bill (S. 2792) granting an increase of pension to Silas Parker.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2483) granting a pension to Catherine Tate, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1961) granting a pension to Catherine Tate, reported it adversely, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 8629) granting a pension to Mrs. Abba E. Jackson;
A bill (S. 889) granting a pension to Mary O. Hall;
A bill (H. R. 7721) granting a pension to Martha Linton;
A bill (H. R. 7974) granting a pension to Herman Rankins;
A bill (H. R. 7574) granting a pension to Frank Lewis;
A bill (H. R. 6770) granting a pension to Miss Carrie A. Luey; and A bill (H. R. 5812) granting a pension to Catherine Tierney.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 3053) granting a pension to Mrs. Eleanor Henrietta Reid; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VEST (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3054) to abolish the police court and office of the justice of the peace in and for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. FAULKNER introduced a bill (S. 3055) to equalize the pay of assistant attorneys in the Department of Justice; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 3056) to pay certain Indian depredation claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. McPHERSON introduced a bill (S. 3057) to increase the pension now paid to Mrs. D. P. Woodbury; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. BECK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2952) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies taken and used by the United States Army, as reported by the Court of Claims, under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, known as the Bowman act; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT DENVER.

Mr. TELLER. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds reported this morning a joint resolution to enable the architect to complete the public building at Denver. There is a report from the Supervising Architect, and I ask that the resolution be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will first conclude the call for morning business.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the message of the President of February 20, 1888, transmitting a treaty between the United States and Great Britain, concerning the interpretation of the convention of October 20, 1818, signed at Washington February 15, 1888, together with the said treaty and accompanying documents, from which the injunction of secrecy has been removed, be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is necessary to have the reprint. The copies have run out.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of the treaty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive further morning business.

IMPORTATION OF SILVER-LEAD ORES.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the Senate whether silver-lead ores are being imported from any foreign country into the United States, and to what extent, and whether any duty is under the rulings of the Department collectible under existing law on the lead so imported in such ores, and to what amount; and whether any duty is being collected on any such silver-lead ores so imported into the United States, and if so, whether such importations are by the Department held and subjected to the duty of 20 per cent. ad valorem to which mineral substances in a crude state are subjected under existing law.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senator if that is in addition to and for the purpose of eliciting information not contained in Executive Document 171, Fiftieth Congress, first session?

Mr. MITCHELL. My attention has not been called to that document, so I can not answer the question.

Mr. COCKRELL. I then ask that the resolution may go over, and I call the attention of the Senator from Oregon to this executive document in answer to a resolution heretofore introduced by him on the same subject.

Mr. MITCHELL. Not introduced by me.

Mr. COCKRELL. By some Senator.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask, in view of that fact, that the resolution be printed and lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be printed and go over.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TELLER. I ask that the little resolution to which I referred, and which was reported this morning, be taken up and passed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I appeal to my friend. According to the courtesies of the Senate, as the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] is ready to proceed, I think he ought to be allowed to proceed now.

Mr. TELLER. Then I will ask that the joint resolution be not printed. It is not worth while to print it, and I will call it up during the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will lie on the table without being printed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the fisheries treaty.

MINISTER TO URUGUAY AND PARAGUAY.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator to allow me to offer a resolution for reference.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Senator from Florida will be received and read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire and report as to the expediency of reporting an amendment to the consular and diplomatic bill (H. R. 6833) providing for an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Uruguay and Paraguay at a salary of $10,000 a year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator ask for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CALL. Yes, sir.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

POTEAU RIVER BRIDGE IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I ask the Senator from Ohio to yield to me for a moment for the purpose of making a few merely verbal corrections in a bill which has been recalled from the House of Representatives and is on the table of the Secretary.

Mr. SHERMAN. That, I suppose, is morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed now to the consideration of a bill recalled from the House of Representatives, the title of which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 1948) to authorize the Fort Smith and Choctaw Bridge Company to construct a bridge across the Poteau River in the Choctaw Nation, near Fort Smith, Ark.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the vote of the Senate by which this bill was passed and also the vote by which it was ordered to a third reading will be reconsidered.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. For the purpose of making some corrections, I move to strike out the word "railway" where it appears and insert the word "bridge." The Secretary has a memorandum of the corrections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 10, section 4, page 3, it is proposed to strike out "railway" and insert "bridge;" in line 22 to strike out "railroad" and insert "bridge;" and in the last line of the section to strike out the words "the railway" and insert the words "said bridge."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GRADE OF GENERAL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I renew my motion.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask consent to make a report from the Committee on Military Affairs. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report with an amendment the bill (S. 2210) to revive the grade of General in the United States Army.

Mr. President, I am greatly pleased to be authorized by the Committee on Military Affairs to report this bill favorably. Its purpose is to revive during the lifetime of the present Lieutenant-General of the Army the grade of General of the Army, with the provision that both those grades of rank shall cease with the life of Lieutenant-General Sheridan.

I will not take up the time of the Senate and refer to the sad occasion that makes this bill, as it seems to me, a proper one for the Senate to consider under a departure from its general rules that it shall go upon the Calendar with the report of the committee. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the bill may now be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill this morning reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, the title of which will be read by the Secretary.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 2210) to revive the grade of General in the United States Army.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BERRY. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas objects, and the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask, then, that the bill be placed on the Calendar with the favorable report, and I will move its consideration at an early day or perhaps during this day.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. SHERMAN. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the fisheries treaty in open executive session.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope the Senator from Ohio will let me have a bill considered to build a railroad bridge across the Tennessee River.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have been compelled by the rule of courtesy, which has always prevailed, to deny yielding to others, and therefore I can not waive it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill, the title of which will be reported by the Secretary.

Mr. SHERMAN. I feel bound to object under the circumstances, as I have objected to others. I have no objection to the bill, but it can be taken up at some other time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, that the Senate do now proceed in open executive session to the consideration of the fisheries treaty.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now in open executive session for the consideration of the fisheries treaty.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the reading of the minutes of the last open session of this kind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the minutes of the last open executive session will be read by the Secretary.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Proceedings of the United States Senate in open executive session.

MONDAY, May 28, 1888.

In pursuance of a motion this day adopted in executive session, at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.—

The doors were opened, and the Senate in open executive session resumed the consideration of the treaty (Ex. M) between the United States and Great Britain, concerning the interpretation of the convention of October 20, 1818, signed at Washington February 15, 1888.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the injunction of secrecy be removed from all proceeding of the Senate in reference to the treaty with Great Britain now under consideration.

On motion by Mr. CULLOM, at 5 o'clock p. m., the Senate adjourned.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, what is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is whether the Journal that has just been read shall be approved. If there be no motion to correct or amend the Journal just read, it will stand approved.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, what is the question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is the consideration of the fisheries treaty. It having been read by articles in Committee of the Whole, it is open to amendment; and the Senator [Mr. FRYE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to know, Mr. President, whether or not the state of this treaty is such as will leave it open to amendment on the reading of the articles separately, or whether it is open to amendment generally?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The articles have been separately read in Committee of the Whole, and the Chair holds that it is now open to amendment article by article.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to submit a motion to postpone the further consideration of the treaty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can not receive that motion now, the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] having been recognized as entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I was about to ask a courtesy from the Senator from Maine, which I anticipate will not be granted——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama did not ask a courtesy of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. MORGAN. I was addressing the President and had not reached him yet. I now address the President, and ask the President if I may say to the Senator from Maine that I ask of him the courtesy to allow me to interpose a motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. FRYE. I can not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine declines to yield.

Mr. MORGAN. I give notice, then, that on the conclusion of the Senator's remarks I will make that motion, to postpone, so that he can debate it if he chooses.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, the evolution from darkness to light, from closed doors to open doors, is, I admit, somewhat disturbing to me. I had reasonably equipped myself for a discussion with closed doors by such preparation as seemed to me necessary when addressing Senators alone, familiar with the subject. I now suddenly find myself compelled to invite into my confidence sixty millions of Abraham Lincoln's plain people of the Republic—people not like the Senators, familiar with the question—and I am aware that no adequate preparation has been made by me to meet this contingency. But, sir, I have no time in which to make it, and therefore I can do what only is left for me—throw myself upon your indulgence and theirs, and thus, if possible, blunt somewhat the sharp edge of criticism.

Mr. President, this is not a trifling question before the Senate to-day. It involves the dignity and the honor of a great republic and the rights of its citizens. It can not be belittled by localization; it can not be belittled by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] charging that it is a New England industry of but little account; that Yankee fishermen alone are interested; that the wrongs to be righted are only up in the Northeast. It can not be obscured by the President of the United States intimating that in the event this treaty is rejected he will resort to the law which Congress has enacted, not as the friends of the fishermen would require, not as they would advise, but in such way and such manner as would place in jeopardy and might destroy all the business interests of the great North all along the border; nor by the President writing to his district attorney in Massachusetts and calling his attention to the fact that there have been violations of the law in the importation of Canadian sailors; when thousands of railroad laborers have been imported within the last two years into New England, complaint has been made to his Attorney-General and evidence has been filed before him, presumably known to the President, and yet he preserves a profound silence; nor by proclamations by the honorable Secretary of State, nor by interviews furnished to the Boston Herald, nor by letters written by him to the Manhattan Club in New York when entertaining the distinguished diplomatist from abroad, in which he declared that every man who opposed the ratification of this treaty is either controlled by personal prejudice or partisanship or profound ignorance; nor by Administration papers flippantly and jeeringly suggesting that they had better buy up the Yankee fishermen and their smacks.

Mr. President, the question before the senate is, shall citizens of the United States, fishermen if you please, but citizens of the United States still, be protected against injustice, wrong, and outrage, inflicted by a neighboring nation emboldened to it only because they rest under the ægis of a mighty power beyond the seas? That is the question to which the Senate must address itself now. Even these Yankee fishermen have entitled themselves to the respect of the United States Senate, to a lofty niche in the temple of Liberty.

Why, Mr. President, they did more to wrest from France these very waters outlined here on the two maps on the wall behind me than all the rest of the whole British Empire together, and in the war for our independence their services can not be overestimated. They fought on every deck of every ship that Paul Jones commanded. Take that picture, drawn by General Knox, of the fishermen of Marblehead—perhaps entitled to contempt in the United States Senate because they are fishermen of Marblehead—see our Revolutionary army on the banks of the river on that bitter cold night; before them a foaming, rushing, mighty stream; huge cakes of ice crashing together; Washington looking on in dismay, and finally demanding "Who shall take this army across the river?" and the fishermen of Marblehead, the fishermen of Marblehead alone to a man, stepping forward and piloting the army across the perilous pathway to glory, power, and independence.

In the war of 1812 the victories which we won on ocean and on lake were due largely to the prowess, the skill, and the patriotism of the Yankee fishermen. And in that last terrible struggle of this Republic for her life there was not a single deck of an American ship unmoistened by their blood.

Do Senators think that men who have made a history like this are entitled to be treated with contempt? Do Senators think that there is no duty on the part of this great Republic to listen to their cry? When they ask for bread will you give them a stone; for fish, a serpent?

If we have another war it will be on the ocean. Who will man our ships? Eighty-five per cent. of the sailors on ships in the foreign trade are foreigners, owing the Republic no allegiance, willing to render her no service. These fishermen are 80 per cent. American citizens, 65 per cent. American birth; inured to hardship, constantly exposed to the perils of the sea, brave, skillful, patriotic, they would respond to a man to the bugle-call of the country. Why should not the Republic stand by them when they are in peril, when they are suffering wrong at the hands of a foreign power?

Why, Mr. President, the greatness of a nation consists largely in its jealous care for its citizens, humble though they may be. King Theodore in 1863 or 1864 took Captain Cameron, an Englishman, prisoner, incarcerated him in the fortress of Magdala, on the top of a mountain 9,000 feet above the level of the sea. The Queen of Great Britain demanded his release; the king refused. Great Britain embarked at Bombay 4,000 British soldiers and 10,000 Sepoys, landed them on the coast, marched them 400 miles through swamps and morasses, under a burning sun, led them up the mountain heights, gave battle to the enemy, battered down the wall, took that citizen like a brand from the burning, carried him down across the swamps and marshes, placed him on board a ship, and carried him home to England. What a magnificent exhibition of power for just one citizen! It cost Great Britain millions and millions of dollars; it made General Napier Lord Napier, of Magdala.

In the presence of such an incident one is so lost in admiration as almost to forget the injustice and the wrongs that same great country inflicts day by day upon her own citizens within her own borders.

There are Senators here now listening to me who can remember how their pulses quivered when they read that modest report sent by Commander Ingraham from Smyrna: "I weighed my anchor; I drew to within half a cable's length of the Austrian brig of war. Near her was a 10-gun schooner and two armed merchantmen ready to assist her. I ran up the American flag, shotted my guns, and demanded this poor fellow, who had no more American citizenship than the filing of his intention to become one, and he was surrendered."

I tell you, Senators, incidents like that kindle the blood in every patriot's heart, and yet neither country did more than what her duty required. The country that neglects its citizen, that permits him to be outraged by a foreign power, has no right to call on him when her hour of peril comes.

Now, Mr. President, I declare, and I do it in all humility, that this great, powerful Republic has shamefully neglected the rights of these American fishermen, has refused to listen to their cries, has given them a stone when they asked for bread again and again.

After the war of independence we met to make a treaty of peace. There were bold, courageous men in the land who loved their country and were jealous for its honor. The result was a treaty by the terms of which every right of every fisherman, every right of this little feeble Republic was provided for; ay, more, Great Britain went even to the extent of surrendering to us the right to fish on banks that were from 40 to 300 miles from the shore. Generous Great Britain giving to us that over which she had no more control than she had over the waters of mid-ocean! She never surrendered that which was hers, nor one jot nor one tittle of it, without adequate and fully adequate compensation. But we received then in our weakness, in our infancy, all that any patriot would ask.

But the arrogance of Great Britain displayed in the conduct of those negotiations continued, and ere long we found her seizing our ships on the seas, searching them, taking off our sailors, compelling them to do her service until in 1812 we once more declared war against her, fought the war through and again were victorious. Again when the war was over we met to make a treaty of peace and Great Britain said, "You have forfeited by the war every right you ever had in these northeastern waters." We had men there, patriots, men of honor, and courage, who promptly, distinctly, and emphatically declared, "If you undertake to make that a provision in this treaty of peace, there shall be no peace." The result was that the treaty was entirely silent as to the fishery rights.

I call attention now, Mr. President, to the treaty of 1818, the provisions of which, I suppose, have been in force since the abrogation of the fishery clauses of the treaty of Washington. In the negotiation of this, England evinced neither magnanimity nor sentiment, and our commissioners neither sagacity nor courage. The times were not propitious for us. Waterloo had been fought; the allies had entered Paris; Napoleon had abdicated, and England was arrogant. We deliberately surrendered our fishery rights, and a blow was dealt that industry from which it has never recovered. By its terms England laid the foundation for ceaseless demands, and invited her colonies to the enactment of penal laws and the commission of outrages in their name which would disgrace any civilization.

I call attention to Article I:

> And the United States hereby renounce forever any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, not included within the above-mentioned limits, with a proviso that our fishermen might enter these bays, etc., for shelter or to repair damage, to purchase wood and take water, but for no other purpose whatever.

What did we secure by this treaty? It provided for a partition of rights; it provided that we should surrender I should say two-thirds of all the waters our men had fought for and wrested from France. But we did have courage enough to insist that if our fishermen were driven by stress of weather into any of these surrendered waters they should have shelter; if out of wood, they might purchase it; if their water-tanks were empty, they might fill them; if their vessels were out of repair, they might repair them, but we should resort to these waters "for no other purpose whatever."

Time wore on, the United States grew in power, in population, in importance, immensely in the extent of our market. Great Britain and Canada, too, looked at that market with avaricious eyes, and deliberately determined to possess themselves of it. There was no hesitation, no question of right, no regard for decency, no obligation of hospitality, but "Your market we propose to have." What for? So that the Canadian fishery fleet may be doubled or quadrupled, so that the Canadian sailors may be increased four, six, or eight times, so that when Great Britain needs sailors she shall know where to find the bravest and the best in all the wide world.

So Canada resorted to every conceivable outrage, perpetrated every imaginable wrong and injustice, drove our vessels to sea in storms when they had sought shelter; seized and searched them on the high seas even; placed armed men on board, practically making captives of their captains and crews in their own vessels, the American flag flying over them; tried them in the colonial courts on the testimony of colonial witnesses, and confiscated one after another; and this went on until indeed the perils of the sea on these Grand Banks were no greater than the dangers of the law on the shore.

Mr. Van Buren sent an American fleet into these waters. Mr. Franklin Pierce sent men-of-war there, and in the presence of our armed vessels our fishermen were protected in their rights, but when the vessels were withdrawn then the outrages commenced again. Great Britain sent a fleet into these waters to overawe the United States of America. She accomplished her purpose. She has a wonderful facility for doing that with us. She secured the treaty of 1854, known as the reciprocity treaty, under which we were permitted to fish within her waters, her fishermen in our waters, and free entry to our markets for their fish was permitted—all they wanted, and just what the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] within two days have said on the floor of the Senate they shall have again if we do not ratify this treaty.

Mr. MORGAN. I take the liberty of denying that I said that.

Mr. PAYNE. The Senator from Maine will allow me a word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PALMER in the chair). Does the Senator from Maine yield?

Mr. FRYE. I do.

Mr. PAYNE. I have not said any such thing on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. FRYE. And I suppose the Senator from Alabama will say the same.

Mr. MORGAN. No; I did not say what the Senator alleges that I said.

Mr. FRYE. I say that I listened to those three Senators and certainly heard each one of them give an intimation that unless this treaty was ratified we must look out lest free fish were incorporated in our tariff laws, and the Senator from Alabama asked me if that would not settle this question, and I assured him that it undoubtedly would.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Maine first makes an assertion as to what I said in executive session, of which there is no record of course—that I declared that in the event this treaty was not ratified Great Britain would make war upon the United States, that I made the threat. He then qualifies it and contradicts it, and says he understood me as intimating such a thing might take place. I leave the Senator with his own declaration as my vindication.

Mr. FRYE. I say the Senator talked about free fish, and asked me if that would not solve the question.

Mr. MORGAN. Because I had frequently heard the Senator from Maine say that it would.

Mr. FRYE. Now, does the Senator stand in his place and say that he did not intend that what he said about free fish should be regarded by us as an intimation that fish should be put on the free-list if the treaty was rejected?

Mr. MORGAN. I did not think it ever liable to happen, and I think you are opposed to it.

Mr. FRYE. Did not the Senator intend it for that purpose?

Mr. MORGAN. For the purpose of doing what—putting fish on the free-list?

Mr. FRYE. For the purpose of covertly making a threat that it would be done if the treaty was not ratified.

Mr. MORGAN. I said this, and I say it here in the Senate again, and the Senate have all heard me say it, that the Senator from Maine himself had asserted on frequent occasions that putting fish on the free-list, admitting them free of duty into this country, would solve the whole of this difficulty. I said, "Oh, no," that I had not made up my mind to vote for a proposition of that kind, but there were certain considerations that weighed in favor of fishermen which I thought did not apply to any other class of people at all, and I went on to define what they were. I admonished that side of the Chamber, and I respectfully do it again, that if you present the question to the people of the United States of going to war with Great Britain against the question of letting in fish free of duty, you have a dangerous issue before you. That is all.

Mr. FRYE. Precisely; and I ask no different reply than that from the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. You have got it now. That is all right.

Mr. FRYE. I say they obtained by the treaty of 1854 all they were after—free fish. That treaty continued in existence for twelve years. Our fleet in that time lost 100,000 tons and more than two thousand men; and their fleet increased over 160,000 tons, and their men, sailors, over three thousand in numbers. When the twelve years had passed we abrogated that treaty by more than a two-thirds vote in both Houses.

Mr. President, the moment the treaty was abrogated Canada adopted the license system. The first year she placed a tax upon our vessels of 50 cents a ton, to do what? Fifty cents a ton to enjoy every commercial privilege we ever asked for. Fifty cents a ton to fish in every foot of British waters at a time when the best mackerel-fishing in the whole world was found there, at a time when we only fished with hook and line, and when most of our mackerel were taken in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, the Bay of Chaleurs, Fortune Bay, and these other bays; and yet the Senator from Alabama in his three days' speech called our attention to the generous, magnanimous, magnificent present Great Britain had just proffered us in the modus vivendi, and the President of the United States bowed before Great Britain in humble thankfulness and gratitude that she should bestow this immense favor upon our people. And what is the modus vivendi? You pay one dollar and a half a ton, and you shall have what? The right to fish in our waters? Oh, no, not at all. You shall have commercial privileges which you are entitled to to-day under the laws of Great Britain and the United States, commercial privileges which Secretary Bayard has insisted for two years we were entitled to, commercial privileges which their vessels have enjoyed in every part of the United States for the entire two years during which they have been committing these outrages on us.

Generous modus vivendi! They found that some of our fishermen paid the 50 cents, and next year they doubled it; a few paid that, and the next year they doubled it again; then the fishermen refused to pay. Once more the dogs of war were let loose; once more commenced these outrages; once more the poor, helpless fishermen, driven in a storm onto those shores, were treated with every conceivable act of inhumanity. They continued this course in season and out of season; there was no let-up; and the Congress of the United States was just on the point of passing a retaliatory law in response to a memorial from the fishermen of New England when once more we resorted to diplomacy in the treaty of 1871.

The treaty of 1871 was not to settle fishery difficulties primarily. It was entered into for what was regarded as a larger purpose even than that. We had a terrible conflict, and Great Britain clearly desired that this country should be cut in twain, that the experiment of a republic should fail forever. She wanted the Southern market, and without the slightest hesitation, without any regard for right, she went for it, knowing that she could only obtain it by dividing the Republic. She hastened to recognize belligerent rights on the part of the South. She joined with France in undertaking to build up a monarchy in Mexico which should be a perpetual menace to the Republic. She gave us ten days' notice in which to return Mason and Slidell, and started troops of war for Canada. She built cruisers, armed them, equipped them, manned them, sent them out upon the ocean to prey upon our commerce and to drive it from the seas. She prolonged the war at least two years from her unfriendliness to us, to us as a republic. When the war was over, and General Grant was President of the United States, our people who had been damaged by her cruisers sent in claims, and the President presented them.

Great Britain refused to pay, and our mighty, peace-loving President sent a message to his people saying to them, "Send me your bills and I will collect them in time;" and then negotiations for a treaty were entered upon, and the Alabama claims were its foundation. The fishery matter was subsidiary. The treaty was made finally; in it an article providing that if there was any balance due Canada for the privileges given us—the right to fish in her waters—we should pay, and that commissioners should be appointed to determine how much the payment should be. The treaty also provided that Canadian fish should have free entry to our markets. This of course, for it was the one thing Great Britain and Canada coveted.

Mr. MORGAN. I would call the attention of the Senator to the fact that on the 17th of July, 1870, when the tariff was under consideration, a bill was passed, when both branches of Congress were Republican, in which, without any treaty at all, it was provided that "fish, fresh, for immediate consumption" and "fish for bait" should be put on the free-list. That was not a treaty obligation. The Republicans conceded that to Great Britain without any treaty.

Mr. FRYE. Now, I suppose the Senator would like to lead me off from this discussion to that. "Fish, fresh, for immediate consumption" has a very familiar sound to me. In consequence of the refusal of this Administration to make any different construction from that heretofore had, the Canadians to-day are getting control of our fresh-fish market without paying any duty. I have not time now to discuss that question. It was only intended to apply to fish taken to-day consumed to-morrow. It did not apply to fresh fish frozen by modern processes and capable of being kept for six months or a year in good condition to send all over the United States. When that item was inserted in the tariff law, these foregoing processes, refrigerators on cars and on fishing vessels, were entirely unknown. There ought now to be a provision making such fish dutiable.

I say once more that the treaty of 1871 gave Great Britain a market, having obtained it by her own outrages upon us as a people. The fishery part of the treaty was due to Canadian outrages, while the Alabama claims part came from England's own acts of injustice. That treaty endured for twelve years. But before going on with that I wish to go back a bit. I said we appointed a commission, and I will say a few words in relation to that. We had for a commissioner a weak old man, no more fit to cope in diplomacy with Sir John A. Macdonald than Secretary Bayard was with Joseph Chamberlain and Sir Charles Tupper.

Mr. MORGAN. Who appointed him?

Mr. FRYE. A Republican President. The umpire appointed was Mr. Delfosse, a Belgian, practically controlled by Great Britain, as she well knew when he was appointed. They went to Halifax, as these plenipotentiaries sat here. They investigated and found that we must pay Great Britain or Canada $5,500,000 as the balance in her favor under the treaty. Mr. Delfosse determined it. He was the umpire with the casting vote. We paid it, but after paying it and within a very short time asked Great Britain to let us abrogate that treaty, and she refused, though we had paid the $5,500,000 for the whole twelve years. She still had a very good bargain, and would not give it up.

What more? During the twelve years we remitted in duty to Canada over $6,000,000, making $11,500,000 we paid for that attempt at diplomacy. What did we gain from it? We, during the whole twelve years, captured in British waters about $700,000 worth of fish, and to catch them cost us $1,200,000. The last three years of the treaty there were not a dozen American fishermen in British waters fishing, notwithstanding we had a right to go where we pleased.

Time fortunately rolled on, and the day came when notice could be given to terminate this iniquitous treaty so far as the fisheries were concerned. I believe I had the honor to recognize the fact that the day had come, and offered a resolution in the Senate instructing or requesting the President to give the requisite two years' notice for the abrogation of the fishery clauses. It passed the Senate unanimously. The President gave the notice, and in 1885, on the 1st day of July, we had no treaty for the fisheries except the treaty of 1818; all were abrogated.

If we had taken a manly course at that moment if this great Republic of 60,000,000 people had simply stood on its rights then and there, there would have been peace, there would have been quiet, all the rights we were entitled to we should have been enjoying to-day; but Secretary Bayard could not permit it. He has an itching palm for diplomacy. It delights his very soul to be engaged in a diplomatic correspondence. He was profoundly ignorant of the fishery matter then, as could be proved without the slightest difficulty if I had the time to do it. I suppose he would admit it himself. There was a gentleman here, Sir Lionel West, the British minister, who was not ignorant, and he easily persuaded Secretary Bayard, honestly, too, so far as the Secretary was concerned, that it would be six months before Congress met, that it was right in the midst of a fishing season, that there would be conflict between the fishermen of the United States and of Canada, and very likely that might lead to a war with Great Britain, and he said, "What can I do? Anything you say," and he made a modus vivendi, clearly without any right to do it under the Constitution, which gave us the right for six months to fish in the British waters and them the right to fish in ours for the same length of time. But that was not the nub of the arrangement. It was this:

And the President of the United States shall recommend to Congress the appointment of a commission to settle fishery rights.

The President of the United States, in obedience to the behest of his Secretary of State, sent in his message to Congress the moment it met, recommending that Congress provide for a commission to settle fishery rights. I believe I then had the honor to offer another resolution that it was the sense of the United States Senate that we wanted no commission to settle fishery rights. I suppose the Senate then believed it had had enough of treaties, that the last one had given us sufficient not to desire another right away. That was sent to the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported unanimously, came back to the Senate, was discussed, deliberately acted upon, and unanimously passed, I believe.

Mr. MORGAN. That was not what was declared.

Mr. FRYE. I am not giving the exact language of the resolution; I am only giving from memory the spirit of it. If the Senator has the exact language I am entirely willing to adopt it.

Mr. MORGAN. It was entirely the other way. All that was declared in the resolution was that Congress had no right to appoint such a commission.

Mr. FRYE. That can not be so. I drew the resolution myself.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator has forgotten about it.

Mr. FRYE. I have not forgotten. I know that is not a correct statement of the resolution I offered.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me to read it?

Mr. FRYE. I have it for myself now. I offered the following resolution.

Mr. MORGAN. I am talking about what the Senate passed.

Mr. FRYE. The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate the appointment of a commission, in which the Governments of the United States and Great Britain shall be represented, charged with the consideration and settlement of the fishing rights of the two Governments on the coasts of the United States and British North America, ought not to be provided for by Congress.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; "by Congress."

Mr. FRYE. There is no stress on that "by Congress," and nobody ever dreamed that the words "by Congress" were of any importance.

Mr. MORGAN. I will take the liberty of saying to the Senator here that that was the express ground on which it was placed in the debate; that it was the President's constitutional right to conduct negotiations, and that Congress had no right to settle questions that belonged to diplomacy. The resolution would not have gone through in any other form.

Mr. FRYE. For six months we had peace because we had the modus vivendi, but after that resolution was passed by the Senate the peace was at once interrupted, and in the next year and a half one hundred and twenty American vessels were seized in those waters on every conceivable pretense; they were driven to sea in storms; they were refused hospitality; they were treated so barbarously that your Democratic Secretary of the Treasury declared the treatment to be "brutal;" they were so brutal that every Senator here was at once an American; they were so brutal that every member of both Houses of Congress was an American, and party lines disappeared in the twinkling of an eye.

Now, in this open session, addressing the people as well as the Senate, I feel it necessary to reproduce a few of the outrages committed by Canada on our fishermen. I am not certain that if Senators on that side of the Chamber listen to the recitals once more they will feel conscience-stricken and vote to reject the treaty. They would have done it then. Now, see what Canada was doing to us in 1886. In the month of July, as the American schooners Shiloh and Julia Ellen were entering the harbor of Liverpool, Nova Scotia, the Canadian cruiser Terror, Captain Quigley, fired a gun across their bows to hasten their coming to, and placed an armed guard on board each vessel, who remained there until the vessels left the harbor, and that was when they were more than 4 miles from the shore and under no pretense whatever of fishing. Seventy-five years ago, if that had not been apologized for, there would have been a declaration of war.

More than 4 miles from shore an armed guard put on board, our captain and our sailors made prisoners of war on an American vessel with the American flag at the masthead.

The schooner Rattler, of Boston, fully laden and on the voyage home, sought shelter from stress of weather in Shelburne Harbor, Nova Scotia, was compelled to report at the custom-house and have a guard of armed men kept on board, there being no suspicion that she was intending to fish within the 3-mile shore-line. Sixty million people, a great, magnificent Republic, and a little country of 5,000,000 people putting an armed guard on board under the American flag without any suspicion of any violation of the law!

In August the Mollie Adams, of Gloucester, on the homeward voyage, full laden with fish from the fishing banks, was compelled to put into Port Mulgrave for water, and duly made report and entry at the custom-house. The water-tank had bursted on the voyage by reason of heavy weather. The captain asked leave to purchase two or three barrels to hold a supply of water for the crew on their homeward voyage of about 500 miles. The application was refused and his vessel threatened with seizure if barrels were so purchased. In consequence the vessel was compelled to put to sea with an insufficient supply of water, and in trying to make some other port to obtain a supply she encountered a severe gale, which swept away a deck-load of fish and destroyed two seine-boats.

Is any comment necessary? If that vessel under the same circumstances had penetrated any part of the waters of the Fiji Islands would they have refused her a tank of water?

Again: In July the schooner A. R. Crittenden, of Gloucester, on the homeward voyage from the open-sea fishing-grounds, while passing through the Strait of Canso, stopped at Steep Creek for water. The customs officer at that place boarded the vessel and notified the captain that if he took in water his vessel would be seized. He was compelled to sail without obtaining the needed supply and to put his crew on short allowance during the homeward voyage, notwithstanding the treaty of 1818 gave him a clear right to take water, and notwithstanding the dear Lord has given us all the right to take water—"a cup of cold water." Driven to sea because the poor fellow wanted water!

In October the collector at Shelburne, Nova Scotia, refused to allow Captain Rose, of the steamer Laura Sayward, to buy sufficient food for himself and crew to take them home, and retained his papers unnecessarily, thus compelling him to put to sea with an inadequate supply of provisions. The crew were put on hard-tack. Why, you may go onto one of the islands off the coast of China and say to those half-civilized people, "I am out of food, give me something to appease my hunger," and you would not expect to find men barbarous enough thereot anywhere else in the wide world to refuse. Yet these men were compelled to put to sea on short allowance.

In October Captain Tupper, of the schooner Jennie Seaverns, of Gloucester, was prevented by Captain Quigley, of the Canadian cutter Terror, from landing to visit his relatives in Liverpool, Nova Scotia. His relatives were forbidden to go on board his vessel by Captain Quigley, and an armed guard was placed on board to insure that he should not see his relatives nor they see him, making him practically a prisoner on his own vessel with the American flag floating at its masthead. No charge that he was fishing, no charge that he was violating the law.

Now take the Novelty. She is a fishing steamer, I should say of about 200 tons burden. She had been out to the Banks fishing. She came into Canadian waters not to fish there. Her coal fell short; she went in to purchase; the officer refused to allow her to do so; the captain appealed to the terms of the treaty; the reply was, "The treaty said 'wood,' not 'coal.'" And they would not let him have any coal. He appealed to the authorities in Ottawa, to whom a right of appeal is reserved in this wonderful treaty now under consideration, and the authorities at Ottawa replied that the treaty said "wood," and "you can not have coal." They threatened seizure, and the captain went home, giving up his trip entirely. Wood, not coal! There was not a vessel sailed the sea in 1818 that did not use wood, and hardly a vessel sails to-day that does. Fishermen do not use wood; they all use coal; and yet because the treaty of 1818 said "wood" they could not buy any other kind of fuel; and in this treaty which the President has sent here to the Senate, and heralded as generous and equitable, our commissioners have left "wood" to stand, and to-day, notwithstanding everybody uses coal, no one can get any in the Dominion of Canada for his fishing vessel. They might have obtained that concession for fuel, one would have supposed.

Take the case of the Caroline Vought. She was a fishing schooner from Boothbay, Me. In August, being on mackerel grounds, short of water, she ran into the port of Paspebiac, New Brunswick. A government steamer or cruiser was there. Captain Reid, ordered on board, stated his necessities; was directed to leave at once on penalty of seizure. Fortunately a storm came on and he caught sufficient rain-water to save his crew from death. He carried the American flag.

Now, take another case, and this is a very remarkable one, that of the Mollie Adams, commanded by Captain Solomon Jacobs. When off Mal Peque, Prince Edward's Island, in a heavy blow she fell in with the Canadian schooner Neskelita in distress. The Mollie Adams had her full load of fish. She stopped, as humanity demanded; she rescued seventeen men from this British schooner, took them on board, placed what material on the schooner she could save for them, what clothing they could, and sailed for a Canadian port. She was three days about this humane work, feeding seventeen men, British, besides her own. Captain Jacobs then ran into the harbor of Mal Peque. The captain of the Canadian cruiser Critic, which was lying there, boarded the Adams and was informed of the facts of the wreck and the condition of the crew. He refused to lend any assistance whatever.

Captain Jacobs asked permission to land some of the wrecked material he had on board, but was refused by the captain of the cruiser, who told him if he did so he would seize him. None of the people on the shore would take the wrecked crew. They were still on Captain Jacobs's hands. Captain Jacobs finally took from his own pocket $60 and gave them to the wrecked crew to get home with.

But there is a bar in Mal Peque where a vessel drawing over 14 feet of water can not pass. Captain Jacobs's vessel drew 14 feet, and he was compelled to lay there some eight or ten days until a tide would come that should be sufficient to float his vessel over. The result was that when the opportunity came for Captain Jacobs to sail he had not a pound of flour on his vessel. These British sailors had eaten it all up. He put into Port Medway and asked permission of the collector to purchase half a barrel of flour or enough provisions to take his vessel and crew home. This was absolutely refused, and the collector threatened to seize his vessel if he purchased anything whatever. Captain Jacobs left without obtaining anything, went home, a distance of 300 miles, on short rations, and the last day he had not a single thing on his vessel for his crew to eat.

In the nineteeth century, nineteen hundred years almost after our dear Lord was born, by a country that claims to be civilized and Christianized, this terrible act of inhumanity was committed, and committed for but a single purpose, to get our markets and free fish; and the Senator from Alabama may wish to give it to them under stress like that.

One more case. I am not citing these cases because I think the Senators on the other side have never heard of them. I am citing them because I wish the American people to weigh your treaty with the threats and the outrageous acts which produced it. Take the Marion Grimes. In October the American vessel Marion Grimes, of Gloucester, Mass., Captain Landry, put into Port Shelburne in a terrible gale, anchored in the outer port, anchored in the first place she had safety in, 6 or 8 miles from the custom-house port, without the slightest intention of going into that. She laid there nearly the whole night. The storm abated. She hoisted her sails and started out for sea, when Captain Quigley, of the cruiser Terror, fired a shot across her bows, brought her to, went on board, took possession of her, told her that she must go to port, make entry, and report. He took her 6 miles out of her way when she had been not within 3 miles of the shore, and Captain Quigley knew that she was in there to escape the storm and for no other purpose whatever. He told them if she did not go in and report and enter she should be fined $400. She was fined $400 as it was, and the money was deposited to pay the fine.

Mr. PAYNE. It was remitted afterwards by the court in Canada.

Mr. FRYE. I doubt it. I do not know.

Mr. GRAY. Yes, it was.

Mr. PAYNE. Most of them have been remitted.

Mr. FRYE. No, sir; most of them have not been remitted.

Mr. PAYNE. I hope the Senator will be fair when he states these cases. He omits to state that the several acts were not committed by the direct authority of the Government of Canada, and that when they were brought before the Council of Canada in every instance they were either apologized for or remitted, so that the Government was not responsible for any act of outrage except under the general customs laws.

Mr. FRYE. There is not a case that I have here that the Government of Canada is not responsible for, and there is only one that she has ever apologized for.

Mr. PAYNE. We shall see.

Mr. FRYE. We shall see about it. I know the facts about as well as the Senator from Ohio. I am pretty familiar with them.

The Marian Grimes was fined $400. This fine was imposed by the urgency of Captain Quigley, of the Terror, and Captain Landry was informed that he would be detained at the port of Shelburne until a deposit to meet it was made.

While the vessel was in the custody of Captain Quigley, Captain Landry hoisted the American flag, hoisted it on an American vessel, on his own, as he had a right to do, and Captain Quigley ordered this American citizen to haul it down.

Mr. PAYNE. Please follow it up.

Mr. FRYE. Do not interrupt me now. I decline to be interrupted.

Mr. PAYNE. That is not fair.

Mr. FRYE. Captain Quigley ordered the American flag hauled down, and it was hauled down. Then, shortly afterwards, when Captain Landry was ready to sail, he hoisted the American flag once more on that American ship, as he had a right to do, and Captain Quigley came on board and with an oath took the halyards in his own hand, hauled down your flag, and you to-day, sir, are apologizing for him in the United States Senate. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

Mr. PAYNE. That is not true.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The galleries must preserve order.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator wants me to say that an apology was made for that. A weak apology, readily accepted by a weak Administration, was made, but Captain Quigley kept his office as captain of the ship. He sailed afterwards through those waters and seized vessels as he met them bearing the American flag. Seventy-five years ago, if Captain Quigley had not been immediately displaced by his government there would have been a declaration of war. We made the declaration of war in 1812 for no offense that was any greater than that. They seized our vessels, I admit; they searched them and took our sailors; but they seized this vessel without right of law, and they tore down with their own hands the emblem of the sovereignty of a republic of sixty million people.

These were the outrages the American people were invited to in 1886. What was the result? You instructed your Committee on Foreign Relations to investigate this fishery matter. They investigated; they reported in due time a law for the protection of American citizens. It was reported to the Senate; the Senate considered it. It was a retaliatory law; it is just as well to call it so. The Senate considered it, deliberated upon it, discussed it. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] thought it was not sufficient. He proposed an amendment. He thought that under the circumstances we ought to have a law by which we could declare in a moment of time absolute non-intercourse with Canada. There was not a Senator in the American Senate who dreamed of voting against that law. There was not a Senator who did not believe that it ought to be enacted and enforced. The only difference of opinion was that the law did not go far enough in the opinion of some Democratic Senators.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, Democratic in its make-up, with a Democratic chairman, reported another retaliatory bill at the same time, more drastic, more far-reaching, in which absolute non-intercourse could be declared in the twinkling of an eye. It was reported to the House. A distinguished Senator, sitting right here by me [Mr. REAGAN], advocated the passage of that or else of the earlier law some six months before, and while he is not a prophet nor the son of a prophet he saw with a vision then of an inspired one, for he told that House that we wanted no diplomacy, that every time we had resorted to it—I am not giving the Senator's words—we had been cheated by Great Britain; and certainly if we resorted to it once more we should be cheated once more. It was a prophet's vision. It has been resorted to once more, I say to the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], and once more we are cheated.

That bill passed the House of Representatives with only one dissenting vote. The Senate was more conservative; believed then, as the Republican Senators believe now, that all that was necessary to stop these outrages was just to say to the Canadians: "If you do not let our vessels go into your ports we shall not let your vessels come into ours." That is all that the Republican side of the Senate wanted at any time. It is all that they ask now; and if that could be granted to-day it would stop the troubles on the Canadian coasts.

A committee of conference was had, and finally we reported a bill. It passed both Houses with one dissenting vote in each, and the one in the Senate only by a mistake.

That law provided that if Canada did not allow our vessels to go into her waters we directed the President to say that they could not come into ours. That is all there was about it; all we wanted; all that we asked. The law went further, and allowed the President to go further. I admit that he can take that law as it stands on the statute-book, if he pleases; disregard the advice of all the men who understand this matter and what is required, and absolutely stop all intercourse by car or otherwise between us and Canada, and jeopardize the business interests of the whole northern border, if he pleases.

There is one thing he ought to do if this treaty is rejected; use so much of that law as in the judgment of an honest man, not a partisan, in the judgment of an honest President, ought to be used to protect the people in those northeastern waters from outrage and injustice.

He in fact proceeded not at all under the law, though the outrages continued; and, on the contrary, the first thing we knew plenipotentiaries were appointed to make a treaty with Great Britain about these fishery matters, Mr. Bayard, Mr. Putnam, and Mr. Angell on our part. They proceeded to consider the question submitted. They sat here in Washington month after month, and I am not afraid to declare that they never consulted any fisherman or anybody who knew about the fisheries industry or was connected with it from the beginning of that negotiation down to its very close, though the American Fishery Union was here by an agent every day during the progress of the negotiations.

Mr. GRAY. You are mistaken, nevertheless.

Mr. FRYE. Can the Senator inform me what fisherman they consulted? Will he do so?

Mr. GRAY. No; I will not now. I can not give you the names; but I shall do so when the time comes.

Mr. FRYE. Did they consult the Fishery Union, which was located here in Washington during the whole time?

Mr. GRAY. I can not answer exactly as to that.

Mr. FRYE. They considered these questions for month after month here in the city of Washington. Mr. Chamberlain came over here from England, a perfect adept in the arts of diplomacy. He brought two other gentlemen as skilled as he. Sir Charles Tupper was here, one of the shrewdest and most cunning men on the American continent; a man who knew everything that Canada wanted; knew it himself as a boy knows his A B C's; and what followed? I never heard of any New England Representative or Senator being called in consultation or asked about this matter by these plenipotentiaries.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. FRYE. With pleasure.

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to know what the Senator has to say about Mr. Putnam?

Mr. FRYE. Why should I say anything about Mr. Putnam?

Mr. PAYNE. Was he not one of the negotiators?

Mr. FRYE. Yes. Why should I say anything about him?

Mr. PAYNE. Why should you not? You say the commission did not consult any person who knew anything about the fisheries. I am told that Mr. Putnam was very well acquainted with all that class of persons; that he had acted as attorney in suits for fishermen; and that probably no man in New England knew the fishery question better than Mr. Putnam, who is a lawyer of very high standing.

Mr. FRYE. That induces me to say something about Mr. Putnam. I think I know him a great deal better than the Senator from Ohio, and I think I esteem him a great deal more highly than the Senator does. Mr. Putnam and I have been close and warm friends for years. I had the honor to recommend him for circuit judge to a Republican President, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] joined with me in the recommendation. So the Senator dares not charge me with undertaking to do any injustice to Mr. Putnam.

Mr. PAYNE. No, I do not charge it, but you insinuated it.

Mr. FRYE. In regard to Mr. Putnam's knowledge of the fishery business I did not say anything. I said the commission never consulted any man who was familiar with the fishery question, nor any Senator or Representative from New England. I do not admit that Mr. Putnam was a man who knew more about the New England fisheries than any other man, and, in the presence of the treaty he agreed to, I deny it emphatically.

Mr. PAYNE. He was counsel in the David J. Adams case.

Mr. FRYE. Ah, yes; Mr. Putnam was counsel in the case of the David J. Adams, where one single question was presented—that of the right to buy bait. He was employed by the Democratic Administration as its attorney. How much general knowledge of this question he gained as attorney of the United States in one case I do not know. How far his investigations extended as to these waters I am not informed. What he knew about the headland theory I do not know. I could readily conceive that a lawyer might conduct a case where the one question was in regard to buying bait without knowing much about the great fishing questions of the Northeast. I have only to say further about Mr. Putnam that he is an honest man, a good lawyer, and the Democratic candidate for governor of Maine. I am sorry for him that he is going to be beaten, and that this issue will do as much to that end as anything else.

Mr. PAYNE. You are sorry?

Mr. FRYE. I said I am sorry for Mr. Putnam that he is going to be beaten. I am not expressing any sorrow over the prospective defeat of the Democratic party in my State. Its defeat there and in the country ought to produce only joy.

Mr. President, the commissioners occupied elegant positions here in Washington for two or three months; they were ornaments to society; orchids worth ten dollars apiece graced their magnificent tables; they lived like princes; they seemed to have much elegant leisure; indeed, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] suggests, they had so much leisure that they could hold up at any time for Sir Charles Tupper to go home and consult the Canadians as to what he had better do.

Mr. PAYNE. He went home for the holidays.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Ohio seems to have a very familiar knowledge of the inside working of the commission. I am afraid he has joined the British party in this matter.

What was the result? There it is. The mountain labored; there is the mouse. I have to say about that treaty that it is the most disgraceful, humiliating, and cowardly surrender the American Republic has ever been called upon to submit to, not excepting the treaty of 1818.

Mr. President, I find the air here exceedingly oppressive, and it is suggested to me by some Senators that I make a break in my speech, and that consent be given that I proceed to-morrow morning.

Mr. STEWART. I suggest that the Senate take a recess for twenty or thirty minutes, so as to allow the Chamber to cool off.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would suggest that the ventilation would be greatly improved by the opening of the doors leading from the galleries. If there be no objection, the Chair will order the Sergeant-at-Arms to open the doors.

Mr. STEWART. Let us take a recess.

Mr. FRYE. I would be pleased to take a recess for half an hour, if the Senate would consent.

Mr. STEWART. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate take a recess for half an hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent that the Senate take a recess for thirty minutes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Senate accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) took a recess for half an hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (at 3 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.). The time of the recess having expired, the Senate resumes its session.

ADJOURNMENT OVER DECORATION DAY.

Mr. MANDERSON. With the consent of the Senator from Maine, I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Thursday next, in view of the fact that to-morrow is Memorial Day, declared a legal holiday by the laws of this country

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska moves that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Thursday next. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

GRADE OF GENERAL.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate that the bill which I reported this morning to revive the grade of General in the United States Army be now considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2210) to revive the grade of General in the United States Army, reported this morning. Is there objection?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to inquire what the provision of the bill is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask that the amendment proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs as a substitute be read for the information of the Senate before the Senate is asked to give consent to its consideration.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I only wanted to know the substance of the measure proposed.

Mr. MANDERSON. The proposed substitute is very short and it will answer the inquiry of the Senator from Delaware, I think, more easily than I can state it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The substitute reported by the Committee on Military Affairs will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the grade of Lieutenant-General of the Army is hereby discontinued and is merged in the grade of General of the Army of the United States, which grade shall continue during the lifetime of the present Lieutenant-General of the Army, after which such grade shall also cease; and the President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint, with the advice and consent of the Senate, a General of the Army of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the pay and allowances of the General be the same as heretofore allowed for that grade.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none. It is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the question is upon agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I objected to the consideration of the bill this morning, because I believe that it is a bill which ought not to pass. I objected for the further reason that I do not believe, under the circumstances surrounding it, that this is a proper time to legislate upon the subject. I think in the consideration of measures which are to be passed here we should appeal to the judgment and reason of Congress rather than to our sympathies or to any sympathy which may be excited by peculiar circumstances.

The only object and purpose of the bill that I can see is to give some $2,000, or about that, per annum—I do not know the precise sum—to the Lieutenant-General more than he is now receiving. I can see no necessity for the bill whatever. I can see no necessity for passing a special act creating the office of general in time of peace, an office to which General Sherman was appointed, and he is now upon the retired-list.

I think therefore that the bill ought not to be passed. I am opposed to it, and for that reason I objected to it this morning and object to it now, and I shall vote against it upon its passage; and upon its passage I shall ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, I would very willingly allow this bill to pass to a vote of the Senate without a word in regard to it, but I can not sit silent after the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas that the sole purpose of the bill is that there should be increased pay to the present Lieutenant-General of the Army of the United States. If that was its purpose, I would not be here to present it or to urge its consideration, and I do not believe that I would be authorized by the Committee on Military Affairs to present it to the Senate with a report favoring its passage. I do not believe that the Senate of the United States would be willing to pass it if that was its sole purpose.

I need not for a moment refer to the distinguished career of General Sheridan. It is too well known to a grateful American people, it is too well known to an admiring world, to make it necessary that I should take a moment's time in reciting it.

He is the last of the great central figures of the war of the rebellion. This distinguished honor, conferred by the Continental Congress upon General Washington, conferred by the Congress of the United States upon General Grant, and afterwards upon General Sherman, certainly should, in recognition of the great war services of General Sheridan and of his distinguished career as Commanding General of the Army since the war closed, be conferred by an appreciative people upon him.

The bill is not urged at this time that there may be advocacy or support brought to it on the ground of sympathy, but we place it on the ground of his high deserts and a proper recognition of his distinguished services by the Congress of the United States, representing a grateful people.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Having been read three times, shall the bill pass?

Mr. BERRY. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the passage of the bill the Senator from Arkansas asks that the yeas and nays may be entered on the Journal.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALTHALL] is paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. We have arranged for the transfer of the pair, so that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] will be paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. I therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SABIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA], but on this subject I feel at liberty to vote, believing that if the Senator from West Virginia were present he would vote "yea." I vote "yea."

Mr. BROWN (when Mr. SAWYER's name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER].

Mr. MANDERSON (when Mr. SPOONER's name was called). The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. The Senator from Wisconsin would vote "yea." I do not know how the Senator from Kentucky would vote, but I think he would also vote "yea," if he were present, and not paired.

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired on political questions with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON]. I do not consider this to be a political question. I am satisfied that if the Senator from Louisiana were here he would vote "yea," and I therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], but I suppose he would vote "yea," and I shall vote. I vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. PAYNE. On political questions I am paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES], but I am assured that he would vote "yea" on the pending question. As I have no doubt he would vote "yea," I shall vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am generally paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH]. I do not see him here, and I see by the list he has not voted. I perceive that some of his associates on that side of the Chamber have voted in favor of the bill, as I should wish to do, but probably the only safe way for me is not to vote. I should vote "yea" but for the pair.

Mr. PADDOCK. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS] on political questions. I am assured by some of his friends upon the other side that this is not to be considered a political question. I think myself if the Senator from Louisiana were here he would vote for the bill. I shall therefore vote "yea."

Mr. DAVIS. I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], but I have his permission to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. COCKRELL. I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], who is absent from his seat to-day. I should vote "nay," and he would vote "yea."

Mr. PADDOCK. I announced my pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS], but, as I stated, I felt at liberty to vote on this proposition. However, on reflection, I have concluded that I had better withdraw my vote. I therefore withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska withdraws his vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] does not know precisely how his colleague [Mr. PUGH] would vote, but he thinks I may be safely relieved from the pair, and I therefore vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—33.

Allison,	Dawes,	Ingalls,	Stewart,
Beck,	Dolph,	Manderson,	Stockbridge,
Blair,	Edmunds,	Mitchell,	Teller,
Blodgett,	Evarts,	Morgan,	Vest,
Call,	Frye,	Morrill,	Walthall,
Chace,	George,	Palmer,	Wilson of Iowa.
Chandler,	Gray,	Payne,
Cullom,	Hampton,	Sabin,
Davis,	Hoar,	Sherman,

NAYS—7.

Berry,	Harris,	Saulsbury,	Wilson of Md.
Coke,	Reagan,	Vance,

ABSENT—36.

Aldrich,	Daniel,	Hiscock,	Pugh,
Bate,	Eustis,	Jones of Arkansas,	Quay,
Blackburn,	Farwell,	Jones of Nevada,	Ransom,
Bowen,	Faulkner,	Kenna,	Riddleberger,
Brown,	Gibson,	McPherson,	Sawyer,
Butler,	Gorman,	Paddock,	Spooner,
Cameron,	Hale,	Pasco,	Stanford,
Cockrell,	Hawley,	Platt,	Turpie,
Colquitt,	Hearst,	Plumb,	Voorhees,

So the bill was passed.

Mr. DANIEL. I should like to have my vote recorded on the passage of the bill. I wish to vote "yea."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The result of the vote having been announced, the Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent that his vote may be recorded in the affirmative. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. It will be so recorded.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the fisheries treaty.

Mr. FRYE. I propose now, Mr. President, to call the attention of the Senate to the terms of the treaty itself.

The first eight articles relate entirely to delimitation. Who asked for delimitation? Who entered complaint that the fishermen in the Northeast could not tell where the 3-mile shore-line was or where bays 6 miles wide at their mouth were? Did this commission ever hear of any complaint? I am aware, sir, that Great Britain, about 1823, in the pursuit of her aggressiveness towards us, declared that these bays were to be measured from headland to headland. But I am equally aware that in less than six months after the claim was made she sent instructions to the colonial officers not to enforce it, and for the whole seventy years it never has been enforced, except in two instances, that of the Argus and the Washington.

The Washington was seized in 1843 in the Bay of Fundy fishing outside of the 3-mile shore-line. I am equally well aware that subsequently, when we made claim, and on the seizure of the Argus, the two seizures, the whole matter was referred to arbitrators; and that after hearing they determined that neither the Argus nor the Washington was within British waters. In other words, they determined that the claim made by Great Britain was not sustained by the law or by the treaties, and that this 3-mile shore-line and 6-mile bay were to control.

Mr. GRAY. I ask the Senator for information where I can find the arbitration or other proceedings where the case of the Argus was settled?

Mr. FRYE. I will refer the Senator to excellent authority.

Mr. GRAY. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator, but I ask for information.

Mr. FRYE. December, 1886, there was an ad interim arrangement proposed by the United States.

Mr. GRAY. On what page, please?

Mr. FRYE. Page 56; and there is the reply of Canada to it; and there also in the same column is the reply of Secretary Bayard to the Canadian reply. On page 59 Secretary Bayard says:

> In delivering judgment in the case of the Washington, the umpire considered the headland theory and pronounced it "new doctrine." He noted among other facts that one of the headlands of the Bay of Fundy was in the United States, but did not place the decision on that ground. And immediately in the next case, that of the Argus, heard by him and decided on the same day, he wholly discarded the headland theory and made an award in favor of the owners. The Argus was seized, not in the Bay of Fundy, but because (although more than 3 miles from land) she was found fishing within a line drawn from headland to headland, from Cow Bay to Cape North, on the northeast side of Cape Breton Island.

Very excellent authority, entirely satisfactory to Secretary Bayard in 1887; it settled Secretary Bayard's opinion after a year and a half of these outrages and after all these discussions touching the headland theory had ended.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. GRAY. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator from Maine except to get at the facts which are the basis of his argument. I have read the reference he has given me, in which Mr. Bayard speaks of the case of the Argus. I am under the impression that Secretary Bayard is mistaken in regard to the Argus being decided by the same commission which decided the case of the Washington. I ask him again if he can refer me to the arbitration proceeding.

Mr. TELLER rose.

Mr. GRAY. Perhaps the Senator from Colorado can do so.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will allow me I suggest that if he will examine the International Law Digest by Wharton, volume 3, page 305, he will be entirely satisfied that the Secretary made no mistake.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will find it in the Report of Foreign Relations, book of 1854–'55.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Maine will pardon me; I only wanted the information.

Mr. HOAR. That contains the report of the commission. It is all set forth there.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I say further that this theory of the headlands was never promulgated by Great Britain more than twice afterwards, and that I have given the only two instances in which it was ever enforced in seventy years. I am justified in affirming in the presence of the American people that it never was anything but a theory; and that when they undertook to make it anything higher than that they were beaten by a court agreed upon, and that settled it, and it should have remained settled forever, and would if Secretary Bayard somewhere or other, no man knoweth where, had not obtained new light later, and in July, 1887——

Mr. GRAY rose.

Mr. FRYE. No, it is a little too hard work, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. GRAY. All right. I only wanted to remind the Senator that the Bay of Fundy was settled and nothing else.

Mr. FRYE. The Argus was not in the Bay of Fundy.

Mr. GRAY. I am talking about the case of the Washington, the only case referred to.

Mr. FRYE. I referred the Senator to the case of the Argus, and I gave him the authority of the Secretary of State, who declared that it was settled and settled by the same court, by the same arbitration.

Mr. GRAY. Point out on the map where the case of the Argus was settled.

Mr. FRYE. No; I can not stop to do that.

Mr. TELLER. Here. [Indicating on the map.]

Mr. GRAY. Yes; I know where it was. I only wanted to have the Senator from Maine state it.

Mr. FRYE. I do not propose to be bothered.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Maine talks about the settlement of a principle. It was the settlement of one bay.

Mr. FRYE. One case I suppose does not settle the principle.

Mr. GRAY. No, it did not in that case, because it was settled on the ground that one of the headlands was in the United States.

Mr. FRYE. It was not.

Mr. GRAY. It was.

Mr. FRYE. The United States does not own one of the headlands of the bay where the Argus was seized.

Mr. GRAY. It was settled on that ground.

Mr. FRYE. And the Senator knows it, too.

Mr. GRAY. It was settled on that ground, I know that.

Mr. FRYE. Then the Senator knows more than his Secretary of State. I will admit that, if he wishes to have me do so.

Mr. GRAY. That is no argument. The Secretary is not here to answer.

Mr. FRYE. I want to call attention to another thing. In July, 1853, President Pierce sent a fleet into these waters, and Secretary Dobbin gave his instructions, and I presume he had as much light as anybody had then. President Pierce was certainly as good a lawyer as has ever been in the Presidential chair, and he came from New England, where they knew something about these matters. Secretary Dobbin gave his instructions to Commander Shubrick. I read from those instructions:

This restrictive construction on the part of Great Britain—

That is, the headland theory—

This restrictive construction on the part of Great Britain, you will perceive from a glance at the map, if strictly enforced, would exclude our fishing vessels from George's Bay, the Bay of Miramiche, the straits of Northumberland, and the large Bay of Chaleur, where the best mackerel are annually caught.

This proposed treaty excludes us from the whole.

Now, these are large, open bays, much more than 6 marine miles wide, and our fishing vessels can, with ease, enter and fish without ever approaching within 3 marine miles of the coast. The treaty does forbid their taking fish within 3 marine miles of the shore; and that restriction, unfavorable and inconvenient as it is to our fishermen, must be faithfully submitted to as long as this treaty exists. But the President entertains the opinion that our citizens, under the convention of 1818, have a right to enter the bays and harbors and to take fish there, provided they do not approach within 3 marine miles of the shore; and he further entertains the opinion that the clause which authorizes expressly the entering into bays and harbors "for the purpose of shelter, etc.," precludes the idea that it therein alluded to large, open bays, such as the Bay of Chaleur, which afford but little better "shelter" than the open sea, and confirms him in his opinion that the restriction was designed to be applicable to narrow, small bays and harbors, in which an entrance could not be effected without approaching "within 3 marine miles of the shore," but within which it was natural and proper that our fishermen should have the liberty to enter "for the purpose of shelter, etc."

The Senate must remember that the instructions Secretary Dobbin gave Commander Shubrick were given when a British fleet was in those waters, when he was sending an American fleet there, and when the President of the United States would not dare take any responsibility unless he had settled by careful observation the ground upon which he was standing, because if the commander of the British fleet was instructed to enforce the headland theory, and Commander Shubrick was instructed under President Pierce's views, then conflict was inevitable and war between the two countries would come. No better opinion, no opinion more carefully scrutinized, can possibly be conceived than one given by the President of the United States under those circumstances.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] says that there have been more than four hundred outrages in the history of this whole affair between us and Canada.

Mr. MORGAN. Seizures.

Mr. FRYE. Well, "seizures." I beg the Senator's pardon. I ought not to have called them outrages in view of the position of Senators on that side now. The Senator from Alabama said there had been more than four hundred seizures. There have been out of the four hundred only two made for fishing outside of the 3-mile shore line and bays 6 miles wide in the whole seventy years. Does the Senator from Alabama suppose that these Canadians would not resort to seizures outside of the 3-mile shore line if they believed that there was any such thing as the headland theory to be reduced to practice, or if they believed there was anything at all in the headland theory?

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Maine appeals to me.

Mr. FRYE. I think the Senator from Alabama will have ample time to reply to me.

Mr. MORGAN. If you do not want me to reply, then do not ask me any questions.

Mr. FRYE. I shall not ask you another one.

Now, take the Halifax commission. It is entirely evident that the Canadians in that commission resorted to the grossest exaggeration to increase the award of those arbitrators. In fact it has been charged by their own people that perjury was committed over and over again to that end. Why did they not claim that we were to be excluded from all the great bays from headland to headland, and then claim damages for not enforcing that exclusion? It would have doubled the amount of the award if that could have been sustained; and yet in all the proceedings before the Halifax commission no Canadian ever dreamed of making that claim; they confined it to the 3-mile shore-line and to bays 6 miles wide at their mouth.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I do not like to ask leave to interrupt the Senator from Maine, but as I heard him say that perhaps he was going away, and I may have something to say about this matter, I wish to state that I was once attached to a committee that looked into the fishery question, and made a report at the third session of the Fortieth Congress, a report signed by Mr. Butler, of Massachusetts, Mr. Poland, of Vermont, and myself, written by Mr. Butler, who knew more than any of us. I may have something to say about this matter, and I should like to have the Senator allow me to read to him now only a few lines of that report to Congress, written, as I say, by General Butler. The report stated that—

By the treaty of 1818 our fishermen were carelessly and causelessly deprived of the right which always had theretofore been enjoyed, and which was secured to them by the treaty of 1783 and of Ghent, of fishing as near the shore as they chose.

At the time of the treaty of 1818 mackerel fishing, now so large a portion of our fisheries, was in its infancy, and its importance unconsidered. The cod did not seek the shore, but where found in deeper waters. This, therefore, must have been the cause why our commissioners permitted an article to be inserted in the treaty of 1818 excluding our fishermen from fishing within a marine league of the shore of the provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island, getting in return only the right to land upon and fish around the shores of Newfoundland and Labrador. But even this exclusion of the 3-mile line from the shore would not have been so onerous had it not been for the construction put upon this restriction by the Crown lawyers in 1841, that that line, instead of following the indentations of the shore, should be drawn from headland to headland, thus excluding us from the principal bays along the shore, including Fundy and Chaleur, and by its literal interpretation excluding us from the Gut of Canso, the use of which materially shortens the voyages of our fishermen.

Mr. MORGAN. What is the date of that report?

Mr. BECK. It was made in 1870. Now, one suggestion, if the Senator from Maine will allow me—I beg his pardon. The outrages committed from 1886 to 1888 were great, but they were as great from 1818 to 1854 and from 1866 to 1870. The object of this treaty, as I understand it, is to make those outrages impossible in the future by a line of demarkation that will make it impossible to have them repeated. The contention of the British Government, as General Butler very well showed in this report, we can only get clear of by treaty, which will settle the question both as to the Gut of Canso and the headlands, and it seems to me to be an important thing to settle.

Mr. FRYE. I suppose if Great Britain contended that she owned the United States of America the Senator from Kentucky would say we must have a treaty in order to determine whether she did or not. She contended for the headland theory, and I so said; and I said further that the claim was determined against her by arbitrators.

Mr. BECK. Oh, no——

Mr. FRYE. I must decline to yield further.

Mr. BECK. Only one word and I shall not trouble the Senator more. I mean to say that it is better to settle difficulties between friendly nations important to each other by negotiations than by war.

Mr. FRYE. If you yield everything and they nothing, I deny that it is better.

Mr. BECK. I do——

Mr. FRYE. I say that a great republic like ours ought some time or other to stand for its rights.

Mr. BECK. I have only one more word to say. Loud sound does not mean sound argument, and at some time or other, perhaps, I may be allowed to speak, if not now.

Mr. FRYE. Has the Senator been interrupted in speaking?

Mr. BECK. Not at all,

Mr. FRYE. Has he not interjected everything he desired?

Mr. BECK. Yes; but——

Mr. FRYE. Why make that remark to me?

Mr. BECK. Because——

Mr. FRYE. The Senator has criticised my method of speaking. The Senator from Maine has a right to use his voice as he pleases.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Maine has no right to assume that I mean to say we give up everything when the Canadian councils have denounced Great Britain for interfering and taking away everything from them by this very treaty. That is the very question; and I shall show that the best informed men there have denounced the treaty, in louder terms than the Senator from Maine, because everything has been surrendered by this treaty that they ever contended for.

Mr. FRYE. Sir Charles Tupper knows pretty well about this case.

Mr. BECK. That is all I have got to say now.

Mr. FRYE. I understand it is. I shall not yield to the Senator to make a speech.

Mr. BECK. I should not have interrupted the Senator if I had expected that such a response would have been made—that I am willing to give up everything. I deny it. I meant to say that this treaty settles things that ought to be settled——

Mr. FRYE. If the Senator is going to make another speech——

Mr. BECK. No, I am not.

Mr. FRYE. Will he be kind enough to allow me to proceed?

Mr. BECK. I shall not ask the Senator to yield to me again.

Mr. FRYE. Sir Charles Tupper says (and he made this treaty) in a speech to the Canadian Parliament, in which he was discussing the treaty:

For every word that I say in defense of the treaty to which I have put my hand and to which I ask the sanction of this House with the utmost confidence, every word that I say in support of it may be used to-morrow in the Senate of the United States, where support to the treaty may be more difficult to obtain than it is in the House of Commons of Canada. The House will therefore understand that on this occasion it can not be expected from me that I shall point out very elaborately the advantages accruing to Canada under the treaty to which we have placed our hands.

Having made that declaration to the Canadian Parliament, that his lips were practically closed against naming the advantages to Canada, as a matter of course they would not have been closed to stating the advantages which we had gained. Now, what does he say about the headland theory?

Mr. GRAY. What is the date of that? I am sorry to interrupt you, I am almost afraid to do so.

Mr. FRYE. April 10, 1888. I am not a very dangerous gentleman. Sir Charles Tupper says about the headland theory:

The Americans have maintained that what we termed our exclusive right to shut them out of all bays was not well founded in the treaty. They have maintained that they had an indefeasible right under that treaty to approach within 3 miles of the shore of any bay or indentation. My honorable friend—shakes his head, but I hold in my hand authorities, and I could give them to him by the score, in which they have again and again maintained that position and demanded that right.

Referring to Mr. Mitchell—

Mr. Mitchell interrupted him, when Sir Charles Tupper said:

I can only say that nobody knows better than my honorable friend that Great Britain induced him to recall his regulations and instructions after he had issued them, and restricted his jurisdiction to within 3 miles of the shore.

There was also a dispatch from Lord Granville June 6, 1870, in reference to which Sir Charles Tupper said:

Now, under the pressure of this, as my honorable friend has stated, he changed his instructions in reference to the 10 miles and put in 6 miles, and forbade his officers to interfere with the American fishermen, not as in the first instructions he gave, if they were within 3 miles of the mouth of the bay, but only if they were within 3 miles of the shore, and he [Lord Granville] says:

"Until further instructed, therefore, you will not interfere with any American fishermen unless found within 3 miles of the shore, or within 3 miles of a line drawn across the mouth of a bay or creek, which, though in parts more than 6 miles wide, is less than 6 geographical miles in width at its mouth.

Here is the dispatch:

"Her Majesty's Government are fully aware that no step should be taken which should prejudge the question."

I want to draw the attention of the House to the fact that this was not a settled or concluded question; that it was not a question upon which the Governments of Great Britain and the United States had agreed or on which they had arrived at a common interpretation; and I want to draw my honorable friend's attention to the doubt that Her Majesty's Government had upon the subject.

Then he cites what they say. Sir Charles Tupper says again:

I think I have satisfied my honorable friend that, as far as Her Majesty's Government were concerned, while they maintained the abstract right under the treaty, they were unwilling to raise the question of bays, and the result is, as my honorable friend knows, that for the last thirty-four years, certainly since 1854—and I will not go further back than 1854—there has been no practical interference with American fishing vessels unless they were within 3 miles of the shore, in bays or elsewhere.

Again he says:

Therefore, as I said, we made the concession, not of anything that had been enforced practically by Canada, but the abstract right to exclude from bays that were more than 6 miles wide.

Here is a little item from the St. John Sun:

Every foot of coast waters over which Canada has ever exercised conclusive jurisdiction is confirmed to us by a treaty which the President's own commissioners have accepted as correct. Not only this, but certain bays from which Mr. Mitchell and other ministers did not exclude American fishermen are now admitted to be exclusively Canadian.

Then are official instructions—I have three which I might read—given by the officers of Great Britain to the Canadian officers that they must not undertake to enforce the headlands theory, but must deal strictly with violations of the law within 3 miles of the shore-line and within bays and harbors 6 miles wide.

Now how about the treaty, which the President says is such an excellent one? At the very outset our commissioners made a proposition, the same contained in Article III, as follows:

The 3 marine miles mentioned in Article I of the convention of October 20, 1818, shall be measured seaward from low-water mark; but at every bay, creek, or harbor, not otherwise specially provided for in this treaty, such 3 marine miles shall be measured seaward from a straight line drawn across the bay, creek, or harbor, in the part nearest the entrance at the first point where the width does not exceed 10 marine miles.

Secretary Bayard in 1887, in a citation which I have made, expressed the opinion explicitly that there was no ground on which the headland theory could rest, and yet in this diplomatic controversy our commissioners, says Sir Charles Tupper, made the proposition themselves that this should include bays 10 miles wide and 3 miles outside of that line; thus, so far as bays are concerned, actually duplicating the amount of excluded waters.

What next? After we had commenced yielding there was no point for our commissioners to stop at. Sir Charles Tupper pressed them, and what did he secure? He secured a provision which made excluded waters as follows:

Bay Chaleur, where the line is 16 miles. This bay is about 60 miles deep to where it narrows to 6 miles; good places in there to seine, and to hook and line mackerel; a herring fishery there; the British catch some cod there.

That is this great bay [indicating on the map]. There are places in it over 30 miles wide. I have been in places in it where you can see neither shore. I frequent this river emptying into the bay, and here the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] has experienced that most blissful of all sensations, the capture of the king of fish, a salmon, with a fly and a fly-rod. That bay is over 70 miles long and averages 20 miles wide. Sir Charles Tupper induced our commissioners to make that excluded water.

Next the Bay of Miramachi where the line is 14 miles long. In this bay we are cut off from 6 miles of depth.

Egmont Bay, 15 miles long. The depth of bay we are excluded from is 7 miles.

Offstannes Bay, 19 miles long. The depth above the 3 miles from shore we are excluded from is 6 miles. Mackerel and halibut are in this bay. It is a good place for herring and squid for bait.

Fortune Bay, in Newfoundland. The line is 14 miles long between points. The depth we are excluded from is 46 miles. Herring and turbot are found here.

St. Charles Hamilton's Sound. The line is 16 miles long; depth of bay closed is 20 miles.

Barrington Bay, in Nova Scotia. The line is 10 miles; 3 miles outside will be 15 miles; depth of bay is about 3 miles. Fish: herring, halibut, mackerel, and squid are found there.

Chedabucto and St. Peter's Bay. The line is 10 miles in each case, or 20 miles in all; the 3-mile limit is the same; the depth we are excluded from is 26 miles. Fish: herring, squid, mackerel are there.

Mira Bay. The line is 7 miles. Three miles seaward is 8 miles; the newly excluded depth is 4 miles. Fish: halibut, codfish, herring, mackerel; a good place.

Placentia Bay, in Newfoundland. Length is to Red Island 9 miles; to Merasheen Island and mainland 11 miles, making 20 miles, 3 marine miles seaward, about the same; depth we are excluded from is 19 miles.

Long Island and Bryar Island, at St. Mary's Bay. The passage between Long Island and Bryar Island is a mile; from Bryar Island to St. Mary's shore is 10 miles; Bryar Island to there is 9 miles. The 3-mile line would be 2 miles longer. The depth excluded is 15 miles and over. Fish: mackerel, herring, codfish, pollock, and halibut.

This exclusion takes almost every bay around the whole Canadian coast of any manner of value. It does not take the Bay of Fundy, I admit, but it takes every other except two or three on the east coast of Newfoundland. What does that mean? Our fishermen never go near the eastern shore of Newfoundland, and Sir Charles Tupper knew it. Therefore he did not press for that exclusion; but if our fishermen had been in the habit of going there, Sir Charles would have obtained from these pliant commissioners every bay on the eastern coast without the slightest difficulty.

It does not stop there. What then? Article 5 of the treaty is as follows:

Nothing in this treaty shall be construed to include within the common waters any such interior portions of any bays, creeks, or harbors as can not be reached from the sea without passing within the 3 marine miles mentioned in article 1 of the convention of October 20, 1818.

Does the Senate know how many bays that takes? Does any Senator suppose that the commissioners knew how many bays that excludes us from? Sir Charles Tupper declines to say how many to the Canadian Parliament, and only uses one for illustration. I suppose under his theory it would not do to state the advantages Canada gained. It might be used in the United States Senate against the ratification of the treaty. That is a locality where the tides are all the way from 30 to 60 feet, sweeping in and out every six hours with the power of Niagara, with swift currents in the one direction and then in the other. Great bays are more likely there to have channels on either shore than in any other locality I know.

I say no Senator here knows how many bays that takes or from how much water it excludes us; but it is fair to presume, as Sir Charles Tupper says that was put in at his request, that he knew what advantage he was gaining by it.

But, say the Senators on the other side, especially the Senator from Delaware, your fishermen testified before the committee taking evidence that they had no desire to fish within the 3-mile shore-line, and therefore this delimitation is fairly excusable. The conclusion is an inference. I have to say in relation to that that no fisherman testified before our committee that he had no desire to fish within those delimited waters; no fisherman appeared before our committee who dreamed that America could ever furnish commissioners who would consent to the delimitation agreed upon in this treaty. No fisherman was ever asked the question whether or not he wished to fish in the Bay of Chaleur or in Miramichi or in Chedabucto Bay. No man can tell to-day how valuable fisheries may be next year or the year after in those bays. No man can tell to-day how soon the United States may determine that no fishing shall be done with the giant purse-seine. Then we should be compelled to go back to the old manner of fishing, hook and line, and these very waters might be made as valuable as they were thirty-five and forty years ago. To-day the bays 6 miles wide are utterly worthless to us.

But let me tell the Senators that there is something more serious in this delimitation than this mere question of whether or not we shall fish in the excluded waters. You have another article in this treaty which provides that if you put fish, etc., on the free-list we may have commercial rights. Senators know just as well as I do that the whole contest for seventy years has been for our market. Senators know as well as I do that all the outrages for the last fifty years have been committed for no purpose except to get our market. Your treaty does give it to them. If Congress refuse to do it, the same cause for outrages and insults will be left that existed the last two years, and what have you done by this treaty? You simply increase the peril; you simply have moved out the danger-line. Every bay 10 miles wide and 3 miles outside of that, every one of the great bays named is made dangerous grounds. It may be very easy for a fisherman to tell whether he is within the 3-mile shore-line or to discover whether or not he is in a bay not more than 6 miles wide; but let me say to Senators that when a bay is 10 miles wide and the line is 3 miles outside of that, when that bay is like the Bay of Chaleur, 17 miles wide or 21 miles wide, it is an entirely different thing for the fisherman to determine whether or not he has crossed that line and entered the perilous waters. It is almost an impossibility for him to do it. Six months of the fishing season there is a fog prevailing all over that section of the waters, not a dense fog, but a fog that would prevent any fisherman from seeing more than 4 to 5 miles at sea.

Now you adopt a tariff, leaving the duty on fish as it stands to-day; let the temptation to obtain our market still continue, the Canadians will repeat the outrages of 1886 and 1887, and you have given them by this treaty an opportunity tenfold greater to outrage and insult our fishermen, to seize and confiscate their vessels, than they had before.

Now I come to the ninth article. The ninth article is:

ARTICLE IX.

Nothing in this treaty shall interrupt or affect the free navigation of the Strait of Canso by fishing vessels of the United States.

And the President of the United States congratulates us in his message that at last the Strait of Canso is free and open. Why, sir, it never was closed in the history of the world, and no nation ever dared to close it, and no nation ever dreamed of closing it. It lies on this map here. It is the highway between the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the Atlantic Ocean. We have the right secured to us since 1783, ours to-day, around the Magdalen Islands, rigats on the easterly shores of the Gulf, and certainly we have rights in the broad Atlantic Ocean, and this strait is the open highway connecting our rights in the ocean and our rights in the bay. I say it never was closed, and no one ever dreamed of closing it.

That Article IX was put in the treaty because in this delimitation Sir Charles Tupper had induced the American commissioners to consent to yield the Bay of Chedabucto. That bay lies right across the mouth of the strait, and thus shuts out the Strait of Canso. And yet the President of the United States congratulates the American people that at last the Strait of Canso is free!

There were two vessels seized in the Strait of Canso in 1886, but the excuse was promptly given that they were lying-to and they thought they were preparing to fish.

ARTICLE X.

United States fishing vessels entering the bays or harbors referred to in Article I of this treaty shall conform to harbor regulations.

I should think they always had.

They need not report, enter, or clear, when putting into such bays or harbors for shelter or repairing damages.

Is not that an immense privilege to be granted to us? When a United States fishing vessel, under the treaty of 1818, puts into a harbor or bay for shelter she need not report and enter! There can not be found in the history of any civilized maritime nation in the whole world an instance where a vessel putting in for shelter was compelled to report and enter. No vessel is compelled to report and enter until she communicates with the shore, until she lands a man or a cargo or goes to the shore to buy or to ship or do something of that kind.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment, to say that the laws of the United States require vessels to make entry and clear that have been within the limits of a port of entry over twenty-four or forty-eight hours.

Mr. FRYE. I supposed every Senator would understand that I referred to the twenty-four hours named in the article. I repeat again that there is not an instance to be found in the history of the civilized nations of the world where in less than twenty-four hours a vessel putting in for shelter is compelled to report, enter, and clear. In the United States I never knew of but one instance in forty-eight hours where it was compelled to be done, and that was in Boothbay after the Canadians had been committing these outrages on our vessels.

Mr. GRAY. That is the law.

Mr. FRYE. I know what the law is perfectly well.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator ought to state that law.

Mr. FRYE. What law?

Mr. MORGAN. The law of the United States on that subject.

Mr. FRYE. The law does not require you to report and enter until you have been there twenty-four hours.

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Mr. FRYE. All the advantage of this treaty is that you shall not report or enter until you are there twenty-four hours.

Mr. MORGAN. The same as our law exactly.

Mr. FRYE. Well, what then do you gain by the article?

Mr. MORGAN. We do not lose anything.

Mr. FRYE. If the Senator is going to take the ground that we ought to adopt the treaty because we do not gain or lose anything, that is another question. I supposed he advocated the treaty because we gained by it.

Mr. MORGAN. It is simply settling the matter by agreement.

Mr. FRYE. The treaty provides:

They shall not be liable in any such bays or harbors for compulsory pilotage; nor, when therein for the purpose of shelter, of repairing damages, of purchasing wood, or of obtaining water, shall they be liable for harbor dues, tonnage dues, buoy dues, light dues, or other similar dues.

Now, what an immense gain is contained in this concession! A poor fishing vessel driven by stress of weather for shelter into a Canadian port or harbor shall not be compelled to pay pilotage nor harbor dues or light dues.

Sir Charles Tupper said in relation to that, this is not much of a concession I admit, as we have no light dues in the Canadian Dominion. But the idea of compelling a vessel seeking shelter to pay pilotage!

Mr. GRAY. They have to pay it in our own bays.

Mr. FRYE. That is what I wanted to know, because we are relieved from paying compulsory pilotage by this article; and in another article, XII, all privileges that are conferred upon us in Canadian waters they are to enjoy in ours.

Now, let us see how it will turn out. In the Dominion of Canada there is no such thing as compulsory pilotage for vessels under 80 tons burden. The average fishermen are 80 tons and under. So our vessels of that size can not be compelled to pay compulsory pilotage fees in Canadian waters anyway. I never yet heard of a fisherman paying it in Canadian waters. I am not afraid to declare that no Senator on this floor ever heard any complaint that a fisherman of ours was compelled to pay compulsory pilotage in Canadian waters. Now, the vessels from Maine entering the harbors of the ten Southern States are compelled to pay compulsory pilotage, our coasters and our fishermen. Here is an article which relieves our fishermen, who never did pay compulsory pilotage, from it in Canadian ports, and another article giving Canadians the same rights and privileges in our ports. The result is that the Canadian vessels can enter ours, paying no pilotage, while our vessels of the same size entering the same ports must pay compulsory pilotage.

Article XI provides:

United States fishing vessels entering the ports, bays, and harbors of the eastern and northeastern coasts of Canada or of the coasts of Newfoundland, under stress of weather or other casualty, may unload, reload, transship, or sell, subject to customs laws and regulations, all fish on board, when such unloading, transshipment, or sale is made necessary as incidental to repairs, and may replenish outfits, provisions, and supplies damaged or lost by disaster; and in case of death or sickness shall be allowed all needful facilities, including the shipping of crews.

Sir Charles Tupper does not think that can be considered much of a concession to the United States. He says:

What would be thought of Canada if a vessel of the United States loaded with fresh mackerel or fish of any other description were driven by stress of weather, and perhaps in a sinking condition, and compelled to resort to a Canadian port, and if, instead of allowing her to transship her cargo, or sell it on paying the duty and go upon a marine slip for repairs, we said, "No, you must throw overboard the whole of your cargo, because we find you are not allowed to bring your fish into Canada?"

Sure enough, what would be said of Canada? And yet we have been compelled to make it an article in this treaty as a concession to the United States that when a poor fisherman driven by stress of weather to a Canadian port for repairs, with a mast or a spar blown away, part of her cargo thrown overboard in the storm and the rest liable to be destroyed by the weather, she can land the cargo and shall not be compelled to throw it away. Oh, that is valuable! I know the President congratulates his people that they have obtained this concession finally from Canada, and when I remember the poor Mollie Adams and her experience I think perhaps he may be right. But there is not a civilized nation on the face of this earth, and no Senator can name one, in which it is necessary to make that a treaty obligation. It is a disgrace to a nation to-day in the nineteenth century that such should be an obligation or a right under a treaty.

Indeed, Articles X and XI give us that which no civilized nation on the face of the earth would deny to the vessel of any nation in distress. They give to us that which it is discreditable to any nation to make a right under a treaty. They give to us that which humanity and civilization as well as common decency demand shall be given without let or hindrance. They give to us no more than nor so much as the people on the islands off the coast of China recently gave our wrecked vessels, for which Congress returned them thanks; no more nor as much as the Esquimaux have given us again and again of their own free will and pleasure. They give to us almost in words what we compelled Algiers, piratical Algiers, seventy years ago to grant. I call your attention to Articles IX and X of the treaty with Algiers made in 1815:

Vessels of either of the contracting parties putting into ports of the other, and having need of provisions or other supplies, shall be furnished at the market price; and if any such vessel should so put in from a disaster at sea, and have occasion to repair, she shall be at liberty to land and re-embark her cargo without paying any customs or duties whatever; but in no case shall she be compelled to land her cargo.

Should a vessel of either of the contracting parties be cast on shore within the territories of the other, all proper assistance shall be given to her crew; no pillage shall be allowed; the property shall remain at the disposal of the owners; and, if reshipped on board of any vessel for exportation, no customs or duties whatever shall be required to be paid thereon, and the crew shall be protected and succored until they can be sent to their own country.

More favorable, better terms were secured from barbaric Algiers in 1815 than our commissioners secured in Articles X and XI of this treaty in this year of our Lord 1888.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him if there is a statute law on this subject?

Mr. FRYE. I prefer not to be interrupted again. I do not mean any disrespect to the Senator, but he must be aware that on such a hot day as this I am performing a very wearying duty.

Mr. MORGAN. I thought I would refer the Senator to section 389 of the Revised Statutes on that subject.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator has had time enough in the last three days to make any necessary references, I should think.

Article XII provides:

Fishing vessels of Canada and Newfoundland shall have on the Atlantic coast of the United States all the privileges reserved and secured by this treaty to United States fishing vessels in the aforesaid waters of Canada and Newfoundland.

What does that mean? Have they a right to fish in our bays that are outside of the 10-mile line? Can it mean anything else? It leaves the question in doubt. If they are to enjoy the same privileges here, then they have secured what they never had before. We limited them in the treaty of 1854 and in that of 1871. They could not fish below the thirty-sixth or thirty-ninth parallel of latitude. There is no limitation here. Have we opened up our bays to them? Is the Delaware Bay opened up to them? Is the Chesapeake Bay? We excluded them in 1854 and 1871 from our shell fisheries. We do not here. I am not at all sure that there are not privileges extended to them we shall find exceedingly troublesome in Delaware Bay, the Chesapeake Bay, and elsewhere.

Article XIII provides:

The Secretary of the Treasury of the United States shall make regulations providing for the conspicuous exhibition by every United States fishing vessel of its official number on each bow; and any such vessel, required by law to have an official number, and failing to comply with such regulations, shall not be entitled to the licenses provided for in this treaty.

We determine by law how our vessels shall be recognized ourselves. We give to one vessel a register, to another an enrollment, to another a license, and it is our privilege to give to the registered vessel a license or an enrollment, and to the licensed vessel a register, and no nation has the right to say to us you can not do this thing. It is a matter for us to determine for ourselves; and yet these commissioners in this treaty have surrendered that right and have declared that our fishing vessels shall be known by a great mark on the bow which can be seen at a distance, pursued and harassed if you do not give them free fish. It was a shame for our commissioners to do that thing.

Article 14 contains all the legal amenities which have been commended to us. I wish to call the attention of Senators to them and see how they like them. The article provides that where a United States fishing vessel is fishing within the 3-mile shore limit the only penalty shall be forfeiture of the vessel and her cargo. They shall not hang the captain nor crucify the men. The Highland Light, the only vessel in the last two years taken for violating the law and fishing within the 3-mile shore-line, was tried and condemned; and what did she do? She caught enough mackerel within the 3-mile shore-line for a breakfast for the crew, and to-day she is a Canadian cruiser. So the first amenity under the treaty is that if one of our fishermen worth about $10,000, with a cargo worth perhaps $3,000 more, is caught within these delimited waters, the Bay of Chaleur, Fortune Bay, or any 10-mile bay, catching mackerel enough for the crew's breakfast, the crime shall not be punished by any greater penalty than the forfeiture of the $10,000 vessel and the $3,000 cargo. This is an amenity of the law. No wonder that the President and Secretary Bayard commend it!

One step further. If he is found within the 3-mile line preparing to fish, even though not fishing, even though not found catching, but only baiting his hook, only mending a seine, no greater penalty shall be exacted than the forfeiture of the vessel and the confiscation of the cargo. Is not that a blessed concession to us? Ought we not to be grateful for that?

Then it provides further that when the vessel and the cargo are in the hands of the seizing officer no bail shall be required—$10,000 worth of property in their hands and no bail for costs shall be required! Would not the Senator from Georgia think that the vessel and cargo were ample for costs?

Another amenity of the law is that the criminal shall have a speedy trial. Is there a civilized nation in the world that to-day does not provide in its laws for the speedy trial of criminals? That is an amenity.

Again it provides that "reasonable bail shall be accepted." Why did you not agree that unreasonable bail might be required? The idea of inserting in the article of a solemn treaty that only reasonable bail shall be required!

Mr. President, I wish now to consider—

ARTICLE XV.

Whenever the United States shall remove the duty from fish-oil, whale-oil, seal-oil, and fish of all kinds (except fish preserved in oil), being the produce of fisheries carried on by the fishermen of Canada and Newfoundland, including Labrador, as well as from the usual and necessary casks, barrels, kegs, cans, and other usual and necessary coverings containing the products above mentioned, the like products, being the produce of fisheries carried on by the fishermen of the United States, as well as the usual and necessary coverings of the same, as above described, shall be admitted free of duty into the Dominion of Canada and Newfoundland.

And upon such removal of duties, and while the aforesaid articles are allowed to be brought into the United States by British subjects, without duty being reimposed thereon, the privilege of entering the ports, bays, and harbors of the aforesaid coasts of Canada and Newfoundland shall be accorded to United States fishing vessels by annual licenses, free of charge, for the following purposes, namely:

1. The purchase of provisions, bait, ice, seines, lines, and all other supplies and outfits;
2. Transshipment of catch, for transport by any means of conveyance;
3. Shipping of crews.

Supplies shall not be obtained by barter, but bait may be so obtained.

This is the gist of the whole matter. The Canadians have greatly increased the perilous waters, the chances for seizure, etc. Now they propose to give us certain commercial privileges if we will pay for them by surrendering our market. If we ratify the treaty and do not make fish, etc., free, they still have such advantages that they feel sure to gain the prize.

What have we been contending for for a large number of years? What have we asked for in these waters? We have not contended since the abrogation of the treaty of 1871, and no man can be found to contend, that we have a right to fish within the 3-mile shore-line. No contention of that kind has been made by anybody, and the only vessel caught fishing within that line, the Highland Light, shows that we have not been there much. We have contended that since 1830, by proclamation of Andrew Jackson, by order of the British Council, we have been entitled to commercial rights and privileges in these bays, in these harbors, precisely as they have rights and privileges in our bays and our harbors. We have asked and they have refused absolutely to yield them the last two years.

Mr. President, I am not aware that during the whole history down to two years ago commercial privileges have been refused to us. There have been spasmodic attempts. Nova Scotia passed a law at one time, but it never was enforced. Newfoundland passed a law eight or ten years ago, providing that we should not buy bait. Great Britain refused to approve of it; and I am not aware that during the whole period down to the proclamation of the Canadian minister of marine, March 5, 1886, commercial privileges have been refused to us since they were accorded them in our ports under the proclamation of 1830. But since that proclamation of March 5, 1886, we have been denied all commercial privileges, and nearly all the seizures during the last two years have been made because our fishermen were trying to enjoy them.

Now, Mr. President, I must weary the Senate with some citations. The Canadian claim is that while by the treaty of 1818 we can go into their bays and harbors to obtain wood and water, for shelter and repairs, and for no other purpose whatever, the words "no other purpose whatever" absolutely exclude our fishing vessels from the commercial privileges which they yield readily to our commercial vessels. Our reply to that is: First. That our fishermen are commercial vessels. Long before the treaty of 1818 was made we had a law on the statute-book which provided for the equipping of our fishing vessels with "permits to touch and trade." Those papers gave them commercial character and entitled them to commercial privileges.

Secondly, I go further. I say that under the proclamation of Andrew Jackson, under the British order in council, under the act of Parliament of July, 1849, under the proclamation of President Taylor in 1849 or 1850, all vessels of the United States have the same rights and privileges in these Canadian waters, subject to the customs regulations of Canada, as their vessels have in our ports, etc. Without the "permit" they may not engage in merchandising, but they would not be excluded from buying flour or any other of the necessaries of life even under the treaty of 1818. Why? Because in 1818 there was no such thing known as a commercial privilege in a Canadian port. There was not a commercial vessel in the whole United States that could press the waters there with her keel.

The only vessels that were permitted to go in there at all were fishing vessels; the only vessels that had any rights there were fishing vessels; the only ones that even had the right to go in for shelter, for wood, for water, for repairs, were American fishing vessels. Those were privileges granted to them over and above all other vessels of the United States and secured to them by the treaty of 1818; and therefore when we said "for no other purpose whatever," we did not yield up commercial privileges. We could not yield what had no existence in law or fact. That was an impossibility. They existed neither in law nor in fact, and they were not yielded by the treaty of 1818.

This is the view taken by Mr. Bayard. Secretary Bayard, May 10, 1886, in a statement of the case to Sir Lionel West, said:

But since the date of the treaty of 1818, a series of laws and regulations importantly affecting the trade between the North American Provinces of Great Britain and the United States have been, respectively, adopted by the two countries, and have led to amicable and mutually beneficial relations between their respective inhabitants.

This independent and yet concurrent action by the two governments had effected a gradual extension, from time to time, of the provisions of Article I of the convention of July 3, 1815, providing for reciprocal liberty of commerce between the United States and the territories of Great Britain in Europe, so as gradually to include the colonial possessions of Great Britain in North America and the West Indies within the results of that treaty.

President Jackson's proclamation of October 5, 1830, created a reciprocal commercial intercourse, on terms of perfect equality of flag, between this country and the British American dependencies, by repealing the navigation acts of April 18, 1818, May 15, 1820, and March 1, 1823, and admitting British vessels and their cargoes "to an entry in the ports of the United States from the islands, provinces, and colonies of Great Britain on or near the American continent, and north or east of the United States."

Again, Mr. Bayard said:

I ask you to consider the results of excluding American vessels, duly possessed of permits from their own Government, to touch and trade at Canadian ports as well as to engage in deep-sea fishing, from exercising freely the same customary and reasonable rights and privileges of trade in the ports of the British colonies as are freely allowed to British vessels in all the ports of the United States under the laws and regulations to which I have adverted.

Among these customary rights and privileges may be enumerated the purchase of ship-supplies of every nature, making repairs, the shipment of crews in whole or part, and the purchase of ice and bait for use in deep-sea fishing.

Concurrently, these usual rational and convenient privileges are freely extended to and are fully enjoyed by the Canadian merchant marine of all occupations, including fishermen, in the ports of the United States.

The question therefore arises whether such a construction is admissible as would convert the treaty of 1818 from being an instrumentality for the protection of the inshore fisheries along the described parts of the British American coast into a pretext or means of obstructing the business of deep-sea fishing by citizens of the United States, and of interrupting and destroying the commercial intercourse that since the treaty of 1818, and independent of any treaty whatever, has grown up and now exists under the concurrent and friendly laws and mercantile regulations of the respective countries.

I may recall to your attention the fact that a proposition to exclude the vessels of the United States engaged in fishing from carrying also merchandise was made by the British negotiators of the treaty of 1818, but being resisted by the American negotiators was abandoned. This fact would seem clearly to indicate that the business of fishing did not then, and does not now, disqualify a vessel from also trading in the regular ports of entry.

And so on; and yet Secretary Bayard has signed a treaty by which he compels us for those privileges which we have a right to, to pay at least a million dollars a year.

Again, the Secretary of State, December 8, 1886, says:

It will be observed in the course of this correspondence that notification has not failed to be duly given to the Government of Great Britain that compensation is expected for the loss and damage caused to American fishermen by the unwarrantable action of the local authorities of the Dominion of Canada, not merely by the summary seizure of their vessels and the exaction of heavy fines in advance of hearing or judgment, but for the curtailment of privileges to which they were justly entitled under commercial regulations as well as treaty stipulations, and the consequent interference with their legitimate voyages, whereby the natural profits of their industry were seriously diminished, and in many cases wholly destroyed.

Again, April 9, 1886:

I expect to attain such an understanding as will relieve our fishermen from all doubts or risk in the exercise of the ordinary commercial privileges of friendly ports, to which, under existing laws of both countries, I consider their citizens to be mutually entitled free from molestation.

Again:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 7, 1886.

SIR: I have to-day received your letter dated the 5th instant, accompanied by the affidavit of the master of the fishing schooner Alice M. Jordan, of Gloucester, Mass., alleging the refusal by the collector of customs at the port of St. Andrews, New Brunswick, to allow the entry of said vessel, duly documented as a fishing vessel, with permission to touch and trade at any foreign port or place during her voyage, the object of such entry, as stated by the master of the schooner, being the purchase of certain merchandise.

Although not disclosed by the affidavits, I suppose the merchandise in question was fresh fish for use as bait in deep-sea fishing.

I have made instant representation, accompanied by earnest protest, to the British minister at this capital, of this unlawful withholding of commercial rights from an American vessel and her owners, and of the loss and damage thereby sustained, for which, as I have informed him, the Government of Great Britain will be held responsible.

On the 5th day of November, 1886, in a letter to Minister Phelps making propositions for negotiations, Mr. Bayard said:

The present memorandum also contains provisions for the usual commercial facilities allowed elsewhere for the promotion of legitimate trade, and no where more fully than in British ports and under the commercial policy of that nation. Such facilities can not, with any show of reason, be denied to American fishing vessels when plying their vocation in deep-sea fishing grounds in the localities open to them equally with other nationalities. The convention of 1818 inhibits the "taking, drying, or curing fish" by American fishermen in certain waters and on certain coasts, and when these are effected the inhibitory features are exhausted. Everything that may presumably guard against an infraction of these provisions will be recognized and obeyed by the Government of the United States, but should not be pressed beyond its natural force.

By its very terms and necessary intendment the same treaty recognizes the continuance permanently of the accustomed rights of American fishermen in those places not embraced in the renunciation of the treaty to prosecute the business as freely as did their forefathers. No construction of the convention of 1818 that strikes at or impedes the open-sea fishing by citizens of the United States can be accepted, nor should a treaty of friendship be tortured into a means of such offense, nor should such an end be accomplished by indirection. Therefore, by causing the same port regulations and commercial rights to be applied to vessels engaged therein as are enforced relative to other trading craft, we propose to prevent a ban from being put upon the lawful and regular business of open-sea fishing.

Take the case of the Alice M. Jordan, prohibited from buying bait. Mr. Bayard, under date June 7, 1886, says:

I earnestly protest against this unwarranted withholding of lawful commercial privileges from an American vessel and her owners, and for the loss and damage consequent thereon the Government of Great Britain will be held liable.

Again, July 10:

Such inhibition of usual and legitimate commercial contracts and intercourse is assuredly without warrant of law, and I draw your attention to it in order that the commercial rights of citizens of the United States may not be thus invaded and subjected to unfriendly discrimination.

Again, when the right to buy coal was denied the steamer Novelty, July 7, 1886:

Against this treatment I make instant and formal protest as an unwarranted interpretation and application of the treaty by the officers of the Dominion of Canada and the province of Nova Scotia, as an infraction of the laws of commercial and maritime intercourse existing between the two countries, and as a violation of hospitality, and for any loss or injury resulting therefrom the Government of Her Britannic Majesty will be held liable.

The Mollie Adams; September 10, 1886, Mr. Bayard says:

This inhospitable, indeed inhuman, conduct on the part of the customs officer in question should be severely reprimanded, and for the infraction of treaty rights and commercial privileges compensation equivalent to the injuries sustained will be claimed from Her Majesty's Government.

Now, consider a few extracts from the statement of our case made by our minister to England, Mr. Phelps, touching the seizure of the David J. Adams for buying bait, to Lord Roseberry, under date of June 2, 1886:

Recurring, then, to the only real question in the case, whether the vessel is to be forfeited for purchasing bait of an inhabitant of Nova Scotia, to be used in lawful fishing, it may be readily admitted that if the language of the treaty of 1818 is to be interpreted literally, rather than according to its spirit and plain intent, a vessel engaged in fishing would be prohibited from entering a Canadian port "for any purpose whatever" except to obtain wood or water, to repair damages, or to seek shelter. Such a literal construction is best refuted by considering its preposterous consequences. If a vessel enters a port to post a letter, or send a telegram, or buy a newspaper, to obtain a physician in case of illness, or a surgeon in case of accident, to land or bring off a passenger, or even to lend assistance to the inhabitants in fire, flood, or pestilence, it would, upon this construction, be held to violate the treaty stipulations maintained between two enlightened maritime and most friendly nations, whose ports are freely open to each other in all other places and under all other circumstances.

If a vessel is not engaged in fishing she may enter all ports; but if employed in fishing, not denied to be lawful, she is excluded, though on the most innocent errand. She may buy water, but not food or medicine; wood, but not coal. She may repair rigging, but not purchase a new rope, though the inhabitants are desirous to sell it. If she even entered the port (having no other business) to report herself to the custom-house, as the vessel in question is now seized for not doing, she would be equally within the interdiction of the treaty. If it be said these are extreme instances of violation of the treaty not likely to be insisted on, I reply that no one of them is more extreme than the one relied upon in this case.

He cites recognition in British official documents of the right of our fisherman to commercial privileges, as follows:

The exclusion of American fishermen from resorting to Canadian ports, except for the purpose of shelter, and of repairing damages therein, purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, might be warranted by the letter of the treaty of 1818, and by the terms of the imperial act 59 George III, chapter 38, but Her Majesty's Government feel bound to state that it seems to them an extreme measure, inconsistent with the general policy of the Empire, and they are disposed to concede this point to the United States Government under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent smuggling and to guard against any substantial invasion of the exclusive rights of fishing which may be reserved to British subjects.

Judicial authority upon this question is to the same effect. That the purchase of bait by American fishermen in the provincial ports has been a common practice is well known. But in no case, so far as I can ascertain, has a seizure of an American vessel ever been enforced on the ground of the purchase of bait, or of any other supplies. On the hearing before the Halifax Fisheries Commission in 1877 this question was discussed, and no case could be produced of any such condemnation. Vessels shown to have been condemned were in all cases adjudged guilty either of fishing or preparing to fish within the prohibited limit. And in the case of the White Fawn, tried in the admiralty court of New Brunswick before Judge Hazen in 1870, I understand it to have been distinctly held that the purchase of bait, unless proved to have been in preparation for illegal fishing, was not a violation of the treaty, nor of any existing law, and afforded no ground for proceedings against the vessel.

June 18, 1886, Mr. Bayard warmly indorsed this presentation of our case.

I call attention now to the report of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives, of which Mr. BELMONT was chairman. He says:

Your committee is of the opinion that the rightful area of our "American fisheries" has been reduced, and the quantity of fish—fresh, dried, cured, or salted—landed in the United States free of duty has been diminished, by the conduct of local officers in Canada. That conduct has been not only in violation of treaty stipulations and of international comity, but during the fishing season just passed has been inhuman, as the message of the President clearly establishes.

Again:

Unless English words were in 1818 used in that article in an unusual sense, there is not a sentence or word therein that has reference to anything else than taking, drying, or curing fish by American fishermen on or within certain coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors therein described. No word or phrase mentioned alludes or refers to deep-sea fishing or ordinary commercial privileges. The restrictions refer only to fishing, or drying, or curing "in such bays or harbors."

* * * * * * *

The entire article referred to inshore fishing. No right and no liberty whatever, that might concern deep-sea fishermen, did the United States, by the treaty of 1818, renounce.

Again:

The treaty of 1818 furnishes no more excuse for the exclusion of a deep-sea fisherman from the port of Halifax, or any other open port of the Dominion of Canada, than for the exclusion by the Secretary of the Treasury of a deep-sea fisherman from entering the port of New York according to the forms of law and for the ordinary purposes of trade and commerce. The exclusion, if made, must be justified, if at all, for other reasons than any yet given by Canada.

I call attention to what the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Manning, said after an exhaustive examination of the subject; and I believe if Secretary Manning had lived this treaty never would have seen the light of day. He had both wisdom and courage. Secretary Manning, in September, 1886, said:

But the Canadian act, thus having the royal approval, was intended, as has been openly avowed, to forfeit any American fishing vessel which is found having entered Canadian waters or the port of Halifax to buy ice, bait, or other articles, or for any purpose other than shelter, repairs, wood, or water. The plea is that the treaty of 1818 permits and stipulates for such legislation. That we deny, and reply that such legislation is a repeal and annulment by England of the arrangement made in 1830, and to that repeal we are entitled to respond by a similar repeal of our own law, and by a refusal hereafter, and while debate or negotiation goes on, to confer hospitality, or any privileges whatever in our ports, on Canadian vessels or boats of any sort. A violation of comity may be looked upon as an unfriendly act, but not a cause for a just war. England may judge for herself of the nature and extent of the comity and courtesy she will show us. In the present case we do not propose retaliation; we simply respond: We, too, suspend comity and hospitality.

I call attention now to a statement if possible very much more important than any of these. July 12, 1887, after Secretary Bayard had had a year and a half in which to consider all these questions, after he had obtained all possible information, after he knew of the proclamation of the minister of marine of March 5, 1886, denying commercial privileges, after he had fully investigated the right of the minister of marine to issue that proclamation, after he had investigated all the Canadian laws, all their acts—after a full, careful, complete consideration of everything touching the contention, he wrote to Mr. Phelps as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, July 12, 1887.

SIR: On March 24 last the Marquis of Salisbury made reply to your note to him of December 3, 1886, and communicated the views of the Canadian Government upon the ad interim arrangement proposed by the Government of the United States, under date of the 15th of November preceding, for the settlement of the fishery disputes.

This reply of his lordship and the "observations" of the Canadian authorities upon the proposal for an arrangement were conveyed in Mr. White's dispatch of March 30, and received at this Department April 11 last, when it had my immediate consideration.

And then he called his attention to his (Bayard's) observations on the Canadian observations, made at any rate as late as May or June, if not later, of 1887. I wish to call the careful attention of the Senate to what Mr. Bayard said. I want the Senate to hear it, because it is the final judgment of the Secretary of State.

The Secretary read as follows:

REPLY TO "OBSERVATIONS" ON PROPOSAL.

ART. IV. The treaty of 1818 related solely to fisheries. It was not a commercial convention, and no commercial privileges were renounced by it. It contains no reference to "ports," of which, it is believed, the only ones then existing were Halifax, in Nova Scotia, and possibly one or two more in the other provinces; and these ports were not until long afterwards opened, by reciprocal commercial regulations, to vessels of the United States engaged in trading.

The right to "obtain" (i. e., take or fish for) bait was not insisted upon by the American negotiators, and was doubtless omitted from the treaty because, as it would have permitted fishing for that purpose, it was a partial reassertion of the right to fish within the limits as to which the right to take fish had already been expressly renounced.

The purchase of bait and other supplies by the American fishermen in the established ports of entry of Canada, as proposed in article 4, is not regarded as inconsistent with any of the provisions of the treaty of 1818; and in this relation it is pertinent to note the declaration of the Earl of Kimberly, in his letter of February 16, 1871, to Lord Lisgar, that "the exclusion of American fishermen from resorting to Canadian ports, except for the purpose of shelter and of repairing damages therein, purchasing wood, and obtaining water, might be warranted by the letter of the treaty of 1818 and by the terms of the imperial act 59, George III, chapter 38; but Her Majesty's Government feel bound to state that it seems to them an extreme measure inconsistent with the general policy of the empire, and they were disposed to concede this point to the United States Government under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent smuggling and to guard against any substantial invasion of the exclusive rights of fishing which may be reserved to British subjects."

It is not contended that the right to purchase bait and supplies or any other privilege of trade was given by the treaty of 1818. Neither was any such right or privilege stipulated for or given by the treaty of 1854, nor by the treaty of Washington; and the Halifax commission decided in 1877 that it was not "competent" for that tribunal "to award compensation for commercial intercourse between the two countries, nor for purchasing bait, ice, supplies, etc., nor for permission to tranship cargoes in British waters." And yet this Government is not aware that during the existence of the treaty of 1854 or the treaty of Washington question was ever made of the right of American fishermen to purchase bait and other supplies in Canadian ports, or that such privileges were ever denied them.

Mr. FRYE. That was the deliberate conclusion of Secretary Bayard, as I say, after he had had a year and a half in which to consider all the laws and all the facts, and as such final judgment it was communicated by him to his minister in England, Mr. Phelps. It is a distinct, bold, brave declaration that, we are entitled now to commercial rights and commercial privileges in all the ports and all the harbors of the Dominion of Canada; and yet, in less than six months from the utterance of that declaration we find him agreeing to a treaty in which it is declared that we may have those privileges or a part of them by the payment of at least $1,000,000 a year!

Why do I say a million dollars a year? Under the treaty of 1871, where Canadian fish were admitted free of duty, the last year, 1884–'85, the duties we remitted on Canadian fish amounted to $700,000, and the business has been increasing ever since. Next year, with the same law, the duties would amount to a million dollars at least, and it will grow in all the future of the treaty under consideration, and yet we are to pay that million or million and a half of dollars every year for a permit to buy bait, ice, sails, cordage, etc., in Canadian ports.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Maine says we are entitled to these commercial privileges. Are we entitled to them under the treaty or as a matter of comity?

Mr. FRYE. I mean that a sense of honor on our part and a recognition of reasonable duty to our citizens ought to compel us either to demand of Canada commercial rights and privileges in their ports or to refuse them the same privileges in ours. I admit it is no treaty right, and I have already stated how commercial privileges were provided for.

Mr. MORGAN. Why did not the Senator, for his party and himself, demand those rights to which we are entitled in 1878, instead of leaving it distinctly to the President? They left it to his discretion to demand them. The Senator from Massachusetts says, sotto voce, he never dreamed that the President would interpret the act in that way, and yet the President and the Secretary of State now for fifty-odd years have done the same thing.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Bayard did not do the same thing last summer.

Mr. MORGAN. And that, too, with the statute of 1850 on the statute-book authorizing them to demand reparation and retaliation.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, the lateness of the hour reminds me that it is about time for me to conclude. I have mislaid a paper which I wish to cite. I will ask the consent of the Senate that I may insert it in my remarks.

Mr. President, we do not acquire commercial privileges by this treaty unless we buy them. Now this is a complete surrender of the position which we have occupied for more than fifty years. We claimed these privileges and these rights. We have insisted upon their enjoyment. We have enjoyed them up to two years ago; and now here is a treaty which admits that Canada's refusal has been right and that we have been wrong; which admits, if we desire to enjoy these privileges, we must buy them of Canada instead of claiming them under the laws of Great Britain and of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, what will be our attitude with Canada hereafter? Can we ever retrace these steps? Can we ever go back to the position we occupied before these plenipotentiaries met? We stood then squarely on the American doctrine. Can we ever stand there again? The President says that the treaty is right. The Secretary of State, in his letter to the banquet in New York, declared that he obtained all that he desired and all that he sought.

What has become of our claims for damages presented to Great Britain over and over again by Secretary Bayard? This treaty drops out the very foundation of most of them. With what face can we ever again insist that, under Article XXIX of the treaty of Washington, we have the right to transship, transport in bond, rights Canada is to-day enjoying to the fullest extent under the same article, to her immense benefit and to our loss? How we are to be handicapped hereafter!

Here is what the St. John Sun said a week ago in relation to this:

The privileges of purchasing bait and transshipping cargo, the denial of which last year was characterized as gross brutality by a United States Cabinet minister, are no longer claimed by the United States Government.

The advantages of our present position will be sufficiently evident when the next controversy arises, which will be when the first American fisherman is prevented from doing something he wants to do. Should he be prevented from purchasing bait, forwarding supplies, or shipping a crew on our coast, the usual outcry will be raised, charges of brutal treatment and of uncivilized conduct will be made, and the President will be invited to retaliate by proclaiming non-intercourse. It will then be open to Mr. Foster to remind the Secretary of State that he has himself admitted the right of Canadians to do these things, and has agreed to a formal treaty recognizing that right. Nor will it be longer open to Mr. Bayard to use the language which he has rather freely employed heretofore, and which more clamorous politicians and less responsible men of his nation have used more freely than he. The President may retaliate, but if he does he will be retaliating to a nation which is doing what the President and his Cabinet and the President's chosen commissioners have admitted to be within the right of that nation to do.

The Montreal Gazette says of the treaty:

We secure every right for which we have contended in the correspondence of the last two years. The Americans are debarred from the "touch and trade" and transshipping privileges. We have obtained everything we ever claimed—the right to deny trading privileges to American fishing vessels, to prohibit the purchase of bait, ice, seines, lines, tackle, and other fishing outfit, the transshipment of cargo, and the shipping of seamen.

Again it says, under date of March 1:

If we have to revert to the condition of things which prevailed in 1886 and in 1887 there will be general regret, but at least Canadians can have this satisfaction, that in reverting to the treaty of 1818 we do so with our position infinitely strengthened by the formal acknowledgment on the part of President Cleveland and his Government that all our contentions are right.

Can there be any mistake about that position? Can they not, if we undertake to protect our fishermen, say to us, "Your own President and Secretary of State have declared in a treaty that you have no right to demand of us these privileges?" And there is something more serious than that. A year ago in the Senate and the House we were Americans, we were united for the rights of our citizens. No one dreamed of raising a political issue in relation to this question. No one discussed it as a party man. And where are we to-day? The President taking the side, practically, of the Canadians in this matter, the Secretary of State close by him if not a little ahead in the controversy, the great Democratic party of the country being arrayed on the side of the Canadian and against the American fishermen.

Mr. President, a most grievous wrong has been wrought by this treaty-making power. False steps have been taken which can never be retraced, and in the long future we shall never be permitted to stand where we stood one year ago in the Senate, asserting with one voice that we would defend the rights of American fishermen against Great Britain or any other power on the face of the earth. We surrender their rights. We have said in the solemn language of proclamation and message that the treaty here which yields them is just and fair, all that ought to be asked, and hereafter and forever our mouths are closed.

Again, Mr. President, I declare that this treaty is a dishonorable, humiliating, and cowardly surrender.

Mr. President, I thank the Senate for its generous indulgence and for its courteous attention. If, in the heat of speech, without notes, I have been betrayed into any intemperate words, I tender sincere apology.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Delaware yield?

Mr. GRAY. It is not my purpose to detain the Senate more than a single moment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I want an understanding.

Mr. GRAY. I only want to call attention to a single point on which I wish to make a correction. The Senator from Maine, during the course of his very lengthy speech, took such short issue with me upon a matter of fact, and in the heat of his oratory was so emphatic in his contradiction as to a suggestion that I made, that I feel that it is due to myself before the Senate adjourns to-day to call his attention to the evidence to show that I had not made a mere random assertion, but was right in the assertion that I made and had authority for it.

The Senator in the course of his argument stated that the headland theory had been decided in two cases solemnly before arbitrators to have been an unfounded one on the part of Great Britain; that the whole headland contention or theory had been disposed of by those decisions. I asked the Senator if there was any decision before arbitrators or an umpire other than the case of the Washington and the Bay of Fundy.

He referred me to the case of the Argus, with which I thought I was familiar, which occurred on the upper northeast bend of another bay, but there was no such case decided by arbitrators, although the Secretary of State seems to have used language from which one might infer that he took the same view as the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Colorado; but Mr. Everett and Lord Aberdeen, in a correspondence after the case of the Washington, did settle a question that was included within the ruling in the case of the Washington; but there was no case brought to the attention of that claims commission which was decided on that point except the case of the Washington. I make that assertion, and I only ask Senators to look through the list of cases presented to that commission in order to confirm the truth of what I say.

I further stated that the case of the Washington settled no general principle applicable to all the bays in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, or Newfoundland, but was only applicable to that great arm of the sea called the Bay of Fundy, and was confined to that alone, and was placed mostly upon the ground that one of the headlands of that bay or arm of the sea was within the United States. There the Senator from Maine very flatly contradicted me, and I desire now to read a single paragraph of about six lines from the decision of the umpire, Mr. Joshua Bates, to confirm the truth of what I said.

One of the headlands—

Says Mr. Bates—

of the Bay of Fundy is in the United States, and ships bound for Passamaquoddy must sail through a large space of it. The island of Grand Menan (British) and Little Menan (American) are situated nearly on a line from headland to headland. These islands, as represented in all geographies, are situate in the Atlantic Ocean. The conclusion is, therefore, in my mind irresistible that the Bay of Fundy is not a British bay, nor a bay within the meaning of the word as used in the treaties of 1783 and 1818.

That was all I wished to say at this time in justification of the interruption which I made of the Senator from Maine during his speech, and I think I have presented absolute confirmation of the truth of the simple fact that I asserted.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the Senator wish to take the floor on the treaty?

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to say a word.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have an understanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognized the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the Senator wish the floor?

Mr. MORGAN. I ask the Senator to yield to me until I submit the motion of which I gave notice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Delaware desire to retain the floor on the pending treaty?

Mr. GRAY. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. GRAY. I do.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the further consideration of this treaty be postponed until the Wednesday after the first Monday of December next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama moves that the further consideration of this treaty be postponed until the Wednesday after the first Monday of December next.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator from Delaware if it will be agreeable to him not to proceed with the consideration of the motion to postpone or the discussion of the treaty until next Monday? If so, I hope without any formal motion the matter may be postponed until Monday next.

Mr. GRAY. That will be agreeable to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will avoid confusion and facilitate the conduct of business if the Senate can proceed, when the executive business is concluded, to the consideration of legislative business by motion.

Mr. HOAR rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator rise to this question?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir. I rise to call the attention of the Senate and of the public, so far as this debate shall attract public attention, now to the fact that the Senator from Delaware seems to me to have a wrong notion from what he undertook to read from the decision of Mr. Bates as to the principle on which he proceeded. Mr. Bates says that the word "headlands" was entirely unknown in the law of nations until the treaty of 1818, and he further says that the treaty of 1783 provided for the line upon which fish should be dried and cured. It describes a line by the terms "on the bays, harbors, creeks, or shores." He says it is manifest that the words in the treaty of 1818, which are copied from the treaty of 1783, mean exactly the same thing, and that when a three-mile line is drawn from the spot on which you are to dry and cure fish, the question therefore turns, as far as the treaty stipulation goes, on the meaning given to "bays" in the treaty of 1783. By that treaty the Americans had no right to dry and cure fish except on the coasts, bays, harbors, and creeks. By the treaty of 1818 the American fishermen had a right to fish within 3 miles of the coast, bays, etc.

The treaty intended that the word "bay" or "bays" should have the same meaning in all cases; and no mention being made of headlands, no doubt the Washington in fishing 10 miles from the shore violated no stipulations of the treaty.

Then he goes on to say that one of the headlands of the Bay of Fundy is within American jurisdiction and the other in British jurisdiction, and he then says:

The conclusion is, therefore, in my mind irresistible that the Bay of Fundy is not a British bay, nor a bay within the meaning of the word as used in the treaties of 1783 and 1818.

Now, it is impossible to put into human language a declaration more absolute that Mr. Bates decides that the treaty of 1818 means 3 miles from the sinuosities of the shore, and that the words "bays, creeks, harbors, and coasts or shores," one being a description of the place where you may dry fish and the other being a description of the place where you may take fish, mean exactly the same thing.

Then came the case of the Argus, and if the Senator will refer to the volume in my hands, a report of the proceedings of that commission made to the American Government, he will find that on the same or the next day after this decision in the case of the Washington, the Argus was found to have been seized in a bay which was one of the bays where she was entitled to be. Mr. Joshua Bates awarded $18,000 as our damages for that.

Now, if I may be indulged a moment further, just look at this. Mr. Webster had said that the language of the treaty of 1818 was somewhat unfortunate, though he coupled it with an emphatic declaration that he believed in our right. Mr. Everett had done the same thing; but the year 1853 was the close of Mr. Everett's diplomatic service, and Mr. Webster was dead and in his grave. In 1854 we made the treaty of reciprocity which lasted until 1866. In 1871 we made the second reciprocity arrangement which lasted until the present dispute began in 1885. So for all the purposes of this discussion with Great Britain, these two solemn judgments of these tribunals stand to-day. There have been five years when this question could possibly have been raised. Now, you have undertaken and you are undertaking when you stand here to argue the British side of this treaty, you gentlemen and your Administration——

Mr. GRAY. I am not arguing the British side.

Mr. HOAR. It is the British side, as I understand it. You gentlemen stand here and your Administration stands here in the face of a solemn treaty and a solemn adjudication as to what it means five years afterwards, and undertake when there is a dispute about something else to throw it all away and to exclude the United States from the very harbor which was the scene of one of the judgments.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, there is nothing that I so much deprecate in debate as assertions on one side against assertions on the other; and it was not my purpose at any time this afternoon to enter into an argument on this matter with the Senator from Massachusetts. I only again reiterate—and that was the sole object I had in rising before—that the matter of fact in regard to this subject, in regard to which I trespassed on the Senator from Maine in debate, was as to whether a ground of the decision of the umpire in the case of the Washington was that one of the headlands of the Bay of Fundy was within the United States. I will not reread that portion of the umpire's decision. I have already read it in the hearing of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. What virtue does it give to the statement of Mr. Bates that this is not only not a British bay, but that it is not a bay at all within the meaning of the first treaty; and the word "bay" means the same in both treaties?

Mr. GRAY. It is not at all pertinent to the object for which I rose, nor is the time sufficient now to go into that question on either side. I will endeavor to do so at some other time, and, so far as I may, satisfy the Senator from Massachusetts that the decision of the umpire in the case of the Washington settled no principle and undertook to settle no principle; that the umpire in that case acted as judges are prone to act and endeavored to confine himself within the four corners of the case and place himself upon the ground that the Bay of Fundy, which was the very thing in dispute, as to whether it was a bay within the meaning of the treaty of 1818 or not, was not such a bay, and upon the ground which I have already read to the Senate, that one of its headlands was within the United States.

Now, in regard to the Argus, I only deem it at all important on the question of accuracy. I again state, in this volume, which purports to contain all the decisions of the umpire and the decisions made under that claims commission, there is no case of the Argus found; but there was a correspondence between Mr. Everett and Lord Aberdeen in which that case was practically disposed of. That case of the Argus occurred within a line drawn on the north shore of Cape Breton from headland to headland here [indicating on the map]. The headland claimed at that time by Canada was this and this [indicating], and a line drawn from that headland to this [indicating] was the line claimed as the line of exclusion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of legislative business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware has not yielded the floor.

Mr. GRAY. The headland theory, so-called, is a matter of absolutely no importance in this debate, as when I shall have time I expect to be able to show. I think that will be apparent before this debate is through; and I trust it can be conducted without any trespassing on the one side or the other beyond those lines which protect the courtesy of debate; and I think it can be conducted without such flings as the Senator from Massachusetts chose to make in his interlocution here a moment ago that we were conducting or defending the British side of this debate. I think, sir, before we are through with this question it will be apparent that we are conducting the side of the people of the United States, and while I deprecate any allusion of that kind I think I shall be quite able to meet the Senator upon this arena and discuss the real merits and facts and law without resorting to prejudice or indulging in what I am compelled to think is something beneath the dignity of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I should be very sorry to be considered by the Senator from Delaware or anybody else as indulging in anything discourteous to him, for if there were no other consideration with reference to my own self-respect and sense of propriety which would prevent that, my profound respect for him as an example and model of all courtesy in Senatorial character would prevent it. The Senator may be quite sure there is no personal discourtesy.

But I think the Senator will admit that, in regard to this argument, the argument which he makes on these questions is the British argument, the headland theory, the theory about the bays. The argument which we contend for is the American argument, the American side. The view that the Secretary in debating with England took was the argument we now use, and England replied with the argument which the Senator now uses.

My honorable friend denied that there was any judgment in the matter of the Argus.

Mr. GRAY. I said I could find none in that volume.

Mr. HOAR. Here is one place where it is found.

RECAPITULATION.

Awards of moneys made under the convention for the adjustment of claims of February 8, 1853, in behalf of the United States claimants against the British Government.

Names of parties.	Amounts awarded.
* * * * *	* *
Schooner Argus, Doughty, master	$2,000
Schooner Washington	3,000

There is one place, but I will find a little more distinct place than that.

Mr. GRAY. Can the Senator find any place where it was discussed?

Mr. HOAR. I have seen a decision. There is one here. Whether I can find it in a moment I do not know.

Mr. GRAY. I will take the Senator's word for that. If he has seen it that is sufficient for me.

Mr. HOAR. Here it is. I have found it.

19. Schooner Argus, Doughty, master.

Presented March 14, 1854—Heard July 15 and August 1, and submitted—Disagreement of commissioners—Heard before umpire October 11, and submitted—Award of umpire.

For seizure of the above vessel on St. Ann's bank—

That little bay [indicating on the map] is called St. Ann's bay. So I presume the bank would be in line—

By the British revenue cruiser Sylph, and her removal to Sydney, where she was subsequently sold.

September 26.—The commissioners disagreed in said case, and the same was submitted to the umpire.

December 23.—The umpire awarded the sum of $2,000, in full of said claim, due the 15th of January, 1855.

Mr. GRAY. I have never seen that; and yet, if the Senator will pardon me, that is all, is it not, that there is of that case?

Mr. HOAR. I do not know but there is considerably more.

Mr. GRAY. Is there any opinion by the umpire or the commissioner who discusses the principles of headland limited exclusion?

Mr. HOAR. What could there be? It was within the headland, 3 miles from shore. Here is the master's reply. I have not the report open at the place. The Senator will find if he will look at the report of the British master of the vessel that seized it.

Mr. GRAY. I have seen that.

Mr. HOAR. He states where he found it.

Mr. GRAY. I have seen that.

Mr. HOAR. The letter of Lord Aberdeen accompanies it, and it was clearly within the headland; it was clearly a British bay if any of these things are British bays. The umpire, after deciding the Washington question, did not find it necessary to give a new judgment—a new opinion.

Mr. GRAY. That may be. I never denied that the case had not been settled; but I found no opinion of Mr. Bates, the umpire, or of the commission discussing that theory or making that a special case.

Mr. HOAR. Let me go a little further.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. I have the floor, and do not yield.

Mr. GRAY. One moment more, if the Senator will pardon me. I have seen the statement of the master, and he claimed that he was 15 miles from the shore.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose he was, and in the bay?

Mr. GRAY. No, he did not claim that he was in the bay.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. I have the floor.

Mr. BECK. I rose to ascertain who had the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. BECK. Then I have no favor to ask.

Mr. HOAR. I do not wish to detain the Senate in this hot weather, but I think it my duty to have the facts settled now at the outset of this debate, that this question under the treaty of 1818 is settled by a solemn international arbitration and judgment. I affirm again, in spite of my honorable friend differing with me in opinion, that it seems to my mind as clear as daylight that the umpire in that case could not put into language a more specific assertion than the assertion he has made that he does not base his opinion upon the ground that Great Britain owns one of the headlands of the Bay of Fundy.

Mr. GRAY. He states it as the ground.

Mr. HOAR. I am making a statement now.

Mr. GRAY. I beg pardon.

Mr. HOAR. He states the fact that Great Britain owns one of the headlands. He also says the headland theory never has been heard of till now, and the language of the treaty of 1818 and the language of the treaty of 1783 mean the same thing, and mean the shore-line, because 1783 must mean the shore-line for it is the spot where they dry fish. Therefore in summing up he says:

I decide that this is not a British bay, and I decide that it is not a bay at all within the meaning of the treaty of 1818.

There is the decision which applies to everything. Then he takes the Argus case, where Great Britain owns both headlands. Talking about 15 miles from shore; several of these bays are 50 or 60 miles, being where Great Britain owned both headlands. He goes on, without stating any new opinion, because it was not necessary as the old one covered it, to award by solemn judgment damages in the case of the Argus.

Mr. BECK. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Thursday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion has been already made and agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I had not heard it. None of us on this side heard it.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President——

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask the Senator from Delaware to yield to me.

Mr. GRAY. I wish to occupy a single moment, and then I shall yield the floor entirely for to-day.

Mr. BECK. I desire to know when the motion was made and agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion was submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] and agreed to by the Senate upon a vote, shortly after the Senate reassembled after the expiration of the recess of thirty minutes which occurred during the speech of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE].

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I do not think it possible certainly this afternoon to have it settled, as the Senator from Massachusetts says he intends to have it settled before we go away from here, that the decision of the umpire in the case of the Washington settled not only the question submitted to the commissioners in that case, but settled the principle of the delimitation of the bays on all those coasts. I submit again to the Senate that the only case before the arbitration commission was the case of the Washington, seized within the fauces terræ of the Bay of Fundy.

Mr. HOAR. It was clear down right opposite Annapolis, Nova Scotia.

Mr. GRAY. Very well; it was within the fauces terræ a good ways, and the only case in regard to that bay whether for the purposes of that treaty it was a British bay; and in that short decision he stated as the grounds of his decision that here was an arm of the sea, as he called it, from 60 to 75 miles wide with one of its headlands in the United States, and then he concludes that under all these circumstances he can not consider this to be a British bay at all, and that there is no ground for the inference that the decision either in fact or in principle applies to any other bay than the bay which he was then considering.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the further consideration of the treaty is postponed until Monday next, by common consent.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent, before that subject passes away, that the proceedings of the Senate in executive session, which by order of the Senate have been made public, so far as they are recorded upon the Journal, shall be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the proceedings of the executive session from which the injunction of secrecy has been removed may be printed, so far as reported, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. MORGAN. That relates back to the beginning of this proceeding?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly; merely what your resolution covered yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky rise to the pending question?

Mr. BECK. Not in regard to the pending question, but I wish to say a word after that is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair then understands that there is no objection, and that the proceedings of the open executive session as they occur will be printed in the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. HOAR. So far as reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So far as reported, and from day to day.

Mr. MORGAN. I did not understand that as being the motion. I understood the motion to refer back to the initial part of the proceedings in executive session.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly, that was it.

Mr. MORGAN. And going all the way up.

Mr. HOAR. I meant to cover what the Senator from Alabama covered by his resolution yesterday. Of course the votes, the proceedings, and motions of the Senate are all journalized and are reported and of record.

Mr. MORGAN. All heretofore had.

Mr. HOAR. My request is that they may be printed in the RECORD from the beginning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the motion practically is that the journal of the executive session be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. MORGAN. That is right.

Mr. HOAR. So far as the injunction of secrecy has been removed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What disposition shall be made of the proceedings of the open executive session—the debates which occur from day to day?

Mr. MORGAN. That will be the subject of another motion, I suppose.

Mr. BECK. I heard the President of the Senate say a moment ago that this matter was postponed until Monday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair stated that by unanimous consent the Chair understood that it was postponed until Monday next, that being the desire of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], who has the floor.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say, and that was my object in rising, that I suppose it is very well known that many gentlemen on this side who desire to take part in this debate will perhaps not be able to be here next week. For one I propose to go to the St. Louis convention, to be very plain about it, and so do a good many others; and if the debate is to go on next week in our absence, I assume that we shall not be authorized to go. I desire, if my wishes will have anything to do with it, that the debate may be postponed until next Monday week, so as to give us all a chance to be here to hear the debate and take part in it.

Mr. TELLER. I suppose the understanding was, when we agreed to open the doors, that the convenience of Senators should be served by the way the discussion should be proceeded with, and I do not presume that anybody is disposed to press the consideration of the treaty in the absence of a large number of Senators. I understood that the Senator from Delaware was willing to speak on Monday and that he preferred to do so.

Mr. BECK. I do not care to stop debate, but I desire to have an understanding that no action shall be taken on the treaty during the absence of Senators who wish to speak upon it. I should like very much to be here during the debate.

Mr. TELLER. I presume other Senators would like to discuss it and would be willing to discuss it perhaps in the absence of some Senators on the other side, but I suppose there might be an understanding that no vote should be taken on it in their absence.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that it is the desire of Senators on this side, so far as I have heard from them, to allow the Senator from Delaware to exercise his election as to the time when he will proceed.

Mr. BECK. All right.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair. I understood myself that the record of to-day's proceedings in open executive session would be printed in the RECORD with to-day's legislative proceedings.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair supposed that to be included in the request of the Senator from Massachusetts, but upon making the suggestion the Senator from Alabama stated that would have to be provided for by another motion.

Mr. TELLER. Then I move that as this discussion proceeds the whole proceedings shall be published in the RECORD, the same as the legislative proceedings.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado moves that the debates and proceedings in open executive session be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from day to day. Is there objection? ["None."] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. Is it the understanding that the Senator from Delaware will proceed on Monday next?

Mr. GRAY. In deference to the wishes of gentlemen on my own side of the Chamber who desire to attend the convention which will assemble on the 5th of June, which is next Tuesday, I should be perfectly willing, and indeed it would be very agreeable to me to let the matter go over until the following Monday. Then we should have a full week for the discussion between the two conventions, when I suppose gentlemen on this side would like to have a similar interim. That would be an agreeable arrangement to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair then understands the Senator from Delaware to ask unanimous consent that the further consideration of the treaty be postponed until one week from next Monday, the 11th day of June. Is there objection?

Mr. CULLOM. What is the date?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Monday, the 11th day of June. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is it the pleasure of the Senate now to proceed to the consideration of legislative business? It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 625) granting a pension to George W. Schell;

A bill (S. 760) granting a pension to Stephen C. Lobdill;

A bill (S. 1015) granting a pension to Margaret M. Collins;

A bill (S. 1017) granting a pension to Stephen Schiedel;

A bill (S. 1083) for the erection of a public building at Tallahassee, Fla.;

A bill (S. 1286) granting a pension to Michael Lane;

A bill (S. 1554) to increase the appropriation for the erection of the public building at Sacramento, Cal.; and

A bill (S. 2738) granting an increase of pension to John G. Merritt.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. BLODGETT (for Mr. MCPHERSON) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

DES MOINES RIVER LANDS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to ask the Senate for its unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 287) to quiet title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands, in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes, at the close of the formal morning business on Thursday next, day after to-morrow. I wish to state my reasons for making this request. It will be necessary for me to leave the city on Saturday morning, and I desire to have the bill taken up and acted on before I leave.

Mr. STEWART. I have no objection, provided the bill for the admission of Washington Territory can come up immediately thereafter.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I have no objection to that.

Mr. DAWES. It was the intention of the Committee on Appropriations to call up the Indian appropriation bill next Thursday.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I hope that the Senator from Massachusetts will not interpose an objection to my request. I have on two or three occasions permitted the bill to pass from its regular order so as to accommodate other Senators. As I have stated, it is necessary for me to be absent from the city, leaving on Saturday morning, and all I ask now is that the same courtesy shall be extended to me that I have extended to others in connection with this identical bill.

Mr. DAWES. So far as the Senator is concerned, and for the reason the Senator gives, of course I would not attempt to push the Indian appropriation bill before him, but the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] suggests that he will consent, provided he can come in with a bill which will certainly take a good deal of time immediately after the bill which the Senator from Iowa has in charge is disposed of.

Mr. STEWART. I should not antagonize the Washington Territory bill against the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. DAWES. Then I have nothing to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that on Thursday next, at the close of the formal morning business, the bill (S. 287) to quiet title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands, in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes, be taken up for consideration and proceeded with.

Mr. EVARTS. I am quite ready, in taking part in the debate on that question adversely to the views of the Senator from Iowa, that the consideration of the bill should be taken up on Thursday, but I am obliged to leave the city on Friday, and it is not for me to say that I would be willing to have it carried on through Friday, if the Senator wishes to go off on Saturday when I have my occasions to carry me off on Friday.

What will be the disposition of the Senate in regard to the bill when it is brought up, whether it is to be proceeded with to its close in disparagement of other measures, it is not for me to say; nor have I any desire to interfere with an opportunity to have the bill discussed; but I do not want to be prevented from asking that it may be laid over until some day after I return to the city.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That will not be satisfactory to me. On two occasions, for the accommodation of the Senator from New York, I consented to the postponement of this bill, once when it was first reached in its regular order on the call of the Calendar, and again on a subsequent occasion. If the Senator from New York wishes to consume considerable time in the discussion of the bill, I am quite content that he shall open the discussion and occupy such time as he may please on Thursday, and I can give him the assurance now that, whether his argument shall be a long one or a short one, I shall not consume more than fifteen or twenty minutes in reply to him, and then I am willing and should be glad to have the Senate take the vote on the bill.

Mr. EVARTS. I have expressly stated that if it does not interfere with my opportunity to leave the city on Friday there shall be no interference with the discussion on my part.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I hope that the Senator will not interfere with my leaving the city on Saturday, inasmuch as on two other occasions I allowed the bill to be set aside in order that he might be accommodated.

Mr. EVARTS. I have agreed to that; but the Senator leaves after Friday and I am going to leave on Friday.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Very well. Perhaps there will not be a session on Friday.

Mr. EVARTS. I hope not.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I should like to get a vote on the bill this week.

Mr. EVARTS. I have not asked the Senator to put it off until Friday. I have only asked, if he brings it on, as he desires, on Thursday, and it is not completed on Thursday, that I am not to be cut off when I am obliged to go away on Friday.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It will be completed on Thursday unless the Senator from New York occupies the whole day in its discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that on Thursday, at the conclusion of the formal morning business, the bill indicated by him shall be taken up and proceeded with until concluded. Is there objection?

Mr. BERRY. Some days ago the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] made an attack upon the Attorney-General of the United States. I tried yesterday to get the floor to reply for a space of time not exceeding fifteen minutes. I was cut off by a motion of the Senator from Ohio to go into executive session at that time. I desire to leave the city on Saturday, and I ask the Senator from Iowa to allow me fifteen minutes on Thursday morning, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business, before he takes up his bill, in order that I may submit those remarks.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I shall not object to that, Mr. President.

Mr. BERRY. With that understanding, of course I have no objection to the arrangement suggested.

Mr. STEWART. I shall not consent to that unless I can have fifteen minutes to reply. I shall be very glad to hear from the Senator from Arkansas, but I shall want to make a few remarks, which I have in store, on that occasion.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator from Nevada can have ample time on the succeeding day.

Mr. STEWART. I do not want to be put off. If I am to be attacked I want to reply at the time.

Mr. BERRY. I desire to make the remarks before I leave on Saturday.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I trust that the Senator from Arkansas will not interpose an objection to the order that I have asked. I would be entirely willing to accord him the fifteen minutes that he desires if it were not for the objection coming from the other quarter.

Mr. STEWART. I make no objection, but I demand my right to reply if attacked.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BERRY. I am informed by Senators around me that it would be entirely proper for me to make any remarks that I desire upon the discussion of the bill referred to by the Senator from Iowa. If that be true, and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] tells me I have a right to do it, I shall with that understanding make no objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands, then, that the request of the Senator from Iowa is acceded to by unanimous consent.

VISITORS TO WEST POINT.

Mr. HOAR. The Chair did me the honor to appoint me one of the committee of the Senate to visit the Military Academy at West Point, from which I had hoped to derive great pleasure and instruction; but I find that it will not be possible for me to perform that service consistently with obligations to duties which are likely to occur here. I must therefore ask the Senate to be excused from that appointment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts declining service upon the Board of Visitors to attend the annual examination of cadets at the United States Military Academy, the Chair appoints the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] in his place.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 6602) for the relief of James Obrion was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves——

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand that a short executive session is desired. I will change the motion to a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Thursday, May 31, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

C. A. McCabe, to be postmaster at Pomeroy, in the county of Garfield and Territory of Washington, the appointment of a postmaster for the said office having, by law, become vested in the President on and after April 1, 1888.

William C. Brawley, to be postmaster at Mauston, in the county of Juneau and State of Wisconsin, in the place of Thomas H. Naughtin, deceased.

PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY.

Twenty-fourth Regiment of Infantry.

First Lieut. Henry Wygant, to be captain, May 15, 1888, vice Leggett, deceased.

Second Lieut. Henry W. Hovey, to be first lieutenant, May 15, 1888, vice Wygant, promoted.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 29, 1888.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

Mr. FORNEY. I demand the regular order.

VETO MESSAGE—J. E. PILCHER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I return without approval House bill No. 330, entitled "An act for the relief of J. E. Pilcher."

This bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the party named therein the sum of $305, being the amount of one bond of $100 and $305 in paper money of the Republic of Texas.

It is directed, however, that this money be paid out of the Texas indemnity fund.

This fund was created under a law passed on the 28th day of February, 1855, appropriating the sum of $7,750,000 to pay certain claims against the Republic of Texas. By the terms of said law a certain time was fixed within which such claims were to be presented to the Treasury Department.

Between the passage of said act and the year 1870 the sum of $7,648,786.73 was paid upon said claims, leaving of the money appropriated an unexpended balance of $101,213.27.

This balance was on the 30th day of June, 1877, carried to the surplus fund and covered into the Treasury, pursuant to section 5 of chapter 328 of the laws of 1874.

Thus since that date, it seems, there has been no Texas indemnity fund, nor is there any such fund now from which the money mentioned in the bill herewith returned can be paid.

In this condition of affairs the proposed law could not be executed and would be of no possible use.

If the claims mentioned are such as should be paid by the United States, there appears to be no difficulty in making an appropriation for their payment from the general funds of the Government. I notice an item to meet a similar claim was inserted in a deficiency bill passed on the 7th day of July, 1884.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 26, 1888.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 1978) for the erection of a public building at Paterson, N. J.

A bill (H. R. 401) granting a pension to Mrs. Jeannie Stone; and

Joint resolution (S. R. 87) authorizing and directing the payment of the salaries of the officers and employés of Congress for the month of May, 1888.

JOSEPH W. M'CONNELL.

Mr. CHEADLE. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 3544) granting a pension to Joseph W. McConnell, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions adversely, be placed upon the Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. FORNEY. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees for reports; and in connection with that, I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen having reports to make have leave to present them to the Clerk for reference to the appropriate Calendars.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

The question being taken on Mr. FORNEY'S motion to dispense with the call of committees for reports, it was agreed to (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

FILING OF REPORTS.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

FRANK M. MARTIN.

WILLIAM E. WHEELER.

Mr. THOMPSON, of California, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably with amendment the bill (H. R. 2046) for the relief of William E. Wheeler; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM JACK.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 2776) granting a pension to William Jack; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MILITARY STORES FOR REGULARLY ENLISTED AND ACTIVE MILITIA.

Mr. McADOO, from the Committee on the Militia, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 1959) authorizing the Secretary of War to issue to the governor of the Territory of Montana military stores for the use of the regularly enlisted, organized, and uniformed active militia; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FORNEY. I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. BLOUNT in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 9377) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes. The Clerk will report the pending paragraph.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Territory of Montana: For salary of governor, $2,600; chief-justice and three associate judges, at $3,000 each; and secretary, at $1,800, $16,400.

Mr. TOOLE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend on line 6, page 61, by striking out the words "twenty-six hundred" and inserting "thirty-five hundred" in lieu thereof. Also amend by striking out the words "one thousand eight hundred," in line 8, same page, and insert "two thousand five hundred" in lieu thereof. Also strike out the word "sixteen," in line 8, and the words "thousand four hundred," in line 9, same page, and insert "eighteen thousand" in lieu thereof.

Mr. TOOLE. The Revised Statutes of the United States fix the salaries of governors at $3,500 and that of the secretaries at $2,500. This bill fixes the salaries at $2,600 and $1,800, respectively. The point of order has been made and sustained that such appropriations change existing law, and this being so it was not in the province of the Appropriation Committee to make the proposed change. The only excuse for this is that former committees have done the same thing. Everybody admits that the action of the committee is in derogation of law, is a plain and palpable violation of a positive statute. If this power shall be permitted to be exercised by the Appropriation Committee by mere sufferance indefinitely, then the exercise of this power will soon come to have the force and effect of law.

The maxim obsta principiis is especially applicable here. A principle once surrendered trembles at every new attack. These encroachments upon the general law by the indirect method employed in this bill ought to be resisted before the power of the Appropriations Committee becomes so formidable as to be alarming. While it is true, as before stated, that the Committee on Appropriations were never charged by law with the duty of establishing salaries, there may have been some plausibility in the action of the committee after assuming the power in decreasing the salaries of Territorial governors and secretaries twelve or fourteen years ago. At that time the Territories were sparsely settled and their duties were neither onerous nor especially responsible. In the days when this innovation was first made Territorial governors had little to do except to appoint notaries public and grant pardons.

Since that time the Territories have grown in population and wealth in a marvelous way. Montana at that time had less than 30,000 people and less than $20,000,000 of assessable property. It now has a population of over 200,000 and an assessable valuation of $100,000,000. The governor is invested with the veto, however, and charged with the responsibility of appointing many of our administrative officers. In his absence or inability to act the secretary becomes the acting governor. Waiving the question of the power to change existing law in an appropriation bill, I submit that the salaries reported are incommensurate with the duties and responsibilities of the officers named.

The question being taken on the amendment offered by Mr. TOOLE, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph, under the heading "Territory of Utah:"

For expenses of the commission: For printing, stationery, clerk-hire, and office-rent, $10,000: Provided, That out of this sum the commission is hereby authorized to pay the secretary of the Territory, who is its secretary and disbursing agent, a reasonable sum for such service, not exceeding $300, for the fiscal year 1889.

Mr. FORNEY. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer the amendment which I send to the desk. The object is to reduce the expenditure to $7,000.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 63, strike out all of line 6 down to and including the word "dollars," in line 7, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"For the following expenses of the commission, namely, for traveling expenses, printing, stationery, clerk-hire, and office-rent, $7,000."

Mr. FORNEY. The object of this amendment is to prevent the commission from paying their hotel bills out of this fund.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Territory of Washington: For salary of governor, $2,600; chief-justice and three associate judges, at $3,000 each; and secretary, at $1,800, $16,400.

For legislative expenses, namely: For rent of secretary's office, hire of messenger, light, fuel, stationery, postage, office furniture, repairs, and other incidentals, $1,500.

For contingent expenses of the Territory, to be expended by the governor, $500.

Mr. VOORHEES. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 63 strike out all of lines 21 to 24, inclusive, and insert:

For legislative expenses of the twelfth biennial session of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Washington (which session is authorized to meet on the second Monday of January, 1889, at 12 o'clock noon, and each succeeding session shall meet biennially thereafter), namely, for per diem of members of the Territorial Legislature and officers thereof; for mileage; for repairing capitol building, legislative hall, council chamber; repairing furniture, carpets, and matting; and for fuel, stationery, and for other incidental expenses of the Legislature; legislative printing, rent of secretary's office, hire of messenger, light, fuel, stationery, office furniture, repairs, and other incidentals, $22,000.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. Chairman, under the law as it now stands, the next Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory, which will be elected at the next general election, is not authorized to meet until the first Monday in December, 1889. The purpose of this amendment is to make effectual the act of the Legislative Assembly, passed at its last session, providing that the next session of the Assembly, the twelfth biennial session, shall meet on the second Monday of January in 1889, at 12 o'clock noon. The effect is simply to enable the Assembly to meet at a reasonable time after its election in November, rather than compel it to wait thirteen or fourteen months. That is the only effect of the amendment, and it is necessary, as a matter of course, that the appropriation which in the ordinary course of events would be made in the next legislative appropriation bill shall be made now, in order that the act of the Legislative Assembly to which I have referred may be made effective. I am satisfied that there can be no objection to this amendment, and I sincerely hope that the House will consider it favorably.

Mr. FORNEY. The gentleman from Washington has stated the situation of affairs there, and it is a matter for the House to determine whether they will make the appropriation now or wait till next year. So far as I am concerned I have no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Territory of Wyoming: For salary of governor, $2,600; chief-justice and two associate judges, at $3,000 each; and secretary, at $1,800, $13,400.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by striking out, in line 4, page 64, the words "two thousand six hundred," and insert in lieu thereof "three thousand five hundred." Also amend by striking out, in line 6, page 64, the words "one thousand eight hundred," and insert "two thousand five hundred."

Mr. CAREY. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is the same as has been stated by the gentlemen who have preceded me in offering like amendments, applicable to the Territories of Dakota, Idaho, and Montana. The law of Congress fixes the salary of the governor at $3,500 and that of the secretary at $2,500. Section 1845 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is as follows:

From and after the 1st day of July, 1873, the annual salaries of the governors of the several Territories shall be $3,500 and the salaries of the secretaries shall be $2,500 each.

This law has not been changed. By an examination of this bill it will be found that a very small amount is to be appropriated for the contingent expenses of the Territory, and this bill reduces the salary of the governor to the extent of $1,000 and that of the secretary to the extent of $700. Every one who is acquainted with the Western Territories, which, on an average, are at least 2,000 miles from the Atlantic seaboard, knows how very expensive it is to live in that country. While all the Territorial officers of Wyoming are opposed to me in politics, yet this fact does not deter me from asking that the amendment be adopted as an act of simple justice. The governor and secretary are entitled to the salaries which are now fixed by law. There can be no good reason why these salaries should be reduced in this indirect way, and in a way not permitted by the rules of this House. By section 1855 of the Revised Statutes a Territorial Legislature is prohibited from increasing the compensation of the governor, secretary, and members of the Legislative Assembly. This law does not limit the Legislative Assembly in providing extra compensation to the judges. In most of the Territories this condition of things exists. The judges draw $3,000 salary from the United States Treasury and some extra compensation from the Territorial or county treasury in the Territory wherein they reside.

The Territorial Legislatures have increased the compensation of the judges without any importunity on the part of the judges. They have voted this extra compensation to each of the judges, amounting to from $1,000 to $2,500 additional annual salary, because they consider the salary paid by the United States too small to enable these men to live comfortably.

If the people of the Territories had the authority to do so I have no doubt provision would be made to increase the salary of the governor and that of the secretary to such an amount as would make their respective salaries equal, at least, to the amount fixed by the Revised Statutes. This Government is rich enough to pay its Territorial officers competent salaries. The people of the Territories have no voice in the selection of their officers. They should not be required to pay any part of the salaries, yet they are generous enough to do so if Congress fails to do its duty in this matter.

I hope, therefore, that the amendment will be adopted. The amendment will not make the salaries larger than they should be, and it will not change an existing law, but its adoption will be in strict conformity to the ruling made by the chairman of the committee yesterday.

Mr. FORNEY. Mr. Chairman, all I have to say about it is that the governor and secretary of Wyoming get the same salaries that have been allowed to the governor and secretary of Dakota and the other Territories.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For legislative expenses, namely: For rent, fuel, lights, stationery, postage, messenger, clerk, and incidental expenses of secretary's office; for new furniture and carpets in governor's and secretary's office in new capitol building, $2,000.

For contingent expenses of the Territory, to be expended by the governor, $500.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to that paragraph.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by adding to line 14, page 64, the following words:

"Provided, That the governor, secretary, and judges of the supreme court of each of the organized Territories, except Alaska, shall hereafter be appointed from the bona fide residents of the Territory wherein they are to serve."

Mr. FORNEY. I make the point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. CAREY. I ask the gentleman from Alabama to withdraw his point of order for one minute.

Mr. FORNEY. I will do so at the gentleman's request.

[Mr. CAREY withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I offer an amendment to come in in line 19 of the paragraph just read; to insert the words "four hundred" after the word "thousand;" so that it will read:

One disbursing clerk, at $2,400.

Mr. FORNEY. I make the point of order on that. We have given all the law allows.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not think that there is any law fixing this salary.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish the gentleman from Alabama would point me to any law fixing this salary.

Mr. RANDALL. The law of the appropriation bill of last year fixes the compensation in the absence of any permanent law.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But that is not such a law, in my judgment, as is contemplated by the rule. If the salary is not fixed by any permanent law, it is wholly subject to such legislation as Congress may see proper to enact in that regard in an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has sustained the point of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But, if the Chair please, I make the point that there is no law fixing this salary.

The CHAIRMAN. This is not by any means a new ruling. The Chair has ruled in this same way more than once during the consideration of this bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Has the Chair heretofore held that the annual appropriation bills make such a provision of law as to lay the foundation for a point of order like this in the absence of any statute law upon the subject?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has so held: that, in the absence of any other law, the appropriation bill of the current year fixes the compensation.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. With all due respect to the Chair, it has been held over and over again that such is not the law contemplated by the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has some recollection of a number of rulings just the reverse of that.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the office of the Adjutant-General: One chief clerk, at $2,000; twenty-five clerks of class 4; thirty-five clerks of class 3; sixty-nine clerks of class 2; three hundred and fifty-nine clerks of class 1; sixteen clerks, at $1,000 each; five messengers; forty-five assistant messengers; three watchmen; three laborers; in all, $687,140: Provided, That one clerk of class 4, two clerks of class 2, and six clerks of class 1 shall be employed for the sole purpose of completing, with the necessary detail from the existing force, the regimental registers of the volunteer forces of the several States during the late war. And not less than two hundred of the clerks in the office of the Adjutant-General shall be exclusively engaged in preparing and making reports to expedite the settlement of pension applications and soldiers' claims.

Mr. PETERS. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking if the appropriation for the support of the office of the Adjutant-General is equal to the estimates that have been made by the Department?

Mr. RANDALL. They are not.

Mr. FORNEY. So far as the clerical force is concerned they are.

Mr. PETERS. I wish to ask, in addition, if this provision requiring two hundred clerks in the office to be exclusively engaged in preparing and making reports to expedite the settlement of pension applications and soldiers' claims embraces the amount of force requested by the Department?

Mr. FORNEY. Yes, sir; it does. The only change made by the committee is that they asked for more messengers to wait upon them, and we gave them forty-five, which we thought was enough. The clerical force is just what was estimated for.

Mr. PETERS. Right here, Mr. Chairman, let me say the force asked by the Department has been asked for the purpose of bringing up the work of that Department. I think it is well known to those who have had experience in the Department that the work has been very much behind; and while there have been a vast number of calls upon the office for information as to the status of these claims, we have not been able to get any satisfaction.

I send to the Clerk's desk to be read a letter from the Adjutant-General in relation to a claim, which is a sample of the information which is frequently given to parties who make inquiry as to the status of claims pending in the Department.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, May 26, 1888.

SIR: In reply to your reference to the claim of Capt. William B. Davis (Washington Court-House, Fayette County, Ohio), late of the Seventy-third Ohio Volunteers, for amendment of his military record under the provisions of the act approved June 3, 1884, and the act amendatory thereof, approved February 3, 1887, I have the honor to state that, in justice to all claimants under these acts, it has been found necessary to take up claims in the order of dates on which they were filed.

Unless, therefore, there is some urgent reason why the claim should be made special, such as the extreme sickness of the applicant or his impoverished condition, it can not be taken up out of its regular order.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. C. DRUM, Adjutant-General.

Hon. SAMUEL R. PETERS,
House of Representatives.

Mr. PETERS. Now that, I repeat, is a sample of the information that we have been able to obtain from that Department in relation to claims pending before it. I do not blame the Department, because, as is well known, they have had an insufficient force in order to keep up with the current work. Of course that letter embodies no information that is of any satisfaction to any member of Congress or to the individual whose application is pending. We all know that these claims will not be taken up out of their order, and it is but little information to my friend Captain Davis, who had the corner of one of his shoulders shot away by a shell at Gettysburgh, to be informed that his claim will be taken up some time in the future; in the "sweet by and by," when it will be reached in its regular order.

There is an immense amount of comfort to the wounded soldier in information of that kind. I am glad we are now in a situation that during the coming fiscal year when an applicant calls at the Department, through his member of Congress or through any member of Congress, for information he may be able to get some definite information as to when the claim will be disposed of.

Wherever the responsibility rests for not obtaining the information, I am glad to know that hereafter during the next fiscal year when I call upon the Department for information I may expect to receive it, in place of having such an evasive reply as that which I have instanced and many others which might be instanced.

Mr. WARNER. I wish to ask the gentleman if it is not the fact that in that office they are now at work on the claims dating from December, 1884?

Mr. PETERS. That is the information which has been given me with reference to most of these cases; but in this instance they did not even give me that information.

Mr. DOCKERY. They have the work further up than that.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas withdraw the pro forma amendment?

Mr. PETERS I do.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I renew the amendment. I did not hear the first portion of the remarks of the gentleman from Kansas; but I suppose he refers to the condition of work in the Adjutant-General's Office. I made inquiry myself as to that, and I am informed by General Drum that he will be able in a short time to dispose of every case in that office. The difficulty arose from the fact that in the first six months after the passage of the bill referred to there was a gorge; a vast majority of the applications came in in that period. But the Department has now got these cases nearly all off its hands. There were not many that came in during the last year; and the Adjutant-General tells me that, without additional clerical force, he will in a short time be able to dispose of all the pending cases.

I am informed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the Surgeon-General's department is up with its work. I had in view to report from the Committee on Military Affairs a measure which had been referred to that committee looking to the very purpose the gentleman from Kansas has in view. We are all anxious these claims should be adjusted; but I am satisfied the Adjutant-General will be able to get along with the force he has at his disposal, and at the end of the present year he will have disposed of all the cases pending.

Mr. HOVEY. The information I have is quite the contrary of what has been stated by the gentleman from Illinois. I am informed that that office is three or four years in arrear of its work. I understand that is the fact in regard to it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I tried to make the gentleman understand that the claims were brought in early after the passage of the act and that few cases have been brought in recently. The majority of the cases were put in during the first year.

Mr. HOVEY. I am informed they have not got beyond 1884, and at that rate ten years more will not finish the work.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I believe they have got beyond 1884.

Mr. HOVEY. I am told that ten thousand cases remain now unfinished, and that it will require ten years more to dispose of them at the rate the work is now proceeding.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Even if we agree to provide more clerks they could make no use of them unless you provided them with rooms and furniture.

Mr. HOVEY. Then provide the rooms and furniture

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I understand they are satisfied with the provision made here.

Mr. HOVEY. Of course the soldier needs nothing!

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will ask my colleague whether he has seen General Drum?

Mr. HOVEY. I have letters from the Assistant Adjutant-General.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If the gentleman will take the trouble to go to the office and see General Drum himself, I am satisfied he will convince him that no further legislation is necessary.

Mr. HOVEY. I have letters from that office, and if the gentleman wants to see them I will show them to him. I have letters from General Kelton in regard to that very matter.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 65, line 13, strike out "forty-five" and insert "fifty-one;" so that it will read "fifty-one assistant messengers."

Mr. BOOTHMAN. In offering this amendment I desire to emphasize what has been said by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS]. Since this session commenced I have addressed numerous inquiries in pension claims to the Pension Office and have received as answer that the claims were awaiting replies to requests for information directed to the Adjutant-General, perhaps six or seven months before. I have no doubt that is a common experience on this side of the House. It is a state of things which should no longer exist.

I find the estimate for that office is for fifty-one assistant messengers, whereas the bill provides for forty-five. I suppose fifty-one assistant messengers is the number now provided by law; and I desire to make the point of order against the bill in that particular. I ask to have it restored to what the law now is in that regard. I think it improper to cut down the force of that office in any respect, when business therein is in the condition that it now appears to be.

Mr. FORNEY. I ask to have the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. FORNEY. Heretofore the Adjutant-General's force occupied several buildings and needed more messengers. All his force is now in the War and Navy Department, and we think it just and proper to cut down the number of assistant messengers from fifty-one to forty-five. This is not the clerical force, but these are messengers to wait on the clerks.

Mr. RANDALL. Every man has to have a servant in that building.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I ask whether this estimate of the Adjutant-General was furnished at the time when he occupied his present quarters.

Mr. FORNEY. When the estimate was made he was not occupying his present quarters, but had his force in several buildings. He is now located in the War, State, and Navy Department.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I would further inquire whether he has made any reduction of his estimate since the change?

Mr. FORNEY. I do not think he has.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. Then I think the law ought to stand as it was before.

Mr. RANDALL. The truth is, this reduction is not enough, it ought to be larger, but the Committee on Appropriations did not think it well to make too large a cut of this class of employés at this time.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. I am entirely opposed to making any reduction that will affect the efficiency of that office.

Mr. RANDALL. You would not keep men there that were not required.

Mr. CANNON. I understand that the offices are now brought together in one building and that this force will probably be sufficient.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. I do not think there will be any trouble about it.

Mr. RANDALL. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on the amendment.

On a division the amendment was rejected—ayes 3, noes 45.

Mr. CHEADLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order that I may ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] a question. I wish to ask him whether the clerical force in the Adjutant-General's Office according to the estimates for the next fiscal year is larger than the clerical force for the present fiscal year?

Mr. FORNEY. It is exactly the same, and in accordance with the estimates.

Mr. CHEADLE. Then, Mr. Chairman, I simply want to make this statement of fact: Every member who has any business with that office is well aware that upon all claims filed by ex-soldiers for a remuster, and for bounties and back pay, the office is three years and six months behindhand. They are now considering in that office claims that were filed in December, 1884, and I submit that if relief is ever to come to these claimants it ought to come during their lifetime, for it is no solace to a man who has a just claim against the Government to be told that he may have it considered and decided after waiting five years and a half, as they have to wait now. I submit, sir, that we ought to increase the clerical force of that office so as at least to enable it to keep the business not more than one year behind. One word more. This is my first term in Congress, and, of course, it is only about a year since I have had any business whatever with that Department, having begun to correspond with the office immediately after my election; and I want to state the fact that they are not two months further along now in the adjudication of these claims than they were in the fall of 1886, and my colleague, Mr. HOVEY, says that there are 10,000 claims of that character pending.

Mr. FORNEY. Yes; and there are 561 clerks in that office, and we think that is enough.

Mr. CHEADLE. But I submit to the gentleman that if those 561 clerks in a year's time have not gained on the calendar more than two months, and if the office is three years and a half behind with the work (as we know it is), some remedy ought to be found. I withdraw the formal amendment.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, the chief delay in the matter of soldiers' pensions arises in the Surgeon-General's Office, and it is not because of the lack of sufficient employés, but because of the condition of the records. In the Forty-Seventh Congress I had occasion to examine into that matter, and I found that the number of volumes of records in the office was over 11,000, and that they were unindexed. To find the record of any particular soldier in that office requires the manipulation of several of these unindexed records, and only a limited number of persons can examine them at the same time. I think the number of employés is sufficient, but the condition of the records is what causes the delay. Then, too, numbers of these records are being continually worn out and are in the hands of the binders for rebinding and in the hands of copyists to be recopied. I introduced a resolution in the Forty-seventh Congress looking to the indexing of all those records. I found that they could be indexed without interrupting the current business, and that at the end of three years the office would be in a position to get rid of all this confusion and delay, and would be able to dispense with two-thirds of the clerks now required; but it was not considered necessary to make the change, and the consequence is that we have been poking on in the way that has been described ever since. The indexing of those 11,000 volumes of records in the Surgeon-General's Office is absolutely necessary to the proper transaction of the business, yet nobody comes forward to make provision for it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I have not examined carefully the proposition of the Committee on Appropriations, and therefore I am not in a position to criticise their recommendation; but I want to supplement what has been said by my colleague [Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR], that there is still another Department in which I have encountered vastly more delay in pension cases that have come under my care than in the Pensions Department itself. I refer to the Adjutant-General's Office, and I think it has been the experience of members of Congress generally that they have received more suggestions of delay, and have been oftener and longer put off by the Adjutant-General's Office than by the Pensions Office.

Now, I do not undertake to say that the Adjutant-General's Office is at all to blame for this. I do not know that there is in that office any lack of system or industry, although in regard to the latter I may have some suspicion. But I do know that there is something lacking there; and hence, having the interests of the soldiers as near to my heart as they are, I do not think it wise for me to run counter to the suggestion of the Committee on Appropriations, which looks simply to a result growing out of the change in the location of the bureaus of the Pension Department. I think wisdom calls upon us not only to provide the means for indexing the Surgeon-General's records, but to provide in some way that will be effective a reform in the Adjutant-General's Office.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, in regard to the Surgeon-General's Office and the work in that office touching pensions, I understand that the force of the office is now substantially engaged upon current work.

Mr. FORNEY. That is what we understand.

Mr. CANNON. There was some delay up to probably a year or fifteen months ago, when the Surgeon-General's Office commenced doing extra work, and that extra work was done for some time by the force of clerks already in the office—trained clerks—and they caught up.

As to the propriety of reproducing the records in the Surgeon-General's Office, that matter has been from time to time inquired into. At one time there was a proposition to photolithograph the records; but that, on consideration, was thought not to be practicable. There is now in the Surgeon-General's Office substantially the same force of clerks as for five or six years past. In the Forty-seventh Congress, I believe—I do not undertake to speak with entire accuracy, but I think I am stating the date very nearly—the force of clerks in the Surgeon-General's Office, the Adjutant-General's Office, and the Pension Office was, upon the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations, substantially doubled.

Mr. RANDALL. That was in 1882.

Mr. CANNON. That was done in 1882, upon an estimate that in three years the work could be brought up so that the office would then be engaged on current work and the force could be reduced. It has not been reduced.

So far as concerns the Adjutant's-General's Office there is a continuation of the same force. I understand that in pension work the Adjutant-General's Office is very nearly up—is doing something approaching current work, or has at least made very great gain in the last fifteen months. The clerks in that office have done extra work a part of that time; and I believe that the force in the Adjutant-General's Office, being a trained force and having access to the records being housed in the State, War, and Navy Department building, should be encouraged—ay, more, required to do extra work; and that, if necessary, we should do as we have done heretofore, give additional compensation for that extra work. We have done this in respect to the Treasury Department, and I believe it has been done in the War Department also. It is much better to do this than to grant an additional number of clerks.

My opinion is that in the Pension Office, the Surgeon-General's Office, and the Adjutant-General's Office the clerical force is as large as can work to advantage, and that if extra speed in the performance of the work is to be attained it must be by means of extra work of the existing force and a better administration. I think the existing force can work extra hours, and in that way bring up the business (as suggested by my friends from Indiana on this side and on the other); or at least can make great gain upon the present condition of business. I acknowledge that there is ground for complaint in regard to the present condition of the work; but I think the practical way to meet the case is in the administration; and as one member of the House I stand ready to give my vote in favor of additional compensation for such extra work. There has already been presented to the Committee on Appropriations a claim for pay for extra work in the Adjutant-General's Office—work done outside of regular hours—by the present trained force that can do more work in one hour than any raw force which might be put in could do in six hours. I propose to vote in favor of paying that extra compensation.

Mr. RANDALL. After the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], I do not think it necessary that anything further be said on the subject.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

State, War, and Navy Department Building:

Office of the superintendent: One clerk class 1, one chief engineer, at $1,200; eight assistant engineers, at $1,000 each; one captain of the watch, $1,200; two lieutenants of the watch, at $840 each; fifty-eight watchmen; one carpenter, $1,000; one machinist, at $900; one plumber, at $900; one painter, at $900; four skilled laborers, at $720 each; twenty-four firemen; ten conductors of elevators, at $720 each; twenty laborers; and eighty charwomen; in all, $118,520.

Mr. FORNEY. In order to correct a clerical error, I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out, in line 23, the words "and twenty."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 12 strike out the word "two" and insert in lieu thereof the word "four."

In line 13, after the word "thousand," insert the words "two hundred."

In line 20, after the word "firemen," insert the words "at $900 each."

Mr. FORNEY. I make a point of order on that amendment. It proposes to increase salaries beyond the amounts fixed in the current law—the appropriation act passed last year.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for a decision on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not care to hear discussion upon it. The Chair has ruled on this question before.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I move to amend by striking out the last word. This House ought to have the right in considering this bill of making such corrections as in its judgment are necessary to perfect it. The salary of the chief engineer of the State, War, and Navy Department building is $1,200. I would call the attention of the committee to the fact that the gentleman occupying this position is a master mechanic, and as such could easily command a salary in any private or municipal corporation of from $1,500 to $1,800.

Mr. FORNEY. Why does he not take it, then?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I submit that that is no argument why an amendment should not be introduced increasing his salary. Under this very bill services of similar nature are paid different rates, and it should be our purpose to make the pay of employés performing the same duties as nearly equal as possible. Let me call attention to the inconsistencies of this bill in this regard. The chief engineer of the Senate receives $2,160; the chief engineer of the House, doing exactly the same amount of work, if not more, having the same responsibility, receives $1,700, or $460 less than that received by the chief engineer of the Senate. The engineers of the Treasury Department, the Post-Office Department, and the two engineers in the Surgeon-General's Department receive $1,400 each, or $200 more than this bill provides for the chief engineer of the State, War, and Navy building, who has as much if not more work, and certainly far greater responsibility.

The State, War, and Navy Building is one of the finest and most complete public structures in the city of Washington. It has, I understand, forty boilers, many elevators, and about 40 miles of pipe, over which a constant supervision must be kept. The chief engineer and his assistants, whose salary under my amendment I have asked to be increased from $1,000 to $1,200, and the firemen, whose salary I have asked to be increased to $900, they being skilled mechanics, namely, plumbers, blacksmiths, bricklayers, tinsmiths, etc., who have been selected on account of their different trades, make all the repairs necessary in the building, all hands often working overtime, for which they receive no additional pay.

I wish to call the attention of the committee to another fact, that these men are employed every day in the week, and in fact a fireman in this building who is a skilled mechanic receives less per day than many a laborer provided for in this bill. It is only these inconsistencies in this bill to which I object. In many sections of the bill we find that firemen and workmen that are skilled have been allowed $900 and in some instances even more for their services. Why, then, should an exception be made in this case, doing evident injustice to deserving men?

I have been informed that the payment of bills to outside parties for repairs to this building, so vast in its size, does not amount to over $100 per annum, it only being necessary to call for outside help when the required tools and materials are not on hand. I do not hesitate here to emphatically state that any employé of this Government should have a right to demand at any time, without prejudice to himself, an increase of pay. I can not agree that the answer to be given to such an employé should be: If you are not satisfied there are plenty to take your place.

Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied that this House should have the power to correct the inconsistencies in this bill, and I therefore feel compelled to appeal from the decision of the Chair in order that this House may decide upon the matter itself.

Mr. RANDALL. The appeal comes too late. The gentleman moved to strike out the last word, and made his five-minute speech on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order comes too late.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This bill is not only inconsistent with itself in giving different compensations for like duties, but it is also inconsistent with the rules of the House and the law of the land. I wish to read the latter portion of clause 3 of Rule XXI, where it is provided:

Nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

Now, I hold in my hand a document printed at the expense of the Government, although not furnished to members of the House, and having on it the stamp of the Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives, February 29, 1888, and which has therefore been in existence for several months. Now, I gather from this document that included in this bill there are one hundred and twenty-two direct violations of the rules. There are over one hundred and twenty-two direct violations of the rules of the House involved in this bill, and I take it, Mr. Chairman, that it is time this House should decide whether it makes its own rules or the Committee on Appropriations makes the rules for the House. It is for us to decide whether the rules having been passed upon shall not be binding on that committee but shall be binding on every one of the committees of this House.

I find by looking further through this document that there are two hundred and fifty salaries either increased or decreased over, not the amount placed in the last appropriation bill, but over the amount provided in the Revised Statutes or permanent law of the land. Now, then, if it is necessary to revise these statutes and reduce these salaries, let us do it in a proper manner by bringing in a bill rearranging salaries, but do not let us do it in violation of the rules of the House and in violation of the law of the land. As I have already stated this bill is not only inconsistent with itself, but is in palpable violation of the rules of the House and the law of the country.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 12, strike out "two" and insert "four;" in line 13, insert after the word "thousand" the words "two hundred;" in line 20, after the word "firemen," the words "at eight hundred and ninety dollars each."

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order raised on the previous amendment was that it was a change of existing law. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. RANDALL. I do.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. PAYSON. What is the precise question?

The amendment was again read.

Mr. RANDALL. The last salary is different, but the other two are the same.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will withdraw the other two.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will treat the amendment as one.

Mr. PAYSON. The point of order, I believe, is that the amendment is in violation of the third clause of Rule XXI. From that decision of the Chair the gentleman from New Jersey appeals, and I would like to be heard on the appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. PAYSON. The question here presented is substantially identical with the one upon which I submitted some observations to the House a few days ago. An examination of the remarks I then made only strengthens me now in the correctness of that position, that the decision of the Chair is incorrect upon this proposition. But feeling that perhaps on that occasion I did not make myself as thoroughly understood or make my remarks as explicit as I ought to have done, I venture an additional suggestion on the appeal now pending.

With the merits of the proposition here presented on the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey I am not concerned, but with the principle underlying the ruling of the Chair I am concerned, as I think the whole committee is concerned.

I think, Mr. Chairman, the fundamental mistake into which the Chair has fallen—and I say it with all due respect to the Chair—is this: The provision of the rule which is claimed as the basis of the decision is this:

Nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

The ruling of the Chair is based upon the assumption that existing law is whatever is found within the lids of either the general statute or of any special statute. My criticism upon the ruling is that the existing law under the rule I have quoted is exactly tantamount to general law. That is to say, applying that principle to the provisions of this bill wherever there is a general statute providing for the creation of an office and the fixing of a salary or the fixing of a salary in an office which has already been created and which is continuing in its terms, that, and that alone, is existing law within the purview of the rule; and wherever an annual provision or regulation as to salary is found in an appropriation bill that provision is the existing law only as to that appropriation bill, and expires with the expiration of the term for which the appropriation was made.

Carrying the idea further, and applying it to these twenty-four firemen provided for in this legislative appropriation bill, there is no existing law with reference to them at all. There is no existing law referring to them in any shape or in any form. It seems to me it is a very clear proposition then.

Mr. McKENNA. There is no statute providing for their employment?

Mr. PAYSON. No; the provisions as to these employés are found only in the continuing appropriation bills beginning and ending with each fiscal year, and it is the law and the law only for the time named in the bill. Making the appropriation, therefore, for these firemen and providing their salary is no violation of any existing law under the rule, for, as a matter of fact, the salary provided for in the legislative bill we are now enacting begins on the 1st of next July and continues for one year thereafter, which is a period beginning after the expiration of the current appropriation bill.

It seems to me, therefore, that here is just where the difficulty lies that has led the Chair into an error, and into making a decision based upon the existence of the current appropriation bill as existing law; whereas, as a matter of fact, this is a provision to go into effect in the future, applicable to an office as to which there is no regulation in the statute-books at all.

I think, therefore, gentlemen of the committee, that the judgment of the Chair ought not to stand as the judgment of the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. The judgment of the Chair has controlled the committee throughout its deliberations upon this bill, and has always been acquiesced in.

Mr. PAYSON. Because there has never been an appeal from the decision of the Chair. And I submit to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that by simply acquiescing in a mistaken decision of the Chair does not bind the committee now, when an appeal is taken and the direct question is presented.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to having the issue made.

Mr. PAYSON. I would be glad to know the judgment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania on the question.

Mr. RANDALL. When you come to vote on the question the gentleman will discover what my judgment is.

Mr. PAYSON. Has the gentleman from Pennsylvania any objection to expressing an opinion?

Mr. RANDALL. I will do so when the proper time comes, by my vote.

Mr. PAYSON. Then the committee will understand the attitude of the gentleman.

Mr. LAWLER. Mr. Chairman, I believe if the committee had heard or paid attention to the representations made by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] in presenting this amendment as to the class of work done by these mechanics—for they may be termed such, I think—the Committee on Appropriations reporting this bill would have come to the conclusion that they work long, tedious hours and for a very small compensation; and it is only with those having the bill in charge now to consent that the alterations which have been suggested here may take place in order that justice may be done to these hard-worked men. I have reasoned with members of the committee, because I question the right or propriety of taking from members of Congress the privilege and authority of considering matters of this kind, and of being able to give proper consideration to the claims of men who are compelled to work every day in the week, called upon even at night, and who work often upon Sundays. They are entitled to it, and they should not be deterred by any technical construction of the rules of the House, or be prevented from offering suitable amendments to give them a reasonable compensation, certainly not less compensation than $2 a day; and when the head of a Department recommends a dollar and a half or a dollar a day for such service, such a recommendation should not be tolerated by members of Congress.

I, for one, propose to interpose my protest against such things. I say to this side of the House that we can not go before the country on such an issue. I say that we have claimed to be the friends of these people, and we are asked by the other side to meet them on this issue. Now, I insist that men who are competent firemen—they are not laborers, but have to go through a thorough examination for the purpose of obtaining these places in charge of the boilers, the same as engineers—ought to get at least $2 a day.

Mr. FORNEY. They get more than $2 a day.

Mr. LAWLER. They ought to get more than they do in this bill.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I want to correct the statement of the gentleman who has charge of the bill, because I believe he wants to pay fair wages. The pay of a fireman is $720 a year. They work seven days in a week and only get $1.97 per day. They are skilled mechanics, plumbers, blacksmiths, etc. I am satisfied if this amendment can be considered on its merits it will be agreed to.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. The other day when this point of order was raised I took the position now occupied by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON]. I thought then I was right, but not being certain, because I had not carefully examined the question, I did not appeal from the decision of the Chair. Having examined it more carefully, I have become confirmed in my opinion that I was right. The reason is this: This bill under consideration does not become law and will not become law until the first moment of the first day of July, 1888. The existing law that would be infringed by this amendment, if it does infringe any existing law, ends on the last moment of the last day of June, 1888. Therefore the adoption of such an amendment as is proposed has not changed any existing law, for it can only apply to the salary to be given for another year's work, for which there is no provision of law now existing.

If it was to create an office I admit that then it would be a change of existing law. But the office is now created, and the question that arises is how shall it be provided for as regards compensation for the next year. And any change in the amount in this bill to take effect on the first moment of the first day of July, 1888, would not be a change in the compensation existing now, which ends on the last moment of the last day of June, 1888. That is why I think the ruling of the Chair was against the principle of the rule and against the right of members.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to say just a word on the point of order. I think it should have been made in the early part of the consideration of this bill and then settled definitely. But as it is before the committee now on appeal, and I shall have to vote on that question of appeal, I desire to explain my vote to the committee, the decision of the Chair having been reiterated again and again.

Mr. PAYSON. Will my colleague allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYSON. The same point was made early in the discussion of the bill, but was then withdrawn by the gentleman from Alabama having charge of the bill, thus preventing an appeal by myself.

Mr. SPRINGER. For the sake of convenience I think the decision should stand, as it furnishes some standard by which we may be guided in making these appropriations. But as a matter of law in carrying out the rules of the House I respectfully suggest that the Chair is mistaken in his ruling.

The gist of this matter is this: If there is a general law fixing the salaries of any officials or employés of the Government that law would be in force next year as well as this year; and any appropriation contrary to the provisions of that law would be a change of existing law, and if only for one year, as the existing appropriation bill is, it would be, pro tanto, a change for that time. But the general law would still stand thereafter, as held by the Supreme Court.

The test as to whether there is an existing law, and whether such an amendment is in contravention of existing law, is this: Suppose you fix a less sum than in the last appropriation bill, would the person receiving that sum be entitled to go into the Court of Claims to sue for the difference? In this case he would not. In the other case of the existence of a general law fixing the salary for the office, if the House should vote for less than the general law provided without repealing the general law, such a person would have a right to go into the Court of Claims and sue.

But in this case if you fix the compensation less than it was in the appropriation bill of last session, or if you fix it more, or if you do not fix it at all, the result will simply be that the person holding this office from the 1st day of July must take whatever he can get; and if you vote nothing there will be no office left vacant; there will be simply nothing done on the subject; and the person holding the appointment will go out of office, because the office has been abolished and no pay has been fixed for it, and the thing dies forever. But if there be existing law he could go on and sue in the Court of Claims for his pay; but where the office is provided for only in an appropriation bill that is not the case. Hence this rule was intended to apply to cases like that, so as to require that the appropriation bill should comply with the existing law, and where there is no general statutory law on the subject there is no guide for the Committee on Appropriations, and they may either continue the service at a less or at a greater compensation for the ensuing year, or may abolish the office entirely.

If you make no appropriations of this kind in this bill, then the office and the employment will cease on the first day of July next. If you read the title of this bill you will see that it is a bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the Government from the 1st day of July next until the 30th of June thereafter, and that it is to be a law for that period and for no other. It is not a law to-day. It may be signed and approved by the President to-morrow, but still it is not the law; it does not take effect until the present appropriation bill has expired by limitation, and there is no conflict between a law that expires on the 30th of June and another that takes effect on that day, or after that day, for the ensuing year—no conflict whatever. Hence I think that an error has been made, and I regret that the appeal from the decision of the Chair was not taken earlier in the debate. I am very sorry indeed to be compelled to differ with the honorable gentleman who occupies the chair, but I assure him that I do so not from any personal feeling whatever, but because I think he is in error, and if I had the time I could cite several decisions made by myself while I occupied the position which the gentleman now occupies, which were in accordance with the views I have just presented.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I should like to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether the precedents sustain the view which he advocates here.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have made decisions myself in accordance with that view.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair begs leave to make a statement before submitting the appeal, in order that the reasons which actuated him in making his decision may be before the committee. It will be remembered that in the Forty-fourth Congress a rule was adopted providing that no legislation should be in order on an appropriation bill except such as reduced expenditures. That provision obtained through the Forty-fourth and Forty-fifth Congresses. In the Forty-sixth Congress the House changed the rule so as to abrogate the provision allowing legislation on appropriation bills where it retrenched expenditures generally and limited it to specific objects; as, for instance, where it reduced the amount of a salary or the amount to be appropriated by the bill. Many times during the Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, and Forty-sixth Congresses, in cases where there was no general law regulating the salary of an office, the question was raised whether the amount ascertained in the appropriation law was contemplated as the legal salary, and throughout those years it was so held by the Chair, and that ruling was never appealed from, Congress after Congress acquiescing in the decision.

There is not an employé of the Senate or of the House carried in this bill whose employment rests on any other basis than an appropriation bill. There are very few of the officers in the employment of the Government whose employment rests on any other basis than an appropriation bill, and yet in the House of Representatives it has been held almost universally in Committee of the Whole that it was not competent for the Committee on Appropriations to change the salaries and amounts ascertained in the appropriation bills. Gentlemen seeking the purpose of the House in the adoption of the rule will find from its history that the object was to provide that a salary being once fixed the amount so fixed should be the salary attached to that office, and should not be varied with the varying opinions of any committee. The Chair in making its ruling has but conformed to nearly all of the rulings that have been made upon this point. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has stated that when he has occupied the chair he has ruled otherwise. The Chair so understood, but preferred to follow the long line of decisions made by various other gentlemen in the very beginning of the history of the rule, and for a long period of years, rather than to accept the more recent opinion. The Chair will now submit the question, Shall the judgment of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was taken by a viva voce vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is in doubt, and will appoint tellers.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no. Take a rising vote.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 60, noes 31.

Mr. LEHLBACH. No quorum.

Several MEMBERS (to Mr. LEHLBACH). Oh, do not raise that point.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It is his right, and he will exercise it.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I insist on the point.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. LEHLBACH and Mr. FORNEY were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 85, noes 44.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. On this question the ayes are 85, the noes 44. The ayes have it; and the opinion of the Chair stands as the judgment of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent expenses of branch offices at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, New Orleans, San Francisco, and Portland, Oregon, including furniture, fuel, lights, rent and care of offices, car-fare and ferriage in visiting merchant vessels, freight, express, telegrams, and other necessary expenses incurred in collecting the latest information for the Pilot Chart, and for other purposes for which the offices were established, $8,000.

Mr. MORROW. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the paragraph just read and insert the following:

"For contingent expenses of branch offices, including furniture, fuel, lights, rent and care of offices, car-fare and ferriage in visiting merchant vessels, freight, express, telegrams, and other necessary expenses incurred in collecting the latest information for the Pilot Chart, and for other purposes for which the offices were established—at Boston, $1,500; New York, $5,500; Philadelphia, $1,500; Baltimore, $1,500; Norfolk, $1,500; New Orleans, $1,500; San Francisco, $1,500; Portland, Oregon, $1,500; in all, $15,500."

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have submitted is for the purpose of increasing the efficiency of the branch offices of the Hydrographic Office, and is a matter of importance to the merchant-marine service and to the general operations of the Hydrographic Office. The necessity for this increased appropriation has been brought to the attention of members of the House by various commercial boards of the different cities of New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, New Orleans, San Francisco, and other places. In San Francisco the Chamber of Commerce has called particular attention to the necessity for an increased appropriation for the branch office at that place; and I have no doubt that commercial bodies in the other cities have in the same manner directed attention to the insufficiency of the appropriations for other ports.

The bill proposes to add one hydrographic office on the east and one on the west to the existing number of branch offices, and these two additional offices are at Norfolk, Va., and Portland, Oregon. These two offices will require an additional appropriation of $1,500 each. The increase proposed in the amendment is for the purpose of covering the expenses of the present offices and including the two additional offices for furniture, fuel, lights, rent, car-fare, ferriage, freight, expressage, telegrams, etc., connected with the service at these various branch offices. The increase is from $8,000 to $15,500, making an appropriation of $5,000 for New York and $1,500 for seven other ports. I think that in no part of the public service provided for in this bill can an increase of appropriation be made with more advantage than in the service to which the amendment applies. This increased service is recommended by the Secretary of the Navy. In his last annual report he says:

The Hydrographer dwells on the usefulness of the branch offices in obtaining materials for the Pilot Chart and in other important works of the Hydrographic Office. Additional appropriations are necessary to maintain these offices on a proper footing, and the extraordinary solicitude felt by the maritime community in reference to them makes it highly desirable that their wants should be fully supplied. As an illustration of the remarkable extent of the work performed by these offices, it may be stated that during the past year visits were made under their direction to 15,000 vessels, 7,000 instruments were adjusted, 4,000 charts corrected, 19,000 Pilot Charts distributed; information was furnished on application to over 100,000 persons engaged in maritime pursuits, and 24,000 reports were collected and forwarded containing maritime information.

The Hydrographer in his report also calls attention to this matter in detail. His language is:

BRANCH OFFICES.

The work of the branch offices has been very satisfactory. The reports from each show a continual increase in the scope and value of their operations. All unite in testifying to the usefulness of the Pilot Chart and Weekly Supplement, which they have enabled the main office to place on their present footing.

The Boston office reports a scarcity of ice and fog reports on account of the fact that the steamers follow the safe route laid down on the Pilot Chart, and thus reduce the chance of meeting these obstructions to a minimum. The distribution of the Pilot Chart has been extended into the interior, many teachers now using it for purposes of instruction. The publication of the Notices to Mariners in the form of extracts has had good results and is commended, and the experience of this branch seems to show that the plan of distributing charts to shipmasters as a compensation for the keeping of meteorological journals might well be replaced by the issuance, under proper restrictions, of good instruments for the purpose of insuring better observations.

In the New York branch the cramped space referred to in last year's report has been relieved somewhat by an allowance on the part of the Maritime Association of additional room. This small increase has greatly facilitated the work. The effect of the dissemination of the value of oil as a means of safety during gales of wind at sea has been apparent. Many firms are now manufacturing a special oil for this purpose, and also devices for distributing the oil. At the instigation of the Light-House Board this branch has made an investigation also into the relative value of electric and oil lights for light-houses, and the establishment of an electric light on the hills of Navesink. Owing to the fact that New York is the principal seaport of the country, and that its configuration is peculiarly adapted to show the value of any system of lighting, it is a good point for such an examination, and thus the value of this investigation can scarcely be overestimated. The reports of ice and fogs were very numerous and much activity was displayed in stimulating the shipmasters to send them in. Through the energy of the officer in charge reports have been forwarded not only from all the American ports, but from Denmark, Germany, Norway, and Great Britain.

The subject of removing derelicts has received serious consideration. This branch has kept the main office continually informed of their position, and has never ceased to advise their destruction. The subject of tides in New York Harbor and vicinity has received much attention. The many questions referred to the branch offices for an opinion on this subject have been decided by consulting tables issued by the Coast and Geodetic Survey. The office is continually referred to by people desiring information upon all subjects, particularly such as refer to marine insurance, and the officers have been frequently called upon to give evidence before the courts of admiralty. The necessity of a uniform system of universal buoyage seems to grow more apparent every year. The importance of this subject seems to be impressed very forcibly upon the officer in charge of the New York branch office. The interesting report of this officer, which is appended, will repay a careful perusal.

The Philadelphia office reports that the efforts of that branch are appreciated and that the amount of information received is steadily increasing. Attention is again called to the sunken wrecks on the New Jersey and Delaware coasts, and especial attention is called to the wreck of the British steamer Brinkburn, which has been the means of seriously damaging several vessels which have run into it. In addition to the routine work of this branch a revision of Vancouver Island Pilot has been made, and a compilation of sailing directions for the Red Sea, Gulf of Aden, and Persian Gulf is now in progress.

The operations of the Baltimore branch were hampered during the latter part of the fiscal year through the lack of funds, but through the courtesy of the collector of customs and of the tug-boat owners most of the arrivals were visited by the boarding officer. This office is not situated in a very favorable location, and it is intended to remove it at the earliest possible moment. The officer in charge also makes the recommendation that American vessels should be supplied with instruments for taking observations. Many captains express a willingness to observe for the office, but are deterred from doing so from the fact that they have no proper instruments. This branch was influential in having a bell buoy moored off False Cape, where last year eight or nine steamers struck on the shoal. Since the bell buoy was placed there no report has been received of a vessel striking these shoals. Also, through the influence of this office, a mid-channel buoy was placed at the entrance of Chesapeake Bay, as a result of the danger of heavily-laden vessels touching at the head of the Middle Ground. In addition to other duties the compilation of the Navigation of the Caribbean Sea and Gulf of Mexico, volume 1, was finished, and the compilation of volume 5, Coasts and Islands of the Mediterranean Sea, is in progress.

The New Orleans branch has secured the co-operation of agents in Pensacola, Fla., and Galveston, Tex., and reports that they have been of great assistance in forwarding the work of the branch office. Knowledge of its purposes and objects seems to be pretty well disseminated throughout the Gulf ports, and accounts of its value to the maritime community there have been numerous and gratifying. As illustrating the general importance of these offices, the shipping agents of the various railroads at Kansas City, Mo., desiring information as to the temperature of the sea-water likely to be experienced by vessels going from New Orleans to Liverpool during each month in the year, communicated with the branch office for the purpose of getting the desired information. This enabled the railroad companies to consider the feasibility of making large shipments of salt meat to Liverpool by way of the port of New Orleans.

The San Francisco branch reports a considerable increase in the work over that of last year. The press of San Francisco has been very favorable to this work, and has been of great assistance in publishing items for the office and in calling attention to its facilities. The officer in charge seems to think that shipmasters do not consult the office as much as they should in the matter of aids to navigation, and recommends again that some pressure should be brought to bear upon the underwriters and ship-owners to urge the ship-masters to avail themselves of this privilege. The underwriters of San Francisco have already issued a circular on the subject. The issue of special bulletins for the Pacific coast was commenced in December, and has been highly appreciated by the shipping community. These are published from time to time as sufficient data accumulate, and contain accounts of all wrecks and of every obstruction and danger along the Pacific coast.

The officer in charge of this office, in obedience to orders from the Department, visited San Pedro, San Diego, Portland, and Port Townsend, and made an exhaustive report on the advisability of establishing a branch hydrographic office at each of these places. The charts of the coast of Mexico and Central America, resulting from the surveys of Commanders Philip and Clark, have been favorably received. The necessity of charts on a large scale of the Pacific coast of North America seems to be very great. "During the past winter the number of disasters on the coast of Oregon and Washington Territory and Vancouver Island, especially in the vicinity of Cape Flattery, has been unprecedented, and the loss of life and property has been very great." The commendations of the work of this branch have been very general, and exhibit a very satisfactory appreciation of the efforts of the Department to assist the maritime community on the Pacific coast.

The following is a summary of the work of the branch offices:

Vessels visited	15,607
Barometers and thermometers compared and adjusted	7,377
Charts corrected for captains	4,181
Pilot Charts distributed	19,425
Notices to Mariners distributed	188,060
Beacon and Buoy Lists distributed	11,733
Information furnished to different individuals	101,098
Reports forwarded on storms at sea, trade-wind limits, fog, ice, wrecks, water-spouts, buoys adrift, use of oil at sea, electric storms, unknown rocks and shoals, meteorological journals issued, pamphlets on the use of oil, etc., distributed, and general information on matters of interest to navigation	24,081

It thus appears from the testimony of these public officers connected with this service that these branch offices are performing a most important work for the merchant-marine service, and that this increased appropriation is necessary in order that the work may be still more effective. I hope the amendment will be adopted. The whole appropriation is a very small sum compared with the important service rendered to our vessels in information furnished concerning the dangers of navigation.

Mr. FORNEY. We have increased the appropriation in this item $2,000 beyond the appropriation made last year, and, I believe, $4,000 above that of the previous year. I think that the appropriation proposed, $8,000, is sufficient for all necessary purposes, and that no additional appropriation is required.

Mr. RANDALL. The proposition of the gentleman from California would increase the appropriation $4,000 beyond the estimate. As the gentleman from Alabama has stated, the committee, in the bill, has made an increase upon the appropriation of last year, and a still greater increase upon the appropriation of the previous year.

Mr. WILKINSON. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the statement just made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that the amount of the proposed amendment exceeds the estimate furnished by the Department, I wish to state that the estimate to which he refers was sent in before a considerable amount of work had been turned over to this branch of the service from the Signal Service Bureau. Since this estimate was sent in all the marine meteorological work carried on by the Signal Service Bureau of the Army has been placed under the charge of the Hydrographic Office of the Navy.

Even without this additional work that has been turned over to this branch of the service, with the addition of new branch offices at Norfolk, Va., and at Portland, Oregon, and with the increased appreciation of the advantages of this service, and the rapidly enlarging sphere of its usefulness and its labors, it seems to me that the sum of $8,000 allotted by the committee is indeed an insufficient amount and bordering on parsimony. Sir, it is proposed with this sum to pay the "contingent expenses of branch offices at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, New Orleans, San Francisco, and Portland, Oregon, including furniture, fuel, lights, rent and care of offices, car fare and ferriage in visiting merchant vessels, freight, express, telegrams, and other necessary expenses incurred in collecting the latest information for the Pilot Chart, and for other purposes for which the offices were established."

The amendment proposed by the gentleman from California [Mr. MORROW] proposes to give the New York office the sum of $5,000, and all the other offices $1,500 each. Even this amount, I contend, is but a small appropriation for the work performed by the branch offices of this bureau, and for the benefits conferred by their researches, and for the valuable information which they ascertain and disseminate. One item that this appropriation is intended to cover is rent of offices. Sir, so small is the present appropriation that the branch office for this service at New Orleans (I know not how it is at the other ports) has to be furnished with an office free of rent by the Maritime Association of that city. All honor, sir, to the public spirit, the generosity, and the philanthropy of that association! But all shame to a Government too mean to furnish or pay for its own offices for the public service!

The branch of knowledge which this service utilizes and makes a study of was brought into great prominence by Maury. His patience, application, and matchless genius, from the data which he obtained, marked paths for commerce upon the ocean, and his text-books and his charts are now used throughout the civilized world.

Maury was the first to put into any tangible shape the mass of marine data furnished by just such collections as are now going on at the branch hydrographic offices, and as an instance of his work I cite a small portion of the results obtained by him, a very small part, comparatively speaking. I refer to the shortening of the old sailing route from New York to San Francisco from an average of one hundred and eighty days for all classes of ships to an average of one hundred and thirty days, a net saving of fifty days for each vessel. Why, Mr. Chairman, the saving of property and time and labor by that one result alone has been more than sufficient to pay all the expenses of the Hydrographic Office from its inception.

Sir, the result of such studies as to routes alone can be best conceived by quoting Maury's own words.

When one looks to seaward from the shore, and sees a ship disappear in the horizon as she gains an offing on a voyage to India, or the antipodes perhaps, the common idea is that she is bound over a trackless waste, and the chances of another ship, sailing with the same destination the next day or the next week, coming up and speaking with her on the 'pathless ocean," would, to most minds, seem slender indeed. Yet the truth is, the winds and the currents are now becoming to be so well understood that the navigator, like the backwoodsman in the wilderness, is enabled literally to "blaze his way" across the ocean; not, indeed, upon trees as in the wilderness, but upon the wings of the wind. The results of scientific inquiry have so taught him how to use these invisible carriers, that they, with the calm-belts of the air, serve as sign-boards to indicate to him the turnings, and forks, and crossings by the way.

This, Mr. Chairman, is a very important branch of the public service. Among the objects for which the branch offices of the hydrographic service have been established are to discover and to disseminate information as to the best tracks for steamers and sailing vessels upon the sea; to warn them of dangers of navigation, whether in the shape of rocks, shoals, partially submerged wrecks, or ice.

The following is a brief summary of the work of the branch offices:

Vessels visited	15,607
Barometers and thermometers compared and adjusted	7,377
Charts corrected for captains	4,181
Pilot Charts distributed	19,425
Notices to Mariners distributed	188,060
Beacon and Buoy Lists distributed	11,733
Information furnished to different individuals	101,098
Reports forwarded on storms at sea, trade-wind limits, fog, ice, wrecks, water-spouts, buoys adrift, use of oil at sea, electric storms, unknown rocks and shoals, meteorological journals issued, pamphlets on the use of oil, etc., distributed, and general information on matters of interest to navigation	24,081

Each branch office, Mr. Chairman, collects all the information possible of all matters likely to prove useful or interesting to sea-faring men, and sends the data on to the main office in Washington. There they are tabulated and digested, and such results as are valuable are then forwarded to all the branch offices for dissemination amongst the vessels that are in their own or neighboring ports.

Sir, the branch hydrographic offices are to the main office at Washington what the roots are to a tree; they furnish the sap which is taken up by the trunk, assimilated by the active corps of assistants, who take the place of the sunshine in the growing plant, and is then sent back for distribution, bearing, like the green leaves brought back to that famous old navigator in the Ark, the glad tidings of comfort and safety to those who float upon the troubled bosom of the deep.

It is sometimes well, Mr. Chairman, "to see ourselves as others see us," and I quote from the Liverpool Journal of Commerce:

AMERICAN PILOT CHARTS OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC.

Maury, the American meteorologist, indicated a route for vessels bound from America to the West Indies, which was adopted; and, although more miles had to be sailed over, the winds were stronger, more favorable, and freer from calms. The time occupied on the passage was curtailed, and many thousands of dollars saved to America owing to Maury's accurate appreciation of possibilities. America's Hydrographic Office is following in the footsteps of Maury, and successfully sustains the rôle of philosopher, guide, and friend to shipmasters of all nations, in strict accordance with the maxim "the seas but join the nations they divide." Pilot charts of the North Atlantic Ocean are published every month by that department of the United States Navy. They are a most happy conception, and worthy of all praise. * * *

An examination of the American pilot charts before us shows they present graphically any information likely to prove useful to mariners. Drift of currents; prevailing winds for the current month and limit of the trades; tracks of cyclones experienced during the preceding month; position of last month's icebergs, field-ice and fog, and also the probable limit of ice and fog for the present month; drift of derelicts and their present position, and the prevalence of whales and waterspouts are all clearly defined. There are also the best routes between Europe and America for both sailing ships and steamers, and routes for sailers between both continents and the equator. * * * Copious notes are printed on the margins and land areas. Every wreck along the Atlantic seaboard is localized in plain words. A storm card is delineated for the northern hemisphere, with appropriate directions for handling ships in cyclones according to the new indraught theory. The use of oil in stilling troubled waters is strongly insisted on, and all information forwarded by captains regarding this principle is printed. * * * In short, a review of all the phenomena of the month just past are given, so that the seaman is put in possession of all the latest information in the handiest form. * * * The action of the American authorities towards the shipping frequenting her ports is most commendable in this respect. No expense is too great, no labor too arduous to insure the safety of the rich argosies that cross the Atlantic filled with costly merchandise or carrying eager hearts to seek their fortunes in all parts of the Union from New York to the cites of the Pacific Slope.

From the Army and Navy Gazette, of London, I quote:

The monthly pilot charts of the North Atlantic Ocean, published by the Hydrographic Office of the United States Navy Department, are invaluable. Not only do they contain an accurate track-chart, which every captain of a ship making trans-Atlantic voyages must find of use, but they also present graphically an immense quantity of information, brought up to date, which is of timely interest to mariners. The drifts of derelict ships or buoys are indicated, and such matters as the loss of the great raft, with notes on the best sailing routes and barometric comparisons, etc.

And, sir, to add the testimony of Germany to that of Great Britain, I give a translation from the Rostocker-Zeitung, published at Rostock, Germany, December 4, 1887:

PILOT CHARTS OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC OCEAN BY THE HYDROGRAPHIC OFFICE AT WASHINGTON, D. C.

We have already called attention to these monthly charts at their first appearance in 1885. They have been bettered and enriched in the mean time, and especially do the latest numbers bring much new material that is valuable for the sailor; wherefore, we find it proper once more to direct the attention of our seafarers to this undertaking which the practical Americans have called into existence.

Besides the practical information on the sailing routes, the prevailing winds and their strength, the limits of the trades, the general ocean currents, the position of ice, derelicts, and drifting buoys, there is a large amount of other data in the later numbers, a knowledge of which is of great use to the shipmaster. We note next a new feature in the probable limit of those fogs off Newfoundland and Nantucket that so often embarrass seamen, and the avoidance of which should be the object of all. Guided by the desire to warn the navigator of all the dangers incident to the season, the Hydrographic Office has shown in its autumn numbers not only the paths of numerous West India hurricanes occurring at this season, but also given instructions as to their nature and peculiarities, as well as rules for the guidance of vessels that encounter them. Navigators are exhorted carefully to note the first signs of an approaching hurricane and to keep a sharp eye on the behavior of barometer, thermometer, wind, and weather.

When the approach of a storm is no longer doubtful it is recommended to heave-to and clew up everything in order to determine the probable bearing of the center, direction of the storm path, and the semicircle that the ship is in. If a ship does not heave-to it runs the risk of coming to false conclusions regarding the change in the direction of the wind, in connection with the fall of the barometer, since the change in the wind as observed while hove-to may be the opposite of the supposed change in a vessel making high speed. In regard to crossing the storm path the greatest care is enjoined.

When a vessel is forced to heave-to for heavy weather it should always do it on that tack that will allow the wind to be veering (aft) on the dangerous right-hand side. This is the starboard tack. It should then head away from the center and make what headway possible. In the manageable left semicircle heave-to on the port tack, in which position the ship heads in toward the center, and should therefore make as little headway as possible.

In running before the wind or crossing the path of the storm the wind should be kept well on the starboard side to get clear of the center. Two drawings accompany these directions in the September chart, one of which shows the circulation of the wind toward and around the center of a tropical cyclone in the northern hemisphere, while the other is intended for the practical use of navigators desiring to find the ship's position relative to the center of a tropical cyclone in the northern hemisphere from the direction of the wind and fall of the barometer.

Every chart contains a short weather forecast for the current month and a review of the past month. Besides this there is a mass of other useful items; changes in lights, new lights, the use of oil on the sea, wrecks dangerous to navigation, fishery notices, etc. The November chart brings, among other things, an article on the winter storms known as "norles," or northers, on the Gulf of Mexico, that is worthy of notice, as well as on the harmattan, that warm coast wind so frequently met from November to May off the northwest coast of Africa. The newly-instituted table of barometer normals in this number must prove extraordinarily useful to the trans-Atlantic sailor, since every marked or lasting difference between the corrected reading of the ship's barometer and the corresponding normal pressure in the table is a certain indication of a change in the weather.

The industry and care with which the Hydrographic Office at Washington (Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, J. R. Bartlett, U. S. N., Hydrographer) labors to supply the practical wants of all seamen on the North Atlantic Ocean can not be praised too highly, and at the same time can be acknowledged in no more fitting way on the part of seafarers than by an earnest endeavor to be of assistance to this office in its endeavors to collect data. The agencies of the Hydrographic Office are located in all the greater seaports of the United States. Our seamen will therefore work to their own interests as well as in those of their brethren in the craft when they contribute all their important observations on the Atlantic immediately, or as soon as possible, to the Hydrographic Office in Washington, or its agencies.

And now, sir, I wish to merely touch upon another point where the beneficent results of the researches of the Hydrographic Office have been felt. I refer to the formerly ridiculed idea of the efficacy of oil in storms. I quote from the margin of the Pilot Chart of last month a few of the many reports of the use of oil during the furious gale which raged along our shores barely two months ago:

THE USE OF OIL.

With the loss of the New York pilot-boats Phantom and Enchantress and the yacht Cythera fresh in mind, these reports can not fail to be of special interest, and should be carefully noted, not only by those to whom a seafaring life is a profession, but by every yachtman who is intending to cruise along the coast this summer.

Captain Sullivan, of the New York pilot-boat Caprice, reports off Sandy Hook the night of March 11, his vessel was boarded by combing seas which threw her on her beam-ends. He broke out oil-bags, stuffed them with oakum, rags, and anything he could lay his hands on, poured in a mixture of 1 gallon lard oil, 1 gallon paint oil, and 3 gallons petroleum (all he had on board), and punched them with a brad-awl. One of these he hung over the weather bow, and the other over the side abreast the weather main rigging, so as to just clear the water when on an even keel. He also rigged out two drags over the weather bow, each composed of 15 fathoms of chain on five fenders, held by 75 fathoms of hawser. After the oil was used no more water came on board, although before using it the sea was making a clean breach over the vessel. A breaking wave would rush towards her, meet the oil slick, the crest would quiet down, and the wave roll harmlessly past. He used the oil for thirty-six hours, and says it saved his vessel.

Pilot Partridge, of the pilot-boat Charles H. Marshall, was struck by the storm at 10.30 p. m. on the 11th, 10 miles east from Sandy Hook, wind WNW., with snow. Drifted to the eastward before the gale till the morning of the 13th, when came head to wind with anchor and 90 fathoms of chain, which held for twenty-four hours, the wind blowing 100 miles per hour. Used three oil-bags, and except for them thinks the vessel would have gone down.

The 88-ton steel schooner-yacht Iroquois passed Sandy Hook at 3 p. m. March 10, bound south. The night of the 11th she encountered the storm in all its fury east of Cape Henlopen, and a detailed report has been received from her sailing-master, Captain Norton, relative to the great success with which he used oil. At 10 a. m. it was blowing a most terrific gale, and the vessel was making too much headway for safety. Took in the reefed fore-staysail and fore-trysail, and put over a patent sea-drag, but the hawser carried away and he lost it. He then thought of a case of oil on board containing four 5-gallon cans. Made three bags of No. 5 cotton, large enough to hold about 2 gallons apiece. Put 2 quarts in each and hung them over the weather bow, but the oil congealed and would not run out through the holes he had made with a sail-needle. Then tried the oil through the pipes of the closet in the forecastle, near the bow, putting a few tablespoonfuls in the bowl and then pumping it out.

It was truly wonderful the effect it had on the sea. A huge comber would come down upon the vessel, threatening to bury her 20 feet deep. The comb would strike a patch of oil no larger than a common dining table, and in an instant the top of the sea was smooth and round, without even a wind ripple, and the little schooner would pop up on top of it as easy as a gull. He stood on the deck for more than an hour, watching the effect, and then went below, feeling that, so far as breaking waves were concerned, he was perfectly safe as long as the oil held out. The oil used in this case was a kind known as mineral sperm, a soft, greasy oil, which he thinks is the best. The yacht rode out the storm in perfect safety, without any damage, although both topmasts were on end and jib-boom out. Used 15 gallons of oil in thirty-six hours. Captain Norton has followed the sea for the past thirty years, seventeen of them as master, but never experienced a worse gale than this.

That our efforts are appreciated abroad is shown by the following extracts from a translation from the French "Le Filage de l'Huile, Par le Vice-Amiral G. Cloné," which is issued by Capt. W. J. L. Wharton, R. N., hydrographer to the British Admiralty. This paper states—

That the great effect produced by oil in smoothing troubled waters should have been so well known in times past as to have passed into a proverb, and yet that no general practical use of this effect should have been made until the last few years is a remarkable instance of the tardiness of mankind to apply the benefits that natural phenomena provide. To the Hydrographic Office of the United States is mainly due the credit of bringing into prominence and forcing on the notice of seamen in various publications the great importance of this property of oil under circumstances when life and property are endangered by breaking seas, and the extreme facility and trifling expense of its employment. Thanks to the efforts of the Americans, the facts are now well known to all English-speaking mariners, and many are the instances of the successful use of oil. Admiral Cloné, * * * drawing on the mass of experiences collected by the American office, and giving them due credit for their action, reports additional striking cases, etc.

Of other information collected by the branch offices, I give two specimen items of the derelicts and wreckage in the North Atlantic mentioned on the last monthly chart:

During the past six months fifty-one vessels are known to have met with disaster in the North Atlantic Ocean, their names having been reported. Of these vessels, there were two ships, twenty-three barks, three brigs, two brigantines, and twenty-one schooners. Classed according to nationalities, nineteen were British, sixteen American, five German, five Norwegian, four Italian, one Russian, and one Spanish. About ten of these vessels were disabled by the storm of December 18–19, 1887, and six by the great storm of March 11–14, 1888.

* * * * * * *

The length of time during which a derelict will remain afloat depends a great deal upon the nature of the cargo and the condition the vessel was in when abandoned. For instance, the Italian bark Vincenzo Perrotta, abandoned September 18, 1887, in latitude 36° 00′ N., longitude 54° 00′ W., has been reported eleven times, the last report being April 27, 1888, latitude 24° 31′ N., longitude 64° 50′ W. This vessel has been kept track of for seven months and nine days, and as she is still in a fair condition, and in a region frequented by vessels, it is not improbable that reports will continue to come in for some time to come.

The information furnished by these officers is valuable sometimes far inland in a way that we would scarcely suspect. I mention one instance mentioned on page 8 of the last report of the Hydrographer, Commander J. R. Bartlett, United States Navy:

As illustrating the general importance of these offices, the shipping agents of the various railroads at Kansas City, Mo., desiring information as to the temperature of the sea water likely to be experienced by vessels going from New Orleans to Liverpool during each month in the year, communicated with the branch office for the purpose of getting the desired information, after having tried for two months to obtain it elsewhere. This enabled the railroad companies to consider the feasibility of making large shipments of salt meat to Liverpool by way of the port of New Orleans.

Mr. Chairman, the affairs of the Hydrographic Office are conducted by a corps of naval officers, but lately under the able administration of Commander Bartlett and now under the talented guidance of Lieut. George L. Dyer, and the indirect benefits derived from its agency should not be overlooked. By it naval officers are, in time of peace, given duties directly connected with their profession, and at the same time help with no puny hands to garner in the harvests of peace in those blessed intervals between the ravages of war; and their discoveries and their labors mutually assist the Navy and the merchant marine, while smoothing over the jealousies that have ever been felt between those great classes of seafaring men.

The information that these officers obtain and furnish is of incalculable value to every shipper, to every importer, to every marine insurance company, to every vessel-owner, to every man who has an interest in cheap transportation on the ocean. Safe transportation, sir, or anything tending to it, is no mean component of cheap transportation.

I am glad to say, Mr. Chairman, that there seems to have come a fresh impetus into this branch of our public service—a new and a better appreciation of the benefits that it brings and the safeguards that it bestows. It seems to me that there is a fresh endeavor and determination on the part of those charged with its conduct to make it worthy in the fullest degree of its noble aims.

Sir, I trust this body may dole out with no niggard hand the sums needed to conduct this service—may do naught to restrain the zeal, the patience, and the intelligence of these attempts to gather and reveal fresh knowledge about the ocean, about its calms, its favoring breezes and its storms, its currents and its icebergs, its rocks and its wrecks.

I have spoken, Mr. Chairman, of the importance of this service, as giving assistance by its information and its discoveries to the cheap transportation of our products and the welfare of our people on the land. But what of our people on the sea? How small, indeed, are the benefits that I have named compared with the safeguards which it furnishes or helps to furnish against loss of life from the dangers of the deep!

Amid the flash of the lightning and the howling of the storm how little is the cargo considered compared with the preservation of the lives of those on board the ship! And, sir, if the additional sum which this amendment proposes—insignificant as it is, in view of the importance and magnitude of the service to which it is to be applied—if this additional sum, by the information which it furnishes, saves one ship from wreck and one crew from drowning; ay, more, if by its means it were to save the life of but one worthy man—a life to his loved ones more precious far than ship or cargo—I should not deem this sum misapplied or appropriated to other than a worthy cause.

Mr. RANDALL. These officers have nothing to do with the hydrography of our coast. As I understand, these are merely bureaus of information gathered from vessels coming into ports as to matters to which the gentleman has alluded. I am entirely uninformed as to any transfer of the Signal Office to these bureaus, and I do not think any such transfer has taken place. If there has been any such law, it has not come to the knowledge of the committee. The proposition increases the money expended at the existing points and at the two which have been added—Norfolk, and Portland, Oregon. There is no necessity for any such increase.

Mr. FORNEY. It is increasing the contingent expenses.

Mr. FELTON. I understand the situation at San Francisco to be at the present time that the amount provided is only about one-half of what it ought to be in order to secure the efficient service which ought to be maintained at that port.

Mr. RANDALL. It is provided to maintain it at what it was heretofore.

Mr. FELTON. It merely adds $50 a month.

Mr. RANDALL. You want to double what it was last year, and what we have agreed to.

Mr. FELTON. It is for the purpose of making it effective. I think if the gentleman understood the position of matters he would not object to the appropriation.

Mr. RANDALL. The proposition is to increase it $9,000 from $6,000, and make it $15,000.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 49, noes 46.

Mr. RANDALL. No quorum.

Mr. MORROW. Let it be reported to the House with the understanding we shall have a yea-and-nay vote on it. I am willing to compromise on $10,000.

The CHAIRMAN appointed Mr. MORROW and Mr. FORNEY as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 85, noes 83.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.

For compensation of the Secretary of the Interior, $8,000; First Assistant Secretary, $4,500; Assistant Secretary, $4,000; chief clerk, $2,500, and $250 additional as superintendent of the Patent Office building; six members of a board of pension appeals, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, at $2,000 each; two special inspectors connected with the administration of the public-land service, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior and to be subject to his direction, at $2,500 each; one superintendent of documents, $2,000; six clerks, chiefs of division, at $2,000 each, one of whom shall be disbursing clerk; for one private secretary to the Secretary of the Interior, $1,800; five clerks of class 4; one census clerk, $1,800; seven clerks of class 3; one clerk of class 3 (custodian), who shall give bond in such sum as the Secretary of the Interior may determine; one book-keeper for custodian, $1,200; eight clerks of class 2; thirteen clerks of class 1; two clerks of class 1, who shall be stenographers or typewriters; one returns-office clerk, $1,200; one female clerk, to be designated by the President, to sign land patents, $1,200; one clerk, at $1,200; four clerks at $1,000 each; two copyists at $900; one telephone operator, $600; seven copyists; three messengers; nine assistant messengers; fourteen laborers; two skilled mechanics, one at $900 and one at $720; two carpenters at $900 each; one laborer, at $600; four packers at $660 each; one conductor of elevator, at $720; four charwomen; for one captain of the watch, $1,000; forty watchmen; additional to two watchmen acting as lieutenants of watchmen, at $120 each; one engineer, $1,200; assistant engineer, $1,000; and six firemen; in all, $185,480.

Mr. PERKINS. I notice a reduction in the number of the members of the board of pension appeals. I should like to ask why, in the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations, there was any necessity for a reduction in that force from twelve to six?

Mr. FORNEY. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. PERKINS. Why is the board of pension appeals reduced from twelve to six?

Mr. CANNON. That work is all up and six are of no use.

Mr. RANDALL. They were provided for in the last law for one year only.

Mr. DOCKERY. That work is up and there is no necessity for any more.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I rise to a point of order in reference to the salaries here provided. The law fixes the salary at $3,500 and the bill increases it to $4,000.

Mr. FORNEY. That increase was made several years ago.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It is an increase over the law.

Mr. FORNEY. I wish to say it was not done by our committee.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not care by whom it was done, it is in violation of the law upon the statute-book which fixes the salary at $3,500.

Mr. RANDALL. The law fixes the salary at $3,500; several years ago it was increased to $4,500.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to know of the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the increase is simply on an appropriation bill, and but for one year, or whether there is any statute law upon the subject?

Mr. RANDALL. It is on an appropriation bill; and the gentleman from New Jersey is correct as to what the statute provides.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is bound to sustain the point of order.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I raise the further point of order, in line 5, on the words "two thousand five hundred dollars." The salary as fixed by the Revised Statutes is $2,200.

Mr. RANDALL. The statement of the gentleman from New Jersey is correct.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Certainly; I have the references here to the statute before me.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Again, in lines 13 and 14, I make the point of order on the words "two thousand dollars." The statute fixes it at $2,500.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Again, on page 82, in line 14, I raise the point of order on the words "one thousand dollars." The statute fixes the salary in this case at $1,200.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BUCHANAN. And in line 17 of the same page I make the point of order on the words "one thousand two hundred dollars." The statute fixes the salary at $1,400.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. FORNEY. What amendment does the gentleman offer?

Mr. BUCHANAN. It is not my business to formulate the bill. I simply make these points of order.

Mr. FORNEY. The gentleman offers no amendment?

Mr. BUCHANAN. No, sir.

Mr. FORNEY. That leaves no salary; it simply takes the amount out and leaves a blank.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to insert the sums, respectively, recommended by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BUCHANAN. And I raise the point of order against the amendment that it changes existing law, and is exactly the same as was recommended by the committee before, and which the Chair ruled to be out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must, of course, sustain the point of order. If the point of order applied to the original section it applies to the amendment, and for the same reason.

Mr. RANDALL. These salaries were fixed long ago under the control of a party not now in power in the Federal Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is very plain.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from New Jersey ought to have been here then to make the point of order.

Mr. KERR. I move to insert the amounts fixed by the law.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I did not hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FORNEY. You ought to have been here in the Forty-seventh or Forty-eighth Congress when these salaries were fixed, and to have made the point of order then.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I would ask if it would not be more proper at the correct time to move the recommittal of this bill to the Committee on Appropriations for the purpose of fixing the salaries as provided by law?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not entertain that question at all.

Mr. KERR. I move that the salary of the Assistant Secretary be fixed at $3,500.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope that will be voted down.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Assistant Attorney-General: For one law clerk, at $2,750; one law clerk, at $2,500; one law clerk, at $2,250; thirteen law clerks, at $2,000 each; two clerks of class 3, one of whom shall act as stenographer; in all, $36,700.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to suggest to the committee that as I understand this bill there is a reduction in the force here of two in number, but yet there is an increase of $4,000 in the amount. I would like to know how that is.

Mr. FORNEY. We give them three additional law clerks.

Mr. PERKINS. We made an appropriation last year for twenty clerks, which are provided in this office, and this bill gives but eighteen, still the amount of the appropriation is $4,000 more than it was last year.

Mr. FORNEY. I expect the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. PERKINS. I have the bill before me.

Mr. FORNEY. Last year there were but ten law clerks provided and this year there are fourteen, making an increase of $6,000.

Mr. PERKINS. But the total amount of the appropriation is increased.

Mr. CANNON. Yes, because there has been an increase in the number of law clerks.

Mr. FORNEY. And the number has been fixed just as the Department wanted.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I would like to move an amendment to line 14, on page 80, between the words "thousand" and "dollars," by the insertion of "eight hundred."

Mr. FORNEY. It is too late to make that amendment. That paragraph has been passed.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I think there can be no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. There is objection made by the gentleman from Alabama.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

General Land Office: For the Commissioner of the General Land Office, $4,000; one Assistant Commissioner, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall be authorized to sign such letters, papers, and documents and to perform such other duties as may be directed by the Commissioner, and shall act as Commissioner in the absence of that officer or in case of a vacancy in the office of Commissioner, $3,000; chief clerk, $2,250; two law clerks, at $2,200 each; three inspectors of surveyors-general and district land offices, at $2,000 each; recorder, $2,000; three principal clerks, at $1,800 each; two law examiners, at $2,000 each; ten principal examiners of land claims and contests, at $2,000 each; forty clerks of class 4; sixty clerks of class 3; seventy clerks of class 2; seventy-five clerks of class 1; fifty-five clerks, at $1,000 each; and fifty copyists, nine assistant messengers, twelve laborers, and six packers, at $720 each; in all, $525,770.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask the gentleman in charge of the bill whether the Committee on Appropriations have provided for the full force asked by the Commissioner of the General Land Office?

Mr. RANDALL. What we have provided is satisfactory to the Department.

Mr. FORNEY. We have not given them the full force asked, but they are satisfied with the change made by the committee. They asked for one hundred and twenty-five additional clerks to bring up some work. We gave them an addition of twenty-four; and I think that is satisfactory to the Department.

Mr. DOCKERY. The reason that I made the inquiry was the fact that a little experience in that Department demonstrates that the office is very far behind with the public business.

Mr. FORNEY. We have endeavored to remedy that by giving them twenty-four additional clerks and also an increase of ten examiners of land claims.

Mr. PETERS. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] has made a part of the inquiry which I had desired to address to the gentleman who has charge of this bill. I understand the bill increases the force of the examiners to bring up the work of the office. But I understand, also, that the committee do not give the amount estimated by the Department as being necessary. Is that true?

Mr. FORNEY. The Department asked for one hundred and twenty-five clerks to bring up the work, which we did not think necessary at this time.

Mr. PETERS. I want to state as a matter of fact, ascertained by my observation and experience in connection with that Department, that the work of the General Land Office on all contested cases is about two years behind.

Mr. FORNEY. That is what we are trying to remedy.

Mr. PETERS. Yes; but you have only met the difficulty by a small drop. Wherever a case is appealed from the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the Secretary, that covers another delay of a year and a half. Then after the case is decided and finally passed upon by the Secretary of the Interior, still there is another delay of a year before the patent can be issued. Therefore the homesteader or pre-emptor who files his declaration upon public land for the purpose of obtaining title to 160 acres has to wait from four to six years before, in the ordinary routine of the clerical work of the Interior Department, he can hope to get a patent or the evidence of title to the land.

I say such conduct among a community that was not law abiding would create a revolution against any administration that would allow such a condition of affairs to exist.

In connection with this there has sprung up an abuse in the Western country that has ground down the homesteader or pre-emptor, and made it almost impossible for him to settle on his land, or to meet the various demands that have been made upon his purse by the blackmailers who have been sent out through that country.

Before I go further I wish to call attention to a resolution of inquiry that was addressed to the Interior Department through the Committee on Public Lands, and which, for some reason, as I am informed, has not yet been reported back to this House, although the resolution was introduced on the 6th of February, 1888.

The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to inform the House of Representatives:

First. How soon after the filing of an appeal in a land-contest case in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office is such case reached for hearing and consideration.

Second. If such cases are considered in the order of their filing.

Third. The cause of delay in the consideration of such cases, if there is any such delay.

Fourth. After an appeal is taken to the Secretary of the Interior in such cases, how soon is it reached for hearing and consideration?

Fifth. The cause of such delay, if any.

Sixth. How soon after final decision in such cases does patent issue?

Seventh. The cause of such delay, if any.

As I understand, that resolution was referred to the Secretary of the Interior. I am not advised as to whether he has reported upon it or not, but certainly I am at a loss now for accurate information as to the cause of this delay. But I assume as I have already assumed that it is for the lack of clerical force in this Department.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CHEADLE was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. PETERS.

Mr. PETERS. I have said, Mr. Chairman, that certain abuses have grown up in the Western country out of this delay in procuring patents. I send to the Clerk's desk to be read a portion of an editorial of the Anthony Journal, a newspaper published in my district. This will show to the House something of the great trouble that a homesteader or a pre-emptor has to go through to obtain title to his land, and some of the reasons why he needs relief, and why his work in the Land Department should be brought up so that every case should be considered without delay.

The Clerk read as follows:

A man who is well known in the community, the initial of his last name being Stone, was found at the shanty of one of the jumpers, where he was making his abiding place, he having sent his family to Missouri last fall, possibly that he might be the better able to assist the jumpers. A letter was found in the shanty where Mr. Stone resided addressed to Mr. Richardson, an agent of the Wichita land office, offering to divy with him in these cases of canceled entries. We are not yet ready to publish this letter, as we have several affidavits to accompany it, and more that will soon be ready. We have evidence enough now to snow that this man Stone is at the bottom of this claim-jumping business, and it is only because he is a cripple (whether because of the act of God or his own sin we do not know) that he is tolerated in the community. But a cripple is always safe from the righteous indignation of brave and honest men, and Mr. Stone knows that.

Oh, what a stigma upon the name of the fair county of Harper that men like Stone must be permitted to run at large to play the sneak upon honest men, and then become a witness against them in behalf of the United States Government! Great Heavens, has it come to this, that our Government, for the protection of which hundreds of thousands of brave men gave up their lives, is now engaged in the detestable business of hiring the lowest class of citizens to play the detective and manufacture evidence against poor but honest citizens of our country?

Mr. PETERS. Now, that editorial illustrates one of the evils that have grown up out of these delays. Men, knowing that there is no possibility of obtaining a patent for years from the Department, institute some contest proceeding. Many times, under a former administration of the General Land Office, it was done simply by sending an anonymous letter, in which it was charged that the pre empter or homesteader had not complied with the law, and upon the strength of that anonymous letter the man's title was held up for cancellation, and then these parties would come to him and tell him that if he would pay him $50 they, being in the same boat with the Land Office, would get the title through and get rid of the contest proceedings. This, I say, is one of the evils that have grown up, and to which the people have submitted for a long period of years. I do not say that the practice was inaugurated under the present administration. It grew up, as I am frank to confess, through certain inspectors who were appointed under a Republican administration; but the evil has been steadily growing. Instead of decreasing, year after year it has been increasing steadily. Under the peculiar administration of a former Commissioner of the General Land Office these inspectors were increased, and the number of entries that were held up for cancellation has increased and the current work of the office has fallen more and more behind.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HUNTER was recognized, and yielded his time to Mr. PETERS.

Mr. PETERS. I wish to say further, Mr. Chairman, in justice to the present Commissioner of the General Land Office, that, being a man from the West, and knowing something about the needs of the people of the West, I believe, if he has the opportunity and the means given him, he will correct many of these evils, and will root out the system that has worked such great injustice to my people and to the people of the West generally. I say this in justice to the present Commissioner.

What I appeal for now is that this House shall give unanimous consent to put at the command of the present Commissioner of the General Land Office just what the estimates call for, in order that this work may be pushed forward so that a man can have his patent within a reasonable lifetime after he makes his proof at the Land Office. Under the ruling of the Chair, which has been sustained on an appeal, it would be useless to offer an amendment to this effect if the point of order were made against it, so I now ask unanimous consent that all of this paragraph in relation to the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office be changed so as to correspond exactly with the estimates that have been made by the Department for the force that they think necessary. If this is done, then, after sufficient time has elapsed, if the office fails to catch up with the work we shall know where the responsibility lies.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS]?

Mr. RANDALL. I object. So far as I understand, the Commissioner of the General Land Office is content with the bill as it is.

Mr. PETERS. I have understood that the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office said that if the force asked for by their estimates were granted, they would bring up this work and place it in such a position that these complaints could no longer be made against the Department. Now, if the Secretary of the Interior is satisfied with the provisions in this bill, and if the Commissioner of the General Land Office is satisfied with the provisions of the bill, then I have nothing further to say, because I shall know whom to hold responsible in the future. But I wish to be satisfied on that point. I wish to be satisfied that the Secretary of the Interior, who has gone to work with his sleeves up for the purpose of pushing forward this business, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who is likewise industrious and energetic and desirous of bringing up the work—I desire to be satisfied that they do receive in this bill all the appropriations they require in order to the proper performance of the work.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to say that they are satisfied.

Mr. RANDALL. I did not say anything about the Secretary of the Interior, but I did say that the Commissioner of the General Land Office, Mr. Stockslager, was present in conference with our committee, and expressed himself as satisfied with the manner in which the bill was made up.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that all the entries that have been made for public lands in one county in my district have been suspended, and all agricultural entries that could have been made for the last year have been referred to the Commissioner for investigation. That investigation has not been made, nor even begun yet, and if these officers have all the money they want, then there is no excuse for the delay. But if they say they have not got all they want, then I think that is a sufficient indication that they ought to have more. Four new inspectors will do but little good. Give them all they ask for. I hope the unanimous consent asked by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] will be granted. If not, I hope that a motion will be made, and I will take the responsibility of making it myself.

Mr. DOCKERY. I suggest to the gentleman that, on the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], the motion is not necessary, because the gentleman from Pennsylvania states that the Commissioner of the General Land Office is satisfied with the bill as it is.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, and I have since conferred with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who corroborates me in that.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move a pro forma amendment for the purpose of saying that the increase in the General Land Office is twenty-four clerks at a cost of $38,720; and, while I am up, I will make another statement, which is that two or three years ago, under the last Commissioner of the General Land Office, I am informed that months and months of work performed by a corps of clerks was thrown away because the Commissioner of the General Land Office was overruled by his superior officer. Now they have promised more thorough administration in that office, and it is not increase of force that is needed in the Interior Department, but better administration.

I want to say further, that the Secretary of the Interior, under the power which he has to detail clerks from one bureau to another, has, I have no doubt, more than a sufficient force at his command to bring up every particle of work in every bureau in his Department, with clerks to spare.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pending pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. PERKINS. I move pro forma to strike out the last word. I am quite willing and anxious to vote for every appropriation that will add to the efficiency of the General Land Office. As has been suggested by my colleague [Mr. PETERS], we in the West realize the importance of expeditious work in that Department; and as was suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, we also realize that until quite recently the labor in that Department was not to do the work, but to see how not to do it. In other words, boards were organized there for the purpose of embarrassing and delaying the settlers upon the public domain in their efforts to secure title to their homes. We know that immediately after the appointment and confirmation of the late lamented Andrew Jackson Sparks [laughter] orders were made by him suspending all entries in great sections of the country, and spies and informers were appointed and sent out to see whether some evidence could not be found to embarrass some poor homesteader or pre-emption claimant in the effort he was making to secure a title to a piece of Government land and a place to call his own. We in the West complained of this. It was not a partisan or political complaint; men of all parties interested themselves in the matter. The condemnation was almost universal, and the wrongs practiced affected an empire in extent and area. Yet we found no relief; we could not get the ear of the Department when we asked for justice, and no heed was given to our supplications. The work of embarrassment and destruction, the work of striking down the settlers and wrecking homes continued until that same Commissioner of the General Land Office rendered against a railroad company a decision of like character to those which he had made in regard to the rights of humble settlers. When he attempted to organize against a railroad company the same methods that he had adopted against settlers, he was then ordered by this Administration of reform to "step down and out."

But so long as he was content to perpetrate his practices to the injury only of the poor and unfortunate settlers, so long he was suffered by his superiors and by the President to remain in office. But when, in his determination to distinguish himself in some form, he placed himself in antagonism to a railroad company, then his resignation was demanded; and, as I have said, he was decapitated and compelled to "step down and out," and now there are none so poor as to do him reverence.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to withdraw the pro forma amendment I have offered, and to submit an amendment to insert after the word "each," in line 1, the words "to be appointed from the clerks now employed in the General Land Office." I am in favor of these examiners. I think they should be provided to do the work that has been suggested here expeditiously and well, so that the settlers may be relieved from embarrassment and difficulty, and I desire to say in justice to the present Commissioner that I believe he has some conception of the rights of the settlers and will be glad to organize his Department as efficiently as he can to dispatch business and to extend relief and justice to the pioneers who are making homes in the great West and building up new communities to contribute to the greatness and prosperity of our common country.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. FORNEY. I desire to make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly no point of order can be made against the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment of Mr. PERKINS, as follows:

After the word "each," in line 1, page 84, insert "to be appointed from the clerks now employed in the General Land Office."

Mr. FORNEY. That would not increase the force.

Mr. RANDALL. That would not increase the force at all, unless you add, in some other part of the bill, a provision for ten additional clerks.

Mr. PERKINS. Well, I am willing the additional force shall be provided for in another portion of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order is pending.

Mr. PERKINS. Allow me one suggestion on the point of order. I understand the ruling has been consistent at all times that language intended to restrain or direct the method of expending an appropriation is not new legislation, and is in order. The purpose of this amendment is to designate the force from which these men shall be appointed. I think that they should be appointed from the force employed in the General Land Office, so that we may have experienced and efficient men. The amendment, as I understand, is simply a limitation upon the appropriation, and is therefore in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. FORNEY. No, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. This amendment changes existing law by imposing a restriction upon the power of the Secretary of the Interior, who now has full authority to make these appointments.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that the Secretary of the Interior under the present law has authority to make the appointments, and that the amendment is a restraint on that power, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the Chair permit a suggestion?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has made a ruling.

Mr. PERKINS. The provision embraced in the bill is new legislation; it creates twelve additional examiners.

The CHAIRMAN. And that is perfectly competent. In an appropriation bill legislation may be adopted to increase the number of employés in any branch of the service.

Mr. PETERS. I have received since I was last upon the floor the letter of the Secretary of the Interior and the letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office in reply to the resolution which I introduced on the 6th of February last, and I ask to have the letters printed in the RECORD.

The letters are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, April 13, 1888.

SIR: I am in receipt of a resolution by the House of Representatives, of which the following is a copy:

Mr. STOCKDALE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, submitted the following; which was agreed to:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to inform the House of Representatives—

"1. How soon after the filing of an appeal in a land-contest case in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office is such case reached for hearing and consideration.

"2. If such cases are considered in the order of their filing.

"3. The cause of delay in the consideration of such cases, if there is any such delay.

"4. After an appeal is taken to the Secretary of the Interior in such cases, how soon is it reached for hearing and consideration.

"5. The cause of such delay, if any.

"6. How soon after final decision in such cases does patent issue.

"7. The cause of such delay, if any"

The first, second, third, sixth, and seventh inquiries relating to business transacted in the General Land Office, said resolution was referred to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, whose report thereon is herewith transmitted.

The Department is now disposing of the cases that came up on appeal from the General Land Office December, 1886, and the cases that came up January, 1887, will be reached during the month.

It is impossible to state with any degree of accuracy how soon a case can be reached after it reaches the Department on appeal from the Commissioner.

Under the rules of practice the appellee is allowed thirty days after the expiration of the sixty days allowed for appeal in which to file argument, and the appellant is allowed thirty days from service of said argument in which to file argument in reply. After this period the case is in order for trial, unless the time is extended by permission of the Secretary, upon notice to opposite party.

The following statement of the condition of the docket the number of clerks employed in the law division in the preparation of opinions, and the cases disposed of during the fiscal years ending July 1, 1885, July 1, 1886, and July 1, 1887, may enable the committee to make an approximate estimate of the time in which a case will be reached after the appeal is transmitted to the Department:

From July 1, 1884, to July 1, 1885:		From July 1, 1885, to July 1, 1886:
Cases on hand July 1, 1884.....	398	Cases on hand July 1, 1885.....	989
Cases transmitted on appeal..	1,168	Cases transmitted on appeal..	1,366
	1,566		2,355
Disposed of during that period.....	577	Disposed of during that period.....	1,004
	989		1,351
Number of clerks employed..	9	Number of clerks employed..	8
From July 1, 1886, to July 1, 1887:		From July 1, 1887, to January 1, 1888:
Cases on hand July 1, 1886....	1,351	Cases on hand July 1, 1887.....	2,681
Cases transmitted on appeal.	2,222	Cases transmitted on appeal..	637
	3,573		3,318
Disposed of during that period.....	892	Disposed of during that period.....	511
	2,681		2,807
Number of clerks employed..	8

During the latter part of this period the law division was increased by the addition of three clerks, temporarily detailed from the board of pension appeals, but owing to the absence of others and the special work in the restoration of indemnity lands the working force on appeal cases was practically reduced.

From January 1, 1888, to March 1, 1888:		From March 1, 1888, to April 1, 1888:
Cases on hand.....	2,807	Cases on hand.....	2,817
Cases transmitted on appeal..	210	Cases transmitted on appeal...	137
	3,017		2,954
Disposed of during that period.....	200	Disposed of during that period.....	269
	2,817		2,685
		Cases on hand April 1, 1888.....	2,685

The latter part of February the law division was increased by the addition of one clerk, and in the month of March by two additional clerks, so that the entire force, with the three now temporarily detailed from the board of pension appeals, numbers sixteen clerks.

From the foregoing it will be seen that the delay in the disposition of cases pending on appeal before the Department is owing to the increase of appeals from the General Land Office. It further appears that there has been no diminution of work in this division, but, on the contrary, a pro rata increase.

The average number of appeals per month from the General Land Office since January 1, 1888, is 116, and, with the present force, I think it may be reasonably assumed that from 200 to 250 cases will be disposed of per month; and it is confidently expected that a still greater number will be disposed of, and that within one year the arrears will be cleared away and cases decided as soon after appeal as the arguments shall be submitted, and considered with promptness.

The cases above referred to are commonly known as docket cases and do not include motions for review, certiorari, reports, and decisions upon applications to bring suit to cancel patents, and other current work of the Department, which makes up a large per cent. of the work of the law division.

The greater part of the time of one of the clerks is occupied in the preparation of the volume of land decisions, and the current work passing daily through the law division is sufficient to occupy the entire time of another.

Very respectfully,

WM. F. VILAS, Secretary.

THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., —— ——, 1888.

SIR: I am in receipt of the inclosed copy of a resolution of inquiry by the House of Representatives.

In response to such inquiries as pertain to the business of this office, I have the honor to submit the following report:

"1. How soon after the filing of an appeal in a land-contest case, in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, is such case reached for hearing and consideration?"

We are now acting on cases of this class that were received in this office in the month of April, 1886. It may be stated, in general terms, that an appeal-contest case can not be reached for action, after it is filed in this office, in less than from twenty to twenty-four months.

"2. If such cases are considered in the order of their filing?"

Such cases are now considered in the order of their filing. Prior to the formation of the contest division, April 1, 1887, contests from different parts of the country were acted upon in different divisions and different sections of the same division. The result was that the cases from some States and Territories were acted on, probably, as soon as they were received in the office, while the same class of cases from other States and Territories were not reached for action for two or three years. On the formation of a division to take entire charge of all contests on public lands, the cases then on file, and all that have since been received, were sent to that division. There they are docketed in the order of the date of their filing here, and are taken up for decision in the same order. This is an inflexible rule, admitting of almost no possible exception.

"3. The cause of delay in the consideration of such cases, if there is any such delay."

In order to give an intelligent explanation of the delay in acting on these cases it will be necessary to consider the character of this work, the great increase in it, and the action of this office in reference to its condition.

An erroneous impression exists in many quarters that a contest between individuals over a tract of public land is purely a personal matter, and one in which the Government has no interest. This might have been true prior to the passage of the act of May 14, 1880 (21 Stat., 140) the second section of which gives to any one who successfully contests and "procures the cancellation of any preemption, homestead, or timber-culture entry" a preference right of entering the tract covered by the canceled entry. This provision of the statute, together with the rules of practice adopted by the Department in pursuance thereof, has caused a great increase in contest business; and the majority of the cases arise upon affidavits by persons who themselves have no claim to the tracts involved, but who charge fraud, illegality, or a failure to comply with the law on the claimants.

These charges are such as would be investigated by this office in the interest of the Government, through special agents, if the contestants did not furnish the evidence of the same, at their own expense, after allowing full opportunity to the claimants to be heard. Thus it will be seen that in the great bulk of contests the Government is the directly interested party, the contestant being the informer, who, as a reward for the service he renders and the expense he incurs, is awarded an opportunity, for a limited time, to enter the tract himself, if the entry is canceled.

Contests are divided into two classes, appealed and unappealed. If no appeal is taken from the decision of the local land officers, their finding is final in the absence of any exceptions recognized by the rules of practice. A careful examination, however, of the record in such cases is required in this office, for no entry can be canceled on such a proceeding unless it affirmatively appears from the record that the office has obtained jurisdiction of the claimant by proper service of notice of hearing, and that due opportunity to appeal has been allowed, with notice of the decision.

On the 10th of December, 1886, the following communication with reference to contest-business in this office, in connection with other matters, was transmitted through honorable Secretary Lamar to the Forty-ninth Congress:

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
"Washington, D. C., December 10, 1886.

"SIR: With a view to the better administration of the business of this office, and to the end that it may receive intelligent consideration, which its importance to the persons directly interested, as well as the whole public, demands, I am constrained to make the following recommendation in addition to those contained in my annual report, namely:

"That provisions be made in the appropriation bill for the current fiscal year for one additional chief of division, at an annual salary of $2,000, for the division of the board of review already organized. That a new division be created, to be known as the contest division, to be composed of one chief, at a salary of $2,500, and six members, at a salary of $2,000. * * *

"THE CONTEST DIVISION.

"It must be manifest to every thinking person that as the time approaches, as it is now rapidly approaching, when the desirable public lands open to original settlement, and filings have been made under the public-land laws, become more valuable, contests between disputants over titles to such lands must greatly increase, until in the near future the contested cases will become, if not the largest, the most important branch of the work of the Land Office.

"Under the present rules of practice adopted and promulgated by the Department, 'contests may be initiated by an adverse party or other person against a party to an entry, filing, or other claim under laws of Congress relating to the public lands for any sufficient cause affecting the legality or validity of the claim.'

"This liberal rule governing contests, together with the statute giving the successful contestant a preference right for thirty days after notice of decision in the case to enter the land, has also tended to increase the number of contests.

"An examination of the contest and the quasi-contest dockets in the several divisions develops the fact there has been in the past year a marked increase in the number of such cases filed. The large number of these cases remaining unacted upon at the end of the financial year is proof conclusive that the force now engaged upon this work, which is all that can be spared for it without seriously interfering with the other branches of the work of the office, is totally inadequate to keep it up, and unless relief is given must rapidly accumulate.

"At the end of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, there remained unacted upon the following:

	Cases.
Division G	85
Division F	6,331
Division C	6,128
Division N	167
Division L	50
Division D	9
Total	12,770

"It needs no argument to convince any one that these cases, involving the title to property of immense value, in some cases reaching millions, which come before the office to be considered upon the written evidence taken by the registers and receivers, should be examined, the evidence weighed, and opinions prepared by men who have had training as lawyers.

"No private citizen would intrust such business to others than lawyers. It is proper to add that these questions are not always questions between claimants in which the Government has no interest. In a large number of cases the real question is whether any of the claimants have complied with the law and are entitled to the land. I feel that I can not too earnestly urge the importance of this matter.

"If, however, Congress in its wisdom should decline to provide for such division as I have requested, then I must earnestly urge an appropriation for a chief for a contest division, and I shall assign clerks in the office to such division, and make such progress in the work as my inadequate force will permit, trusting that the great necessity for the additional force I have felt constrained to ask for such division will be so apparent to Congress that it will not be long deferred.

"I respectfully request that you transmit this communication to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, with such recommendations as you deem proper.

"Very respectfully,

"WM. A. J. SPARKS,
"Commissioner.

"Hon. L. Q. C. LAMAR,
"Secretary of the Interior."

(See Land Office Report for 1887, pages 355, 356.)

In his annual report for 1887, Commissioner Sparks, after setting out the above communication in full, makes the following recommendation:

"It is to be hoped that the Fiftieth Congress will see the urgent need of taking action on the recommendations embraced in the foregoing letter. The division as at present constituted is made up largely of clerks that have had some experience in contest work; but with rare exceptions they are not men who have had the legal training which is almost indispensable to enable them to act judiciously in weighing evidence and on passing in intricate questions of practice or construing the many statutes, office regulations, and Department decisions bearing on the disposition of the public domain. In saying this it is not intended that the efficiency and valuable services of several of the clerks in the division shall be overlooked. Long experience in acting on contests has developed some very excellent clerks, who could not well be excelled. It is not desired that their service should be dispensed with, but that the clerks which it is recommended should be provided should be added to the division as constituted at present.

"The work of this division is a very important class of work. The property values involved in the contests now pending are enormous, and as the country settles up and land becomes more valuable these values will greatly increase. It may safely be asserted that the value of the property involved in the contest cases that come to the General Land Office in a single year very far exceeds the money values involved in the cases which go to the appellate court of any of the States of the Union in a year. Yet it would be considered very absurd to propose to place the decisions of causes in any appellate court of law in the hands of any but the best trained lawyers. Why should not the same rule apply to the decision of matters in this bureau, which involve the settlement of titles to many millions of acres of real estate? It is true that errors committed in the bureau may be corrected on appeal to the honorable Secretary, but a very small percentage of the decisions of the bureau are appealed from." (Annual Report, page 356.)

I shall refer to this recommendation again.

As no action was taken in the Forty-ninth Congress on the recommendation of December 10, 1886, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, on April 1, 1887, provided for the formation of a "board of contests," to which all contests involving private, cash, pre-emption, homestead, timber-culture, desert-land, timber-land, and donation entries of filings and scrip locations are transferred.

At the end of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, it was found that there had been received in the new division, by transfer from the old divisions and transmitted from the local offices throughout the country, 12,299 cases, of which 10,500, probably, were unappealed cases and the rest appeals. These were only cases that formerly belonged to the public-lands (C) and pre-emption (G) divisions, contests in the railroad, mineral, surveying, private-lands, and swamp-lands divisions being still retained in those divisions. As will be seen, the number of cases in Divisions C and G on June 30, 1886, was 6,213. On June 30, 1887, the total number of cases undisposed of was 11,378, showing an increase in one year of 5,165 cases.

On June 1, 1887, by order of honorable Secretary Lamar, the contest board was organized into a division and a fourth-class clerk assigned to duty as chief. The contest business of the division, briefly stated, is shown by the following statement:

Cases received up to June 30, 1887	12,299
Cases received since, to March 24, 1888	8,596
Total	20,895
Number of cases finally disposed of in contest division	12,631
Undisposed of March 24, 1888	8,264

Of this number, 2,300 (in round numbers) are appealed cases. About 200 unappealed and 300 appealed cases which have been decided, subject to appeal to the honorable Secretary, but not yet closed, are included in the above balance of 8,264. This shows a gain of 4,035 cases disposed of by the contest division within the current fiscal year, such a gain being made in the class of unappealed cases. This gain was made under the very unfavorable circumstances attending the organization of a new division in which vast accumulations of files had to be rearranged in crowded and inadequate space, new dockets prepared, and an entire system of disposing of the work provided for.

For about six months after the organization of the division very little was done toward acting on the appeal cases. This was owing to the fact that, as I think, my predecessor did not fully understand the magnitude of the contest work then in the office. These cases were suffered to accumulate for that length of time, and thus fell behind six months, being then already about eighteen months in arrears in some parts of the office.

Soon after taking charge of the office as Acting Commissioner, in November, 1887, I caused one additional room to be placed at the disposal of the chief of said division, and detailed an additional force from other parts of the office to work on these cases, so that they are now being decided as rapidly as they are being received. This could as well have been done in June, 1887, as in January, 1888. This detail was made, however, at the expense of other divisions of the office, whose work is also in arrears, and it is impossible to do more than to hold our own with the force now in the office.

I may here state that rapid gains are making in closing unappealed cases, which are about six months in arrears.

The work in contests is as well up as other classes of work in the office, and I call attention to the statements made in the annual report of the Land Office for 1887, on pages 99 to 107, inclusive, especially to the estimated force needed, as shown on page 106.

I concur heartily in the recommendations made in the communication of December 10, 1886. Indeed, it may not be improper for me to state that in my capacity as Assistant Commissioner I personally prepared said letter of December 10, 1886, and that I constantly urged upon the then Commissioner the great importance of the contest work in the office, and the necessity of making adequate arrangements for its proper dispatch, so far as he had the means under his control to do so.

I would therefore answer the third inquiry by stating that the cause of delay in deciding contest-appeal cases is almost entirely due to the totally inadequate force at my command to properly dispose of the accumulation of the work in the office. The fact is, that the work of the Land Office steadily increases from year to year, the space in the office becomes more and more crowded with records and files, so as to impede the work, and no corresponding increase is made in the clerical force.

No increase of clerical force in the office has been provided for since 1881, while the work of the office has increased, as is shown by the following statement of the number of matters requiring official consideration received each calendar year, beginning with 1884:

Year.	Matters received.	Per cent. increase.
1884	131,651	.6+
1885	132,483	.6+
1886	139,088	4.9+
1887	158,228	13.7+

Another cause of delay is found in the greater complication in the work of the Land Office, at present, than was formerly the case. The number of local offices has greatly increased, and intricate accounts must be kept and audited with each one. Many new acts of Congress are passed from year to year, making additional provisions or exceptions to the former modes of disposing of the public domain, all of which have been construed by the courts or the Departments and all of which must be carefully borne in mind in passing on the innumerable questions which arise in disposing of our work. As the public lands become scarcer they become much more valuable, and greater efforts are put forth to secure them, thus causing a very great increase in litigation, requiring the exercise of the quasi-judicial functions of the Commissioner and his subordinates, every possible legal point being raised and presented for decision by able lawyers, many of whom now make a speciality of land-law practice. It is this last phase of the question which forces upon our attention the imperative need of providing by law for the employment of trained lawyers to dispose of these legal questions as they arise, and to examine, weigh, and pass on the voluminous records of evidence taken in thousands of cases every year.

In the Patent Office, principal examiners at $2,400 a year each are provided for, while in the Land Office only two examiners at $2,000 a year each are provided for. The effect of the low salaries paid to the clerks in this bureau is that when a man becomes competent to deal with the more intricate questions which arise, he can usually obtain a position outside at a much higher compensation than he receives here, and the consequence is that many of the most competent clerks resign every year to accept outside employment. I am therefore constrained to refer again to the recommendations of December 10, 1886, on this point, and of my predecessor in his annual report, and to urge their vital importance upon Congress.

The fourth and fifth inquiries will be best answered by the honorable Secretary himself.

"6. How soon after final decision in such cases does patent issue?"

If the entry involved in the appeal to the honorable Secretary is one in which final proof has been made, and the decision of the Secretary sustains the entry and directs patent to issue, the same is issued at once, without further inquiry or delay in this office. If final proof has not been made on the entry or filing, and the Secretary's decision leaves it intact, dismissing the contest, such entry or filing stands like any other of its class, subject to final proof being made according to law, which is acted on in this office in its turn with other entries of the same class.

"7. The cause of such delay, if any."

As above shown, there is no delay in the issue of patent in cases that the honorable Secretary decides are ready for patent.

Respectfully,

S. M. STOCKSLAGER,
Commissioner.

Hon. WILLIAM F. VILAS,
Secretary of the Interior.

The Clerk read as follows:

Indian Office: For compensation of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, $4,000; assistant commissioner, who shall also perform the duties of chief clerk, $3,000; one financial clerk, at $2,000; chief of division, at $2,000; one principal bookkeeper, $1,800; five clerks of class 4, one of whom shall have charge of the educational division; eight clerks of class 3; one draughtsman, at $1,600; one stenographer, at $1,600; ten clerks of class 2; eighteen clerks of class 1; nine clerks, at $1,000 each; twelve copyists; one messenger; two assistant messengers; one laborer; one messenger-boy, at $360; and two charwomen; in all, $96,980.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I raise the point of order on these salaries. For compensation of Commissioner of Indian Affairs the salary is fixed at $4,000. By the Revised Statutes this salary is $3,000. I make the point of order that this increase of salary from $3,000 to $4,000 is in contravention of existing law. I make the point of order, as the committee does not seem to do it.

Mr. CANNON. What salary does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The salary of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. FORNEY. There has been a change made in the salary of that office, and we have only kept it up to what it has been in the Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Congresses.

Mr. RANDALL. Three thousand dollars is a small salary for the responsibility of that office.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I make the point of order that the salary provided can only be the salary of the statute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. I will move to make the salary $4,000.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I raise the same point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. HOLMAN. The motion is to make the salary $4,000.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I have made the point of order that the existing law provided only $3,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. Where does the gentleman find that?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will cite the gentleman to the page of the Revised Statutes. It is page 78 where the existing law provides the salary for this office at $3,000.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pension Office: for compensation of the Commissioner of Pensions, $5,000; first deputy commissioner, $3,600; second deputy commissioner, $3,600; chief clerk, $2,250; assistant chief clerk, $2,000; medical referee, $3,000; assistant medical referee, $2,250; two qualified surgeons, who shall be experts in their profession, at $2,000 each; eighteen medical examiners, who shall be surgeons of education, skill, and experience in their profession, at $1,800 each; twelve chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; law clerk, $2,000; forty-five principal examiners, for review board, at $2,000 each; twenty-four assistant chiefs of division, at $1,800 each; three stenographers, at $1,600 each; seventy-four clerks of class 4; ninety-five clerks of class 3; three hundred and seventy-two clerks of class 2; three hundred and sixty-one clerks of class 1; two hundred clerks, at $1,000 each; one superintendent of buildings, $1,400; two engineers, at $1,200 each; eighty-five copyists; twenty-five messengers; twenty messenger-boys, at $400 each; one captain of the watch $840; three sergeants of the watch, at $750 each; twenty watchmen; three firemen; twenty-five laborers; and five charwomen, at $400 each; in all, $1,808,750.

Mr. CHEADLE. I do not rise for the purpose of making a point of order on the salaries in this section, but merely to call the attention of the committee to one item. In line 18 there is provided "two qualified surgeons, who shall be experts in their profession, at $2,000 each." Then the bill goes on and provides "eighteen medical examiners, who shall be surgeons of education, skill, and experience in their profession, at $1,800 each." These surgeons are authorized by law as fourth-class clerks, and their salary is fixed by law at $1,800 a year. I ask, by unanimous consent, to make their salaries $2,000 each, as provided in the case of the qualified surgeons provided for immediately preceding these $1,800 medical examiners in this bill.

My reason is this: The salary of these officers, as I have already stated, are regulated by law, being that of fourth-class clerks; but, as I have suggested, there is no good ground for giving two surgeons $2,000 a year and the others only $1,800 each. The qualifications and duties are the same and the salary should likewise be the same.

Mr. RANDALL. The point of order has been reserved.

Mr. CHEADLE. They require the same kind of education and experience, and they should be at the same salary. It is not necessary to argue that men of skill and education and competent to occupy these positions are not likely to remain long when the salary is only $1,800 a year, and as a consequence there are constant resignations of the experienced and best men, who should be retained. The objection against the present administration of the Pension Office is that the rating is not what it should be under the law, which is largely due, I hold, to the surgeons on this board.

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point of order that the statute fixes these salaries and the Committee on Appropriations has reported that salary in this bill which the amendment proposes to increase.

Mr. CHEADLE. The salary provided is that of fourth-class clerks, or $1,800. I have asked, by unanimous consent, that it be increased to $2,000.

Mr. HATCH. I suggest that we be allowed to have a vote on this proposition in the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. No amendment has been moved.

Mr. HATCH. I will move the amendment to make the salary $2,000.

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. HATCH. What is the point of order?

Mr. RANDALL. My point of order is that where there is no statute, then in the absence of a statute the salary fixed by the appropriation bill prevails.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me, I think there is such a statute.

Mr. RANDALL. I would be glad to have my attention called to it; I do not recollect it.

Mr. CANNON. The medical examiners were originally fourth-class clerks, and the Revised Statutes make provision for the first, second, third, and fourth class clerks at twelve, fourteen, sixteen, and eighteen hundred dollars. Now these are in fact fourth-class clerks, the designation being changed.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, but there is no statute prescribing this particular character of service.

Mr. HATCH. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow the committee to have a direct vote upon the amendment?

Mr. RANDALL. No.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Chairman, here is a class of experienced professional men who are surgeons and physicians, and some of them specialists, men of the very highest ability and learning that can be found in their professions, who have been induced to take these positions, and have been kept here on the ridiculously small salary of $1,800, when you pay hundreds and hundreds of men that amount for mere clerical work, and in many cases for work requiring but little mental capacity. There is no fairness or equity in it; and there is no reason in the world that I can see why the judgment of the committee should not be taken upon the proposition. Simply to say that they are clerks of the fourth class is no reason for keeping their salaries down to $1,800. Let the committee vote upon it, and express its judgment in that way.

Mr. RANDALL. The original plan designated these fourth-class clerks for a certain duty; then subsequently they came in and asked a change in their title. That change was granted. Now the salary is proposed to be increased in consequence of their being transferred from fourth-class clerks to medical examiners.

That always follows as a matter of course. I insist upon the point of order.

Mr. HATCH. Permit me a moment. I know that there are gentlemen who are now occupying those positions who are worth a great deal more to the Government than $1,800 a year. Competent persons employed for this service can effect a great saving to the Government. It is really a matter of economy; and it is an absolute shame to keep them on such a salary.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, the point has been made, I understand, by the gentleman from Missouri, as well as by my colleague, that there is a discrimination between the pay of these officials. In other words the two are paid at the rate of $2,000 a year, and eighteen are paid $1,800 a year. But there is a reason for that, as I understand the arrangement. The two who are paid $2,000 a year are required by law to be experts in their profession, and they are. One of them is an expert in diseases of the mind, as I remember a branch of that profession, which requires, of course, peculiar knowledge and great ability and skill. The other, I believe, is an expert in diseases of the eye.

Mr. RANDALL. An oculist.

Mr. MATSON. Which requires more than ordinary knowledge of surgery and medicine in that particular branch of the profession. For that reason the discrimination is made.

As to whether $1,800 a year is enough pay for that service, I do not propose to question or combat; but I only allude to the question of discrimination to show that the two who receive the additional pay are fully entitled to it.

Mr. HATCH. I do not question that they are entitled to additional pay. What I do claim is that there is not sufficient compensation for the others, if there is for them. I do not think there is. I know that they are efficient surgeons.

Now, the business of these men is to examine the records which come in from all parts of the country. They have to be skilled in their profession, and yet they are receiving but $1,800 a year. I do not know anything like it in the country.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us have a decision on the question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, I have had occasion recently to investigate to a certain extent the matter now pending before this committee. As the result of that investigation our committee are satisfied that the medical officers in the Pension Department were not only not paid enough for their services, but that there was not a sufficiently large number of them to do the work promptly, efficiently, and properly. Therefore that committee reported to the House a bill, which is now pending on the Calendar, recommending that the number of qualified surgeons be increased to three, and that their salaries should be increased from $2,000 to $2,500; also, that an additional force be added to the number of medical examiners and increasing their salary to $2,000.

We did this, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, after a very careful investigation, being satisfied that the work performed by them was of a better and higher order than could be done by any eighteen-hundred-dollar clerk under this Government. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania, though I admire the sturdiness with which he has stood by the report of his committee and defends the Treasury, will allow the increase of the salaries named here to be made, even if he will not suffer the number of examiners to be increased, as was asked for by the Commissioner of Pensions, whom I interviewed upon the subject quite recently.

Mr. RANDALL. I believe the Chair has sustained the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. It did.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. ATKINSON. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend lines 16 and 17 of the pending paragraph by striking out "$3,600" and inserting "$3,600;" so that it will read: "One medical referee, $3,600."

Mr. ATKINSON rose.

Mr. RANDALL. The point of order is reserved.

Mr. ATKINSON. I do not think the amendment is subject to the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the Chair cause the amendment to be read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. RANDALL. That is an increase of salary. It adds $600 to the salary fixed by law.

Mr. ATKINSON. I take it that it is competent for this House to fix the salary of an officer at any figure it sees proper to fix it. The rule to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania refers, Rule XXI, provides that—

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill or be in order as an amendment thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law.

But this sum is not appropriated in the appropriation bill. There is no salary fixed by law for this officer, but the salary which he receives has been fixed annually in the appropriation bills, and it was raised within my recollection—perhaps not more than three years ago—from $2,500 to $3,600 per annum; and if there be no law fixing this salary, and it is entirely dependent upon the pleasure of Congress as enacted in the appropriation bills, I take it that this point of order should not be sustained and that the House should vote upon the amendment which I propose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LIND. I ask unanimous consent to recur to the portion of the bill covering the appropriations for the General Land Office.

Mr. RANDALL. We have passed from that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to return to that portion of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. LIND. I move to strike out the last word of the pending paragraph for the purpose of explaining why I desire to return to the previous portion of the bill. If I am allowed to make a statement, I will say that this is a matter of urgency. At the time that that section was considered I was out asking for information from the General Land Office.

At the last session Congress passed an act directing and requiring the Commissioner of the General Land Office to proceed to the adjustment of railroad grants. In our State there are over half a million acres of land involved in these grants that have been erroneously certified to railroad companies; and there is only one clerk detailed for that work. He has not been at his desk for two weeks. The Commissioner of the General Land Office makes an estimate of $200,000 for that service. Perhaps that is too much. Possibly it is not more than is required. But not one cent of that estimate is allowed by the committee.

Over a year ago I presented an application on behalf of the settlers in my district who are now being proceeded against in ejectment suits by the railroad companies, asking the Government to intervene and order suits to be brought in its behalf as required by the act of Congress; yet nothing has been done. At my own expense I had some of the cases briefed to save work at the General Land Office, but yet final action has not been taken, though more than a year has elapsed. There is not a clerk to put to the work.

I submit it is not right nor proper for Congress to pass legislation of the character it did pass a year ago, and then make it nugatory by a refusal to pass an appropriation for carrying it out. When the Commissioner of the General Land Office makes an estimate for an item of $200,000 there must be some reason for it, and I think it merits a little consideration at the hands of this House.

In connection with this I may refer to the fact that it takes four and a half years to have a contest in regard to a piece of public land determined. The General Land Office is two years behind with its work on contests, and the Secretary of the Interior is eighteen months behind. Therefore when a poor settler living on a prairie claim in Dakota has a contest it takes four and a half years to find whether he or the contestant is to prevail. Last year business accumulated in the office to the number of 20,000 cases. The Commissioner of the General Land Office asked for twenty examiners. The committee allowed ten. These things are a crying evil, and the House can not afford to ignore in this way the just complaints of the people.

Mr. RANDALL. I am glad the gentleman from Minnesota has had the opportunity to state his case, but I prefer not to go back. The subject was fully discussed when that clause was under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania refuses to withdraw his objection to go back.

The Clerk read the following paragraph, under the heading "Pension Office:"

For an additional force of one hundred and fifty special examiners for one year, at a salary of $1,400 each, $210,000; and no person so appointed shall be employed in the State from which he is appointed; and any of those now employed in the Pension Office or as special examiners may be reappointed if they be found to be qualified.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 85, line 15, strike out "$2,250," and insert "$2,500;" so that it will read, "chief clerk, $2,500."

Mr. FORNEY. We have passed from that.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I understood the Chair to rule that any member desiring to offer an amendment should wait until the Clerk finished reading the section.

Mr. RANDALL. But we have passed from that paragraph.

Mr. DOCKERY. I know that the gentleman was waiting until what he considered the proper time to offer his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Tennessee should be recognized.

Mr FORNEY. I make the point of order against the gentleman's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WASHINGTON. In support of that amendment which I have offered I wish to call attention to the fact that the salary of the chief clerk of the Pension Office was fixed in the Revised Statutes (page 7440) as far back as 1870, at $2,000. Since that time it has been increased to as much as $2,500. During the Forty-seventh and Forty-eighth Congresses, for four years, $2,500 was the pay of this chief clerk; but in the Forty-ninth Congress, first session, it was reduced to $2,250, at which sum it has stood for two years past, and my amendment simply intends to restore the salary to $2,500.

Mr. Chairman, if there is a chief clerk in any Department who deserves larger pay than this, it is the chief clerk of the Pension Office, who has under him 1,554 regular employés, more than three times as many as are under the chief clerk of any other Department, and whose duties and responsibilities have been increasing with the business of the Pension Bureau year by year. I am not seeking to delay the committee by making unnecessary remarks upon this subject, but I wish to emphasize the fact that here is a public servant who deserves more pay than he is receiving, because of the amount of work that he has to perform, the number of visitors he has to receive, the number of letters he has to answer, and the number of employés he has to supervise. When we find the chief clerk of the War Department, with only 89 employés under him, getting a salary of $2,500; the chief clerk of the Navy Department, with only 78 employés, getting a salary of $2,500; the chief clerk of the Interior Department (who is also superintendent of the building, getting a salary of $2,750; the chief clerk of the Geological Survey, with only 31 employés, getting a salary of $2,400, surely it stands to reason that the chief clerk of the Pension Office, who has 1,554 employés under him, must be worth more to the Government than $2,250.

Of course, under the rules of the House there is no opportunity to have a vote upon this proposition, but I again insist upon the point that if the Committee on Appropriations, in its secret sessions, has a right to raise or to lower these salaries, the Committee of the Whole ought certainly to have the same right. This committee, and this House, ought not to be shackled or gagged by any rule so as to prevent that. I withdraw the formal amendment, and shall append to my remarks a table showing the salaries of the chief clerks in the several bureaus and the number of employés under each, which will give some idea of the responsibility and the amount of work devolving upon each of these officials.

Department.	Salary of chief clerk.	Number of employés.
War Department	$2,700	89
Navy Department	2,500	78
Post-Office Department	2,500	17
First Assistant Postmaster-General	2,000	82

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order that I may ask the gentleman in charge of the bill whether the force named in the bill at the foot of page 86 is in addition to the examiners who are now at work.

Mr. FORNEY. No, sir. The appropriation is to continue that force.

Mr. PARKER. Then I move to amend by striking out, in line 25, "one hundred and fifty" and inserting "two hundred;" so that it will read: "for an additional force of two hundred special examiners," etc.

Mr. Chairman, I make this motion for the reason that it is a well-known cause of complaint all over the country that cases are referred to special examiners and are delayed month after month, and in some instances, I believe, years, without report. That is a great wrong and injustice, for which there is no excuse, and it ought to be remedied.

Mr. OWEN. Let me ask the gentleman if it is not the ordinary rule that a special examiner does not make his report to the Pension Office for two years?

Mr. PARKER. I believe the gentleman's suggestion is correct.

Mr. OWEN. That is my experience.

Mr. PARKER. It is well known throughout the country, throughout the districts in the extreme North at least, that these examiners can not be found for months and months after parties have been notified that their cases have been referred to special examiners.

The inquiry is made of a member of Congress to ascertain what the trouble is—why the case is not heard. The member inquires at the Pension Department and the information is given that the case has been referred to a special examiner, who in due time will make his appearance and hear the case, and the delay continues. Thus men who periled their lives for the country, who with their families, are suffering for what they earned years ago in the great struggle, are debarred from having their cases heard and from receiving justice because of this delay or incapacity in the service of the special examiners.

I wish to suggest another thing. Study of the work of this department as now controlled by its present head has satisfied some men pretty thoroughly that it is the practice, if not the deliberate purpose, to examine and pass upon petty claims of 75 cents, $1.50, $2, and $4 per month, while the larger demands, the more important cases, which would take more money from the Treasury, are sent off over the country to special examiners and are thus delayed in their hearing and final action. This has become a vicious practice, known throughout the country to exist and charged upon the department. It is due to gentlemen who represent this Administration that an end should be put to this wrong.

Mr. PERKINS. Is not that the practice in every case which carries arrears?

Mr. PARKER. We understand—and in answer to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] I emphasize it—that in very many instances, so many that the matter has attracted public attention, cases where the claimant, if a pension were granted, would be entitled under the law to arrears, have been sent to special examiners and are thus delayed, the applicants being thus robbed of their rights; and this is done with a regularity and repetition not creditable to the Administration.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, the complaint made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER] in regard to the administration of the Pension Office in reference to special examiners, is not, I think, well founded. That there is delay, and more delay, in that branch of the service than in others, I do not deny; nor could anything else be expected, because when a case is sent out to be specially examined it must, in nearly every instance, go into the hands of more than one examiner—in many cases into the hands of many examiners. There is delay in sending these claims back and forth to the different examiners. But I apprehend these claims are now being examined more rapidly in that branch of the service than they ever were before.

There is no need for this increase in the number of special examiners, because the Commissioner of Pensions under the general law has the right to detail as special examiners any number of clerks that he may think proper—there is no limit upon his authority in this respect—and clerks thus detailed are entitled to per diem compensation. The more numerous the cases that are sent out for special examination the less need there is for clerks in the office, and, as I have said, the Commissioner has the right under the law to send clerks from the office into the field for the purpose of making special examinations.

The committee, as I understand, has given the Commissioner all that he asks in this line, and I apprehend that the matters in regard to which the gentlemen on the other side, and perhaps all of us, to some extent, have heard complaints, can be readily excused when the circumstances are taken into consideration.

Sometimes, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER] himself has said, these claims involve large amounts of money. Now, if any claims are delayed, it would be most natural that this delay should attend claims of large amount. A fair and prudent Commissioner of Pensions would look carefully into a claim involving a large amount of money; and there should be no complaint of that. If an applicant presents a claim for a large sum he should not complain if he is asked to satisfy rigid requirements in the way of proof. It is not surprising that in cases involving large sums of money there should occur delay which does not occur in cases which are readily adjudicated in the office.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, it happens not merely in some cases, but in all cases sent to special examiners, that there is a delay of not less than two years. As the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] has said, when a case is sent to a special examiner to be completed, it is sent to not only one special examiner, but to as many special examiners as there are witnesses in different parts of the country. If there are a dozen witnesses in a case and these all reside in different parts of the country, then the case must go through the hands of a dozen special examiners before it is finally adjudicated by the Pension Department.

Another thing. For some reason—I will not undertake to say why—the number of cases referred to the special examination division has been largely increased. It may be because they are old cases, or because they are cases which draw arrears. Whatever the reason, we do know—those of us who have anything to do with the Pension Department—that the number of cases sent to the special examination division has very largely increased within the last year. If with the old force the work has been from one to three years behind, then certainly there is a crying demand for an increase of force. Hence the strong reason for the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

In my judgment, special examiners will not bring the work of the Pension Department up to the current time in a year from this even with two hundred special examiners and there should not be another case.

As I have said, there are parties interested in the speedy determination of these cases, either for or against them. They want them settled. Many want, in case the decision is against them, to appeal to Congress for special enactment, and they can not do it until their cases have been passed upon. It is nothing but justice the Department should be given sufficient force to bring up this work so the complaint may not be continued to be made against them. It is a complaint injurious to the force in the Pension Office. It is to some extent unjust, but you can not do away with the complaint unless you bring the work up, and the only way to do that is by providing a sufficient force for that purpose.

Mr. CANNON. I will move a pro forma amendment for the purpose of saying a word.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] said that under the law there are in this Pension Office fifteen hundred clerks, any of whom may be detailed by the Commissioner to do the work of special examination.

There is one thing more to be said. In the Forty-seventh Congress we increased the force in the Pension Office over eight hundred under an estimate and under an assurance that in three years the work would be brought up to current business. Six years have passed since that time. And when the present Commissioner of Pensions was before the Committee on Appropriations a year ago he said that at the end of this year he would bring up the work so there would be nothing left but current business, and he would be prepared to recommend a decrease of one hundred and fifty clerks on this bill. Yet no decrease has been recommended.

Under this state of affairs, Mr. Chairman, let me say one other thing. The employés in the Pension Office and in kindred offices for the adjudication of pension claims cost between three and four millions of dollars annually. Do gentlemen take into account that at $100 a year how many pensioners one-half of this amount, $2,000,000, would pay. One-half of this force costs what would place upon the pension-roll 20,000 additional pensioners at $100 a year.

I am not up to make any political speech or to abuse anybody; but I am dealing with facts, and desire to say that, in my opinion, this immense force to adjudicate pension claims, partly from the want of proper legislation and partly from a desire to continue under pay from the Government, is rapidly becoming a force of employés which unnecessarily eats up a large amount annually that ought to be given to the soldiers of the late war. [Applause.]

So, when the proposition comes to increase this force of special examiners, with the fact that under the law referred to by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON], the Commissioner can detail clerks for this special-examination work, I must say it does not meet with my approval.

I believe we would find a remedy, and if I had the power I would place every disabled Union soldier who was honorably discharged on the pension-roll at not less than $8 a month. [Applause on the Republican side.] That is the true remedy, and by passing such a law you would get rid of the vast number of men who merely march up the hill and down again throughout the country as employés of the Pension Office. [Renewed applause.]

By unanimous consent the pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, in further answer to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] and his statement that the Commissioner of Pensions has the power to detail clerks to do this work of special examination, I wish to say that that power has not been exercised, while the injury has been going on, and we are still without any remedy.

Mr. MATSON. Let me state, Mr. Chairman, that there are now about four hundred special examiners in the field, detailed clerks and others.

Mr. PARKER. How many?

Mr. MATSON. About four hundred.

Mr. PARKER. Four hundred detailed clerks?

Mr. MATSON. No, altogether.

Mr. PARKER. And we still find that relief does not come. The members of this House have a strong argument in their experience against the claim that there is an excess of clerks in this bureau. Under the familiar and pleasant rule of the former Commissioner of Pensions, Colonel Dudley, it was customary when a member of Congress went into the Pension Office for that Commissioner or one of his deputies to detail a clerk to examine the case called up with the member.

The points were readily gained and the skill and familiarity with the case of the person having it in charge was given for the benefit of the time of the member of Congress making the application and for the benfit of the pensioner. Now, however, we find all that condition of things changed. Every one who has recently gone to the third deputy's office, and who has asked for information in regard to a case, will agree that he does not receive the same attention there from the clerks of the division as formerly; but the case is sent up by a mere messenger, and one man in the room has to serve many members of Congress and others who come in on such business; and there is a peculiar and singular caution displayed as to the work that is being done, and as to the exhibition of the papers produced. A similar method obtains to some extent elsewhere.

The deputy commissioners are courteous and obliging, but the methods have been changed.

I understand the rule is absolute that the examiners having charge of a case in the divisions are not permitted to present the case to the member of Congress who wants information, but such information must come through other avenues. Therefore I have inferred that this low rating of the value of the time and convenience of members of Congress, and consequent action upon it, must be because there is such a pressure of work upon the clerks in the office, and that they have been so busy with the work there that they could not be detailed upon this special service.

One thing further, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say in the same line of expression as that used by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who has just taken his seat. I, too, believe that the true method of settling these questions is to pass a bill that shall give a per diem, and a liberal per diem, pension to every soldier who served in the war for any considerable period, or who was in any general engagement, or who suffered in a rebel prison. Let the money that is now being paid out to the clerks while they are making numberless inquiries and seeking testimony in strange places, and meantime withholding pensions and keeping back their payment, be paid out to the pensioners themselves, direct. Let the pensioners have the money and send the clerks about other business, and reduce the force in the bureau. By this short cut the people will do justice by the old soldiers and put an end to these unkind and unjust delays.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to make a pro forma amendment for the purpose of asking a question.

I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions this question: About how long does a case lie in the hands of a special examiner in your district before the attention of the claimant is called to it for examination?

Mr. MATSON. I do not know that I can answer the question specifically as to the exact time. I know, as far as my own experience in that district is concerned, that there has been commendable promptness in such cases.

And right here I just want to say, in response to what the gentleman from Kansas says, that these cases go into the hands of the special examiner and are held there for two years, that he is entirely mistaken.

Mr. CONGER. I asked the gentleman for the purpose of knowing how long these papers were allowed to lie in the hands of a special examiner, for the reason that my own experience has been that a considerable length of time has been so occupied.

Mr. MATSON. I suppose if he has other claims which have priority, or some special reason which prevents him from taking prompt action on a case when it is put in his hands, there may be some delay, and that circumstances may arise where cases would be allowed to lie over for some time. I do not know of any.

Mr. CONGER. I speak from experience in my own district where I have three cases that have come to my own knowledge within the last few weeks, in which the papers have been sent to the special examiners and have lain in their hands for a period of eighteen months before they have proceeded to make any sort of an examination in reference to them. Now it is possible that this may be peculiar to the State of Iowa for some reason—I do not say that it is political. But my friend from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] tells me that he has no complaint in his State. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] says that they are working the business up very closely in his State. So that I assume there must be some peculiar reason which we are unable to understand why in the States of Iowa and Kansas and Nebraska and other States of that particular persuasion there should be this neglect.

Mr. DINGLEY. Since the gentleman has referred to that, let me say to him that in my State there has been considerable complaint of delay. Papers have lain in the hands of special examiners for a year at a time.

Mr. CONGER. I do not complain of the failure to make a report in these cases, but of the failure to make an examination at all. I have three letters written to me from different parties within the last eighteen months reciting exactly the same thing, or that their cases were sent to the special examiner in the city of Des Moines, Iowa, on such a date—the first eighteen months ago; the next letter, referred to the same date, being written later, and yet no action was taken.

Now, I desire to correct the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions in the statement just made by him in regard to the number of examiners in the field. I hold in my hand a letter written by the Commissioner of Pensions in which he says that but two hundred and seventy men are engaged in special examinations in that office and tells me where they are distributed, and from my knowledge of the location of a large majority of the soldiers in this country I am satisfied that the larger proportion of these men have been sent to such States as Indiana, Missouri, and to other States where——

Mr. PETERS. They can do political work. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. Where they can do, if necessary, political work.

Mr. PETERS. What is the letter?

Mr. CONGER. I shall not read the letter, but ask to have it printed in the RECORD in this connection.

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

[Dictated.]

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS.
OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER,
Washington, D. C., April 20, 1888.

MY DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 14th instant, in which you request to be informed of the number of special examiners employed in this bureau and where the same are stationed, and in reply permit me to state that at this time there are two hundred and seventy men engaged upon such duty, distributed in the following manner:

In the western district, which comprises the States of Illinois, Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, Colorado, Nevada, California, Oregon, and all the Territories except Dakota, New Mexico, and Indian, there are forty-six examiners.

In the Potomac district, which comprises that portion of Pennsylvania west of the Susquehanna River, the southern half of Ohio, that portion of Maryland west of the Chesapeake Bay, the District of Columbia, the States of Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and that portion of Florida east of the Apalachicola River, there are fifty-three examiners.

In the Indiana district, which comprises the northern part of Ohio, the States of Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and the Territory of Dakota, and a portion of the work to be performed in Canada, there are sixty-seven examiners.

In the Missouri district, which comprises the States of Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, that portion of the State of Florida west of the Apalachicola River, Texas, Arkansas, Missouri, the Territory of New Mexico, and the Indian Territory, there are forty-two examiners.

In the Hudson district, which comprises that portion of Pennsylvania east of the Susquehanna River, that portion of the State of Maryland east of the Chesapeake Bay, the States of Delaware, New Jersey, New York, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Hampshire, Vermont, Maine, and a portion of the work performed in Canada, there are sixty-two examiners.

Hoping this will prove satisfactory, I am, very truly, yours,

JOHN C. BLACK, Commissioner.

Hon. E. H. CONGER, House of Representatives.

Mr. DOCKERY. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of replying to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CONGER], who has been pleased to mention my name in connection with the question now under consideration.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of appropriating every dollar that is necessary to furnish a sufficient force not only in the department of special examinations, but also in all other departments of the Pension Bureau, so as to secure the speedy examination of pending claims. The Commissioner of Pensions ought to be the best judge of the force requisite, and I am quite willing to accept the judgment of the present efficient officer in charge of that great department.

Referring especially to the delay claimed to exist by the gentleman from New York, and emphasized by the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa, I desire to say that so far as I am advised there has been no complaint of that nature in the section of Missouri from which I come. I do not know how it is or why it is, but the examiners in my district are hold-over Republicans——

A MEMBER. That is the reason there is no complaint.

Mr. DOCKERY. But unfortunately for the gentleman from Iowa, if that be the reason, it controverts his statement wherein he asserted that the examiners sent to Indiana, Missouri, and other States were sent there to do political work.

But, Mr. Chairman, referring again to the alleged delay in the examination of pension cases, permit me to qualify my statement of a few moments since, for there was complaint perhaps for three months or more of last year. The examiner at that time was a "hold-over" official from the last administration, and the complaint had its origin in the illness of that very excellent gentleman, who was suffering from the effects of a bullet which had furrowed its way across his forehead. This battle-scarred veteran therefore, because of his injuries, was unable to do efficient work for the time stated, and, so far as I remember, this has been the only delay of which complaint might properly be made.

I do not think that the statement of the gentleman from Iowa, alleging political work by this class of officials, is warranted by anything that has ever come to my knowledge in Missouri. Sir, in my opinion, all questions relating to the proper care of disabled soldiers, their widows and orphans, are non-partisan, and should be so regarded.

And therefore it is I regret that our Republican friends so frequently indulge in partisan observations in the discussion of all matters relating to pensions.

Mr. Chairman, as I have stated, both of these special examiners in my section of Missouri are Republicans; but they have not engaged in political labors, neither do I believe that any Democrat on that force has been so employed. If any Democrat has neglected the interests of the soldiers by engaging in partisan labors he ought to be discharged, and I have full faith that such action will be taken whenever the fact is brought to the attention of the Commissioner.

Mr. DINGLEY. I wish to say in reference to the subject under consideration that I find in the State of Maine, which I have the honor in part to represent, that all of the cases that have been referred to the special examiners are on an average one year behind. When within a month or two I have called up cases that have been referred to special examiners eight months ago the response has come from the Pension Office that the cases will be considered by the examiners when they are reached in regular order, and in many cases where the reports have been made by special examiners they have been rereferred to examiners in other parts of the country and subjected to another delay of six or eight months—in some cases a year.

I do not know what is the reason of this; whether or not there are not sufficient officials to examine these cases more promptly than is indicated by what has occurred in my own State. But it seems to me to be the duty of the House to increase the number. If the difficulty has arisen from other causes it ought to be made known and the remedy applied.

The soldiers of this country deserving pensions ought not to be kept out of them month after month and year after year. I think it is the duty of this committee at this point to apply a remedy to these difficulties which I have suggested.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana, rose.

Mr. FORNEY. If we are to get through with this bill there ought to be some limit put upon this debate. I ask unanimous consent that debate on the pending paragraph be limited to five minutes.

Objection was made.

Mr. FORNEY. Then I ask unanimous consent that it be limited to ten minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana. I wish to say a word on this pension business. As regards the provisions of this bill, as I have been in the House but a short time, I do not know all the features of it; but I am satisfied there is nothing to object to in the number of clerks in the Pension Department or the expenses in connection therewith. But I do certainly have objection to the way in which soldiers and their widows are kept out of their pensions.
